THE AMERICAN CASEBOOK SERIES

THE first of the American Casebook Series, Mikell's Cases on Criminal Law, issued in December, 1908, contained in its preface an able argument by Mr. James Brown Scott, the General Editor of the Series, in favor of the case method of law teaching. This preface has appeared in each of the volumes published in the series up to the present time. But the teachers of law have moved onward, and the argument that was necessary in 1908 has now become needless. That such is the case becomes strikingly manifest to one examining three important documents that fittingly mark the progress of legal education in America. In 1893 the United States Bureau of Education published a report on Legal Education prepared by the American Bar Association's Committee on Legal Education, and manifestly the work of that Committee's accomplished chairman, William G. Hammond, in which the three methods of teaching law then in vogue—that is, by lectures, by text-book, and by selected cases—were described and commented upon, but without indication of preference. The next report of the Bureau of Education dealing with legal education, published in 1914, contains these unequivocal statements.

"To-day the case method forms the principal, if not the exclusive, method of teaching in nearly all of the stronger law schools of the country. Lectures on special subjects are of course still delivered in all law schools, and this doubtless always will be the case. But for staple instruction in the important branches of common law the case has proved itself as the best available material for use practically everywhere. * * * The case method is to-day the principal method of instruction in the great majority of the schools of this country."

But the most striking evidence of the present stage of development of legal instruction in American Law Schools is to be found in the special report, made by Professor Redlich to the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, on "The Case Method in American Law Schools." Professor Redlich, of the Faculty of Law in the University of Vienna, was brought to this country to make a special study of methods of legal instruction in the United States from the standpoint of one free from those prejudices necessarily engendered in American teachers through their relation to the struggle for supremacy so long, and at one time so vehemently, waged among the rival systems. From this masterly report, so replete with brilliant analysis and discriminating comment, the following brief extracts are taken. Speaking of the text-book method Professor Redlich says:

"The principles are laid down in the text-book and in the professor's lectures, ready made and neatly rounded, the predigested essence of many judicial decisions. The pupil has simply to accept them and to inscribe them so far as possible in his memory. In this way the scientific element of instruction is apparently excluded from the very first. Even though the representatives of this instruction certainly do regard law as a science—that is to say, as a system of thought, a grouping of concepts to be satisfactorily explained by historical research and logical deduction—they are not willing to teach this science, but only its results. The inevitable danger which appears to accompany this method of teaching is that of developing a mechanical, superficial instruction in abstract maxims, instead of a genuine intellectual probing of the subject-matter of the law, fulfilling the requirements of a science."

Turning to the case method Professor Redlich comments as follows:

"It emphasizes the scientific character of legal thought; it goes now a step further, however, and demands that law, just because it is a science, must also be taught scientifically. From this point of view it very properly rejects the elementary school type of existing legal education as inadequate to develop the specific legal mode of thinking, as inadequate to make the basis, the logical foundation, of the separate legal principles really intelligible to the students. Consequently, as the method was developed, it laid the main emphasis upon precisely that aspect of the training which the older text-book school entirely neglected—the training of the student in intellectual independence, in individual thinking, in digging out the principles through penetrating analysis of the material found within separate cases; material which contains, all mixed in with one another, both the facts, as life creates them, which generate the law, and at the same time rules of the law itself, component parts of the general system. In the fact that, as has been said before, it has actually accomplished this purpose, lies the great success of the case method. For it really teaches the pupil to think in the way that any practical lawyer—whether dealing with written or with unwritten law—ought to and has to think. It prepares the student in precisely the way which, in a country of case law, leads to full powers of legal understanding and legal acumen; that is to say, by making the law pupil familiar with the law through incessant practice in the analysis of law cases, where the concepts, principles, and rules of Anglo-American law are recorded, not as dry abstractions, but as cardinal realities in the inexhaustibly rich, ceaselessly fluctuating, social and economic life of man. Thus in the modern American law school professional practice is preceded by a genuine course of study, the methods of which are perfectly adapted to the nature of the common law."

The general purpose and scope of this series were clearly stated in the original announcement:

"The General Editor takes pleasure in announcing a series of scholarly casebooks, prepared with special reference to the needs and limitations of the classroom, on the fundamental subjects of legal education, which, through a judicious rearrangement of emphasis, shall provide adequate training combined with a thorough knowledge of the general principles of the subject. The collection will develop the law historically and scientifically; English cases will give the origin and development of the law in England; American cases will trace its expansion and modification in America; notes and annotations will suggest phases omitted in the printed case. Cumulative references will be avoided, for the footnote may not hope to rival the digest. The law will thus be presented as an organic growth, and the necessary connection between the past and the present will be obvious.

"The importance and difficulty of the subject as well as the time that can properly be devoted to it will be carefully considered so that each book may be completed within the time allotted to the particular subject. * * * If it be granted that all, or nearly all, the studies required for admission to the bar should be studied in course by every student—and the soundness of this contention can hardly be seriously doubted—it follows necessarily that the preparation and publication of collections of cases exactly adapted to the purpose would be a genuine and by no means unimportant service to the cause of legal education. And this result can best be obtained by the preparation of a systematic series of casebooks constructed upon a uniform plan under the supervision of an editor in chief. * * *

"The following subjects are deemed essential in that a knowledge of them (with the exception of International Law and General Jurisprudence) is universally required for admission to the bar:

Administrative Law.
Agency.
Bills and Notes.
Carriers.
Contracts.
Corporations.
Constitutional Law.
Criminal Law.
Criminal Procedure.
Common-Law Pleading.
Conflict of Laws.
Code Pleading.
Damages.
Domestic Relations.
Equity.
Equity Pleading.
Evidence.
Insurance.
International Law.
Jurisprudence.
Mortgages.
Partnership.
Personal Property.
Real Property. { 1st Year. / 2d " / 3d "
Public Corporations.
Quasi Contracts.
Sales.
Suretyship.
Torts.
Trusts.
Wills and Administration.

"International Law is included in the list of essentials from its intrinsic importance in our system of law. As its principles are simple in comparison with municipal law, as their application is less technical, and as the cases are generally interesting, it is thought that the book may be larger than otherwise would be the case.

"As an introduction to the series a book of Selections on General Jurisprudence of about 500 pages is deemed essential to completeness.

"The preparation of the casebooks has been intrusted to experienced and well-known teachers of the various subjects included, so that the experience of the classroom and the needs of the students will furnish a sound basis of selection."

Since this announcement of the Series was first made there have been published, or put in press, books on the following subjects:

Administrative Law. By Ernst Freund, Professor of Law, University of Chicago.

Agency. By Edwin C. Goddard, Professor of Law, University of Michigan.

Bills and Notes. By Howard L. Smith, Professor of Law, University of Wisconsin, and William U. Moore, Professor of Law, University of Chicago.

Carriers. By Frederick Green, Professor of Law, University of Illinois.

Conflict of Laws. By Ernest G. Lorenzen, Professor of Law, University of Minnesota.

Constitutional Law. By James Parker Hall, Dean of the University of Chicago Law School.

Corporations. By Harry S. Richards, Dean of the University of Wisconsin Law School.

Criminal Law. By William E. Mikell, Dean of the University of Pennsylvania Law School.

Criminal Procedure. By William E. Mikell, Dean of the University of Pennsylvania Law School.

Damages. By Floyd R. Mechem, Professor of Law, Chicago University, and Barry Gilbert, Professor of Law, University of California.

Equity. By George H. Boke, Professor of Law, University of California.

Insurance. By W. R. Vance, Dean of the University of Minnesota Law School.

Partnership. By Eugene A. Gilmore, Professor of Law, University of Wisconsin.

Persons (including Marriage and Divorce). By Albert M. Kales, Professor of Law, Northwestern University, and Chester G. Vernier, Professor of Law, University of Illinois.

Pleading (Common Law). By Clarke B. Whittier, Professor of Law, Stanford University.

Sales. By Frederic C. Woodward, Dean of Stanford University Law School.

Suretyship. By Crawford D. Hening, Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania.

Torts. By Charles M. Hepburn, Professor of Law, University of Indiana.

Trusts. By Thaddeus D. Kenneson, Professor of Law, University of New York.

Wills and Administration. By George P. Costigan, Jr., Professor of Law, Northwestern University.

It is earnestly hoped and believed that the books thus far published in this series, with the sincere purpose of furthering scientific training in the law, have not been without their influence in bringing about a fuller understanding and a wider use of the case method.

The following well-known teachers of law are at present actively engaged in the preparation of casebooks on the subjects indicated below:

Frank Irvine, Dean, Cornell University Law School. Subject, Evidence.

Charles Thaddeus Terry, Professor of Law, Columbia University. Subject, Contracts.

James Brown Scott, Professor of International Law, Johns Hopkins University. Subject, International Law.

Edward S. Thurston, Professor of Law, University of Minnesota. Subject, Quasi Contracts.

Henry Wade Rogers, Dean, Yale Law School. Subject, Public Corporations.

Albert M. Kales, Professor of Law, Northwestern University. Subject, Property.

Harry A. Bigelow, Professor of Law, University of Chicago. Subject, Property.

Ralph W. Aigler, Professor of Law, University of Michigan. Subject, Property.

AUTHOR'S PREFATORY NOTE

In selecting and classifying the materials for this book, I have had in mind especially the first year law students. If "the classification of actionable wrongs," as Sir Frederick Pollock remarks, "is perplexing, not because it is difficult to find a scheme of division, but because it is easier to find many than to adhere to any one of them," the problem is hardly less difficult when it has to do with the presentation of the principles of Torts, through a collection of cases extending from the Year Books to the present day. But when the needs of a class of first year law students are considered there are two or three guiding principles which tend to settle the scheme of division.

It appears to be clear that the beginning student in Torts, however it may be in other subjects, should have some assistance, at the very outset, in marking the place which is occupied by Torts in the general field of the law. Perhaps this assistance might be given him through a collection of cases, but for the immediate purpose of this volume it seems best to use a number of reading selections. This I have attempted in an Introductory, dealing with the meaning of the word "tort" as an historical term of law, with the difference between torts and moral wrongs, and between torts and other forms of legal wrong, and with the effect which the common law action for damages has had on our theory of torts. I have added a short note on the classification of torts.

It appears to be reasonably clear also that the beginning student needs, in his study of the individual torts, a simple and broad classification based on historical lines. In his inductive study of the cases, he will profit by following in the main the historical development of our law of torts. This has led me to pass by several classifications of torts which are evidently of interest and stimulating value for advanced students, and to take the broadest lines of division and, for a starting point, the causes in trespass.

The cases on the individual torts have been arranged, therefore, in two main divisions. In the first I have placed the trespasses, and in a subdivision after them the other torts which rest on an act of absolute liability.

In the second main division I have placed those torts, chiefly of modern development, in which the plaintiff cannot show any act of absolute liability committed by the defendant, but, in order to make out a valid prima facie cause, must show "negligence" or "malice."

From this two-fold scheme of division, one departure has been made. For the sake of convenience in teaching, the consideration of the causal relation in torts has been treated as a distinct division of the subject, and is placed between the first and the second of the divisions just indicated. CASES ON TORTS

"TORTS" AND "WRONGS"

"Rectum" is a proper and significant word for the right that any hath,[1] and wrong or injury is in French aptly called "tort;" [2] because injury and wrong is wrested or crooked, being contrary to that which is right and straight.

Coke upon Littleton (1628) 158b.

"Tort" is nothing but the French equivalent of our English word "wrong," and was freely used by Spenser as a poetical synonym for it. In common speech everything is a wrong, or wrongful, which is thought to do violence to any right. Manslaying, false witness, breach of covenant, are wrongs in this case. But thus we should include all breaches of all duties, and therefore should not even be on the road to any distinction that could serve as the base of a legal classification.

Sir Frederick Pollock, Torts (3d Ed.) 2.

[1] "Since conduct which is straightforward came to be spoken of eulogistically as being 'rectum,' 'directum' (whence 'droit'), 'recht,' and 'right,' conduct of the opposite character naturally came to be expressed by the terms 'delictum,' 'delit,' as deviating from the right path, and 'wrong' or 'tort,' as twisted out of the straight line." Holland, Jurisprudence (1906) 318.

For the scope and use of the term "delict," "delictum," see Pollock on Torts (8th Ed.) 16, 17; Terry's Leading Principles of Anglo-Am. Law, 104; Black's Law Dictionary, 348, 349; and compare "Action Ex Delicto," 1 Words and Phrases, 141.

[2] "'Tort,' from the Latin 'tortus,' a French word for injury or wrong, as 'de son tort demesne,' in his own wrong." Jacob's Law Dictionary (1811) vol. 6, p. 251.

It is not surprising, in any case, that a complete theory of torts is yet to seek, for the subject is altogether modern. The earliest text-book I have been able to find is a meagre and unthinking digest of "The Law of Actions on the Case for Torts and Wrongs," published in 1720, remarkable chiefly for the depths of historical ignorance which it occasionally reveals. The really scientific treatment of principles begins only with the decisions of the last fifty years; their development belongs to that classical period of our jurisprudence which in England came between the Common Law Procedure Act and the Judicature Act.

Sir Frederick Pollock,[3] Introduction to the first edition of his Torts.

Take the law of tort or civil liability for damages apart from contract and the like. Is there any general theory of such liability, or are the cases in which it exists simply to be enumerated, and to be explained each on its special ground, as is easy to believe from the fact that the right of action for certain well-known classes of wrongs like trespass or slander has its special history for each class? I think that there is a general theory to be discovered, although resting in tendency rather than established and accepted. I think that the law regards the infliction of temporal damage by a responsible person as actionable, if under the circumstances known to him the danger of his act is manifest according to common experience, or according to his own experience if it is more than common, except in cases where upon special grounds of policy the law refuses to protect the plaintiff or grants a privilege to the defendant. I think that commonly malice, intent, and negligence mean only that the danger was manifest to a greater or less degree, under the circumstances known to the actor, although in some cases of privilege malice may mean an actual malevolent motive, and such a motive may take away a permission knowingly to inflict harm, which otherwise would be granted on this or that ground of dominant public good. But when I stated my view to a very eminent English judge the other day, he said: "You are discussing what the law ought to be; as the law is, you must show a right. A man is not

[3] In his "open letter," addressed to Mr. Justice Holmes, introducing the first edition of Pollock on Torts. The professed aim of this book, published in 1887, was "to show that there really is a Law of Torts, not merely a number of rules of law about various kinds of torts—that this is a true living branch of the Common Law, not a collection of heterogeneous instances."

"We read in the books of various forms of actions for violations of non-contract legal duties, and of classified civil wrongs of this sort. We had, as we still have, Assault and Battery, Slander and Libel, Deceit, Malicious Prosecution, Trespass, and so on, all pertaining to minor divisions within the subject of this volume. In 1859 was published the first treatise on the 'Law of Torts.' It was by Francis Hilliard. It was, as all know, an American book. The English Addison on Torts appeared in 1860." Bishop, Non-Contract Law (1889) 1, 2.

liable for negligence unless he is subject to a duty." If our difference was more than a difference in words, or with regard to the proportion between the exceptions and the rule, then, in his opinion, liability for an act cannot be referred to the manifest tendency of the act to cause temporal damage in general as a sufficient explanation, but must be referred to the special nature of the damage, or must be derived from some special circumstances outside of the tendency of the act, for which no generalized explanation exists. I think that such a view is wrong, but it is familiar, and I dare say, generally accepted in England.[4]

Mr. Justice Holmes, "The Path of the Law," 10 Harv. Law Rev. 457, 471 (1897).

The English Law of Contract and (within its very modest limits) the English Law of Quasi-Contract, are scientific. The English Law of Torts is arbitrary, and (in the historical sense of the word) barbaric. That is to say, it is possible to define, in simple language, what is a contract according to English Law, and to say that every arrangement which satisfies that definition will be a legally enforceable contract. Thus we may say, that whenever an adult and normal person enters into an agreement, with only a lawful object in view, for the purpose of affecting his legal relations, then, if that agreement is either motived by pecuniary consideration or is embodied in a deed, it will create a contract legally binding on him. That is a definition which an educated layman may fairly be expected to understand; and it really tells him something.

No such definition of a tort can be offered. A tort, in English Law, can only be defined in terms which really tell us nothing. A tort is a breach of a duty (other than a contractual or quasi-contractual duty) which gives rise to an action for damages. That is, obviously, a merely procedural definition, of no value to the layman. The latter wants to know the nature of those breaches of duty which give rise to actions for damages. And the only answer that can be given to him is: "Read this and the preceding volume." To put it briefly, there is no English Law of Tort; there is merely an English Law of Torts, i. e., a list of acts and omissions which, in certain conditions, are actionable. Any attempt to generalize further, however interesting from a speculative standpoint, would be profoundly unsafe as a practical guide. * * *

[4] In 1904, Mr. Justice Holmes, delivering the opinion in Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 204, 25 Sup. Ct. 3, 5 (49 L. Ed. 159), remarked as follows: "It has been considered that prima facie the intentional infliction of temporal damage is a cause of action, which as a matter of substantive law, whatever may be the form of pleading, requires a justification if the defendant is to escape."

See the remarks of Bowen, L. J., in Skinner & Co. v. Shew & Co. (1893) 1 ch. 413, 422; the remarks of Professor Ames in 18 Harv. Law Rev. (1905) 411 et seq. See, also, 26 Harv. Law Rev. (1913) 740-742. For an examination of the principle involved, see infra, Part III, Chapter II, "Torts through Malice."

English Law stumbled on her definition of contract by an accident of genius; for six hundred years she has been seeking in vain for a definition of tort. We may well be impatient; and yet, when we think of the dangers involved, on the one hand in narrowness, and, on the other, in vagueness, we shall hesitate long before committing ourselves to an irrevocable definition.[5]

J. C. Miles, Digest Eng. Civil Law, Bk. II, pp. xiv, xv (1910).

II

TORTS AND MORAL WRONGS

Primitive law regards the word and the act of the individual; it searches not his heart. "The thought of a man shall not be tried," said Chief Justice Brian, one of the best of the mediæval lawyers, "for the devil himself knoweth not the thought of man."

James Barr Ames, "Law and Morals" (1908) 22 Harvard Law Review, 97.*

The law of torts abounds in moral phraseology. It has much to say of wrongs, of malice, fraud, intent, and negligence. Hence it may naturally be supposed that the risk of a man's conduct is thrown upon him as the result of some moral short-coming. But while this notion has been entertained, the extreme opposite will be found to have been a far more popular opinion; I mean the notion that a man is answerable for all the consequences of his acts, or, in other words, that he acts at his peril always, and wholly irrespective of the state of his consciousness upon the matter.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., The Common Law (1881) 79, 80.

[5] "It is true that it is not yet possible to give an unexceptionable definition of a tort. But we think Mr. Miles goes too far in saying 'there is no English Law of Tort; there is merely an English Law of Torts, i. e., a list of acts and omissions which, in certain conditions, are actionable.' In our judgment the Common Law is coming, if it has not already come, to hold that a man who wilfully or negligently causes temporal damage of any kind is liable unless he can show justification or excuse. The real difficulty is not to find a verbal definition of tort in general, but to define the substantial principles of justification and excuse and the limits of their application." Sir Frederick Pollock, 26 Law Quart. Rev. 420 (1910).

See, also, the article, by Sir Frederick Pollock, on Torts, in 27 Encyl. Brit. (11th Ed. 1911) 64.

*Republished in Lectures on Legal History, 434 (1915).

To-day we may say that the old law has been radically transformed. The early law asked simply, "Did the defendant do the physical act which damaged the plaintiff?" The law of to-day, except in certain cases based upon public policy, asks the further question, "Was the act blameworthy?" The ethical standard of reasonable conduct has replaced the unmoral standard of acting at one's peril.[6]

James Barr Ames, Law and Morals, 22 Harv. Law Rev. 99 (1908).[7]

The theory of torts may be summed up very simply. At the two extremes of the law are rules determined by policy without reference of any kind to morality. Certain harms a man may inflict even wickedly; for certain others he must answer, although his conduct has been prudent and beneficial to the community.

But in the main the law started from those intentional wrongs which are the simplest and most pronounced cases, as well as the nearest to the feeling of revenge which leads to self-redress. It thus naturally adopted the vocabulary, and in some degree the tests, of morals. But as the law has grown, even when its standards have continued to model themselves upon those of morality, they have necessarily become external, because they have considered, not the actual condition of the particular defendant, but whether his conduct would have been wrong in the fair average member of the community, whom he is expected to equal at his peril.

In general, this question will be determined by considering the degree of danger attending the act or conduct under the known circumstances. If there is danger that harm to another will follow, the act is generally wrong in the sense of the law.

But in some cases the defendant's conduct may not have been morally wrong, and yet he may have chosen to inflict the harm, as where he has acted in fear of his life. In such cases he will be liable,

[6] On this remark by Professor Ames, in 1908, Professor Roscoe Pound has this comment in 1914: "But the ethical standard of which he wrote, which came into the law in the period of infusion of morals, was an individualist ethical standard. To-day there is a strong and growing tendency to revive the idea of liability without fault, not only in the form of wide responsibility for agencies employed, but in placing upon an enterprise the burden of repairing injuries without fault of him who conducts it, which are incident to the undertaking. There is a strong and growing tendency, where there is no blame on either side, to ask, in view of the exigencies of social justice, who can best bear the loss, and hence to shift the loss by creating liability where there has been no fault. The whole matter of workmen's compensation and employer's liability, as dealt with in modern legislation, illustrates this." Roscoe Pound, "The End of the Law," 27 Harv. Law Rev. 233 (1914). For the development of the doctrine of liability without fault, see Part I, Torts through Acts of Absolute Liability. For the development of the doctrine of liability through blameworthiness, see Part III, Torts through Acts of Conditional Liability.

or not, according as the law makes moral blameworthiness, within the limits explained above, the ground of liability, or deems it sufficient if the defendant has had reasonable warning of danger before acting. This distinction, however, is generally unimportant, and the known tendency of the act under the known circumstances to do harm may be accepted as the general test of conduct.

The tendency of a given act to cause harm under given circumstances must be determined by experience. And experience either at first hand or through the voice of the jury is continually working out concrete rules, which in form are still more external, and still more remote from a reference to the moral condition of the defendant, than even the test of the prudent man which makes the first stage of the division between law and morals. It does this in the domain of wrongs described as intentional, as systematically as in those styled unintentional or negligent.

But while the law is thus continually adding to its specific rules, it does not adopt the coarse and impolitic principle that a man acts always at his peril. On the contrary, its concrete rules, as well as the general questions addressed to the jury, show that the defendant must have had at least a fair chance of avoiding the infliction of harm before he becomes answerable for such a consequence of his conduct. And it is certainly arguable that even a fair chance to avoid bringing harm to pass is not sufficient to throw upon a person the peril of his conduct, unless, judged by average standards, he is also to blame for what he does.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., The Common Law (1881) 161.

There must be not only a thing done amiss, but also a damage either already fallen upon the party, or else inevitable. And therefore 19 H.6 44 if a man forge a bond in my name, I can have no action upon the case yet, but if I am sued, I may for the wrong and damage, though I may avoid it by plea.

Hobart, C. J., in Waterer v. Freeman (1619) Hob. 266, 267.[8]

[8] The case was this: Waterer brought an action of the case against Freeman, and declared that the defendant had sued out at Westm. a fieri fac. upon a judgment given against him for the defendant, for a trespass in Oxfordshire, in the King's Bench to the Sheriffs of Oxfordshire, who by virtue thereof took goods of the plaintiff to the value of the damage, and so made his return, and that the goods remained in his hands pro defectu emptoris, and that the defendant well knowing this (to the intent to vex and double charge him) afterwards did sue out another fieri fac. to the same sheriff, and delivered it to him to be executed, who did thereupon levy the money of other goods of the plaintiff and paid it over to the defendant whereby the now plaintiff was double charged; whereupon the defendant pleaded not guilty, and it was found against him. See Hobart, 205. On this there was a judgment for the plaintiff. Hobart, 266, 80 Reprint, 352.

It seems to me that the rule laid down by Croke, J., in Baily v. Merrell (1615) 3 Bulst. 95, is a sound and solid principle, namely, that fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, will not found an action; but where both concur, an action will lie.

Ashhurst, J., in Pasley v. Freeman (1789) 3 T. R. 51, 61.[9]

The law of torts exists for the purpose of preventing men from hurting one another, whether in respect of their property, their persons, their reputations, or anything else which is theirs. The fundamental principle of this branch of the law is "Alterum non lædere"—to hurt nobody by word or deed. An action of tort, therefore, is usually a claim for pecuniary compensation in respect of damage so suffered.

John W. Salmond, Law of Torts (1910) 7.

III

TORTS AND OTHER LEGAL WRONGS

The Law of Torts forms a portion of what is called private law, or that which is concerned with questions between man and man, as distinguished from public law, which is concerned with questions (1) between individuals and the community, as in criminal law, constitutional law, ecclesiastical law, and military law; or (2) between the community and another community, as in public international law.

We may regard law, whether public or private, as consisting of two portions, one of which, called substantive law, deals with rights, and the other, called adjective law, with the methods by which substantive law is administered. For instance, the law of contracts, the law of torts, the law of trusts, the law of succession, and the law of landlord and tenant, are all parts of the substantive portion of Private Law; while the rules relating to the procedure by which the rights under those several branches of law are secured, and redress for wrong is given, are called Adjective Law.

The Law of Torts forms a part of the substantive portion of Private Law.

[9] The defendant had made a false affirmation with intent to defraud the plaintiffs, who acted upon it to their damage. The plaintiffs' actual damage was established. There was no evidence that the defendant had benefited by his deceit or had colluded with those who had received a benefit. A judgment for the plaintiffs was sustained.

The substantive portion of private law comprises—(1) Rights in rem, or rights as against all the world, or indeterminate persons; (2) rights arising out of agreements or relations between two or more determinate persons.

Rights in rem comprise rights of (i) person, (ii) reputation, (iii) family or other domestic relations (as against the outside world), (iv) rights to the due performance of public duties, (v) and rights in objects, privileges, and advantages.

Rights as between determinate persons arise (a) out of voluntary gifts and promises; out of assignments not voluntary; out of grants; out of testamentary dispositions; (b) out of a contract (as when A. arranges with B. that B. shall do a certain piece of work for him for so much money); (c) out of family relations (as between one member of the family and another); (d) out of fiduciary relations; out of trusts.

A tort is usually said to be "A wrong independent of contract," i. e., the violation of a right independent of contract; and it will be seen by this statement that the rights, of which a tort is a violation, are, in fact, distinct from those arising out of contract. But they are also, as will be seen, distinct from a vast array of other rights; so that the usual definition is as defective as would be a definition of the horse as "A class of animal independent of horned cattle."

Innes, Principles of Torts (1891) 3, 5, 6.

By some writers a tort has been defined as the violation of a right in rem, giving rise to an obligation to pay damages. There is a tempting simplicity and neatness in this application of the distinction between rights in rem and in personam, but it may be gravely doubted whether it does in truth conform to the actual contents of the English law of torts. Most torts undoubtedly are violations of rights in rem, because most rights in personam are created by contract. But there are rights in personam which are not contractual, and the violation of which, if it gives rise to an action for damages, must be classed as a tort. The refusal of an innkeeper to receive a guest is a tort, yet it is merely the breach of a noncontractual right in personam. So with any actionable refusal or neglect on the part of a public official to perform his statutory duties on behalf of the plaintiff.

John W. Salmond, Jurisprudence (1910) 437, note.

All civilized systems agree in drawing a distinction between offenses against the State or Community and offenses against the Individual, and the two classes of injuries, thus kept apart, I may here, without pretending that the terms have always been employed consistently in jurisprudence, call Crimes and Wrongs, crimina and delicta. Now the penal Law of ancient communities is not the law of Crimes; it is the law of Wrongs, or, to use the English technical word, of Torts. The person injured proceeds against the wrong-doer by an ordinary civil action, and recovers compensation in the shape of money damages if he succeeds. If the Commentaries of Gaius be opened at the place where the writer treats of the penal jurisprudence founded on the Twelve Tables, it will be seen that at the head of the civil Wrongs recognized by the Roman law stood Furtum or Theft. Offenses which we are accustomed to regard exclusively as crimes are exclusively treated as torts and not theft only, but assault and violent robbery, are associated by the jurisconsult with trespass, libel, and slander. * * * If, therefore, the criterion of a delict, wrong, or tort, be that the person who suffers it, and not the state, is conceived to be wronged, it may be asserted that in the infancy of jurisprudence, the citizen depends for protection against violence or fraud, not on the Law of Crime but on the Law of Tort.

Maine, Ancient Law (1884) 357, 359.

Torts are distinguished in the modern law from criminal offences. In the mediæval period the procedure whereby redress was obtained for many of the injuries now classified as torts bore plain traces of a criminal or quasi-criminal character, the defendant against whom judgment passed being liable not only to compensate the plaintiff, but to pay a fine to the king. Public and private law were, in truth, but imperfectly distinguished. In the modern law, however, it is settled that a tort, as such, is not a criminal offence. There are various acts which may give rise to a civil action of tort and to a criminal prosecution, or to the one or the other at the injured party's option; but the civil suit and the criminal prosecution belong to different jurisdictions, and are guided by different rules of procedure.

Sir Frederick Pollock, Law of Torts (1904) pp. 4, 5.[10]

[10] See, also, Holland's Jurisprudence, 319, 320: "The distinction between those wrongs which are generically called 'torts' and those which are called 'crimes' may at first sight appear to be a fine one. The same set of circumstances will, in fact, from one point of view constitute a tort, while from another point of view they amount to a crime. In the case, for instance, of assault, the right violated is that which every man has that his bodily safety shall be respected, and for the wrong done to this right the sufferer is entitled to get damages. But this is not all. The act of violence is a menace to the safety of society generally, and will therefore be punished by the State. So a libel is said to violate not only the right of an individual not to be defamed, but also the right of the State that no incentive shall be given to a breach of the peace. It is sometimes alleged by books of authority that the difference between a tort and a crime is a matter of procedure, the former being redressed by the civil, while the latter is punished by the criminal courts. But the distinction lies deeper, and is well expressed by Blackstone, who says that 'torts are an infringement or privation of the private, or civil rights belonging to individuals, considered as individuals; crimes are a breach of public rights and duties which affect the whole community, con-

In capital causes, in favorem vitæ, the law will not punish in so high a degree, except the malice of the will and the intention do appear; but in civil trespasses and injuries that are of an inferior nature, the law doth rather consider the damage of the party wronged, than the malice of him that was the wrong-doer.

And therefore the law makes a difference between killing a man upon malice forethought, and upon a present heat: but if I give a man slanderous words, whereby I damnify him in his name and credit, it is not material whether I use them upon sudden choler and provocation or of set malice; but in an action upon the case I shall render damages alike.

So if a man be killed by misadventure, as by an arrow at butts, this hath a pardon of course: but if a man be hurt or maimed only, an action of trespass lieth, though it be done against the party's mind and will, and he shall be punished in the same as deeply as if he had done it of malice.

So if a surgeon authorized to practice do, through negligence in his cure, cause the party to die, the surgeon shall not be brought in question of his life; and yet if he do only hurt the wound, whereby the cure is cast back and death ensues not, he is subject to an action upon the case for his misfeasance.

So if baron and feme be, and they commit felony together, the feme is neither principal nor accessory, in regard of her obedience to the will of her husband: but if baron and feme join in committing a trespass upon land or otherwise, the action may be brought against them both.

So if an infant within years of discretion, or a madman, kill another, he shall not be impeached thereof: but if he put out a man's eye, or do him like corporal hurt, he shall be punished in trespass.

Sir Francis Bacon, Maxims of the Law (1596) Regula VII, 14 Bacon's Works (Spedding's Ed.) 219.

The distinction of public wrongs from private, of crimes and misdemeanors from civil injuries, seems principally to consist in this: that private wrongs, or civil injuries, are an infringement or privation of the civil rights which belong to individuals, considered merely as individuals; public wrongs, or crimes and misdemeanors, are a breach and violation of the public rights and duties due to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity.

sidered as a community.' The right which is violated by a tort is always a different right from that which is violated by a crime. The person of inherence in the former case is an individual, in the latter case the State. In a French criminal trial there may accordingly appear not only the public prosecuter, representing the State and demanding the punishment of the offender, but also the injured individual, as 'partie civile,' asking for damages for the loss which he has personally sustained."

As, if I detain a field from another man, to which the law has given him a right, this is a civil injury, and not a crime; for here only the right of an individual is concerned, and it is immaterial to the public which of us is in possession of the land: but treason, murder, and robbery are properly ranked among crimes; since, besides the injury done to individuals, they strike at the very being of society, which cannot possibly subsist where actions of this sort are suffered to escape with impunity.

In all cases the crime includes an injury: every public offence is also a private wrong, and somewhat more; it affects the individual, and it likewise affects the community.[11] Thus, treason in imagining the king's death involves in it conspiracy against an individual, which is also a civil injury; but, as this species of treason, in its consequences, principally tends to the dissolution of government, and the destruction thereby of the order and peace of society, this denominates it a crime of the highest magnitude. Murder is an injury to the life of an individual; but the law of society considers principally the loss which the state sustains by being deprived of a member, and the pernicious example thereby set for others to do the like. Robbery may be considered in the same view: it is an injury to private property; but, were that all, a civil satisfaction in damages might atone for it; the public mischief is the thing for the prevention of which our laws have made it a capital offence. In these gross and atrocious injuries the private wrong is swallowed up in the public: we seldom hear any mention made of satisfaction to the individual, the satisfaction to the community being so very great. And indeed, as the public crime is not otherwise avenged than by forfeiture of life and property, it is impossible afterwards to make any reparation for the private wrong, which can only be had from the body or goods of the aggressor. But there are crimes of an inferior nature, in which the public punishment is not so severe but it affords room for a private compensation also; and herein the distinction of crimes from civil injuries is very apparent. For instance: in the case of battery, or beating another, the aggressor may be indicted for this at the suit of the king, for disturbing the public peace, and be punished criminally by fine and imprisonment; and the party beaten may also have his private remedy by action of trespass for the injury which he in particular sustains, and recover a civil satisfaction in damages. So also, in case of a public nuisance, as digging a ditch across a highway: this is punishable by indictment as a common offence to the whole kingdom and all his majesty's subjects; but if any individual sustains any special damage thereby, as laming his horse, breaking his carriage, or the like, the offender may be compelled to make ample satisfaction, as well for the private injury as for the public wrong.

[11] See Lord Mansfield's opinion in Rex v. Wheatly (1761) 2 Burr. 1126. This was an indictment against a brewer for fraudulently delivering "sixteen gallons and no more" of beer as and for eighteen gallons, the defendant "then and there well knowing the same liquor so by him sold and delivered to want two gallons of the due and just measure as aforesaid." The defendant being convicted, moved in arrest of judgment. Lord Mansfield: "The question is, whether the fact here alledged be an indictable crime or not. * * * The offence that is indictable must be such a one as affects the public. As if a man uses false weights and measures and sells by them to all or to many of his customers, or uses them in the general course of his dealing: so, if a man defrauds another, under false tokens. For these are deceptions that common care and prudence are not sufficient to guard against. So, if there be a conspiracy to cheat: for ordinary care and caution is no guard against this. Those cases are much more than mere private injuries: they are public offences. But here, it is a mere private imposition or deception: no false weights or measures are used; no false tokens given; no conspiracy; only an imposition upon the person he was dealing with, in delivering him a less quantity instead of a greater which the other carelessly accepted. It is only a non-performance of his contract: for which non-performance, he may bring his action. The selling an unsound horse, as and for a sound one, is not indictable: the buyer should be more upon his guard. The several cases cited are alone sufficient to prove, that the offence here charged is not an indictable offence. But besides these, my brother Denison informs me of another case, that has not been mentioned at the Bar. It was Mich. Term, 6 Geo. 1, B. R. Rex v. Wilders, a Brewer: he was indicted for a cheat, in sending in, to Mr. Hicks, an ale-house keeper, so many vessels of ale marked as containing such a measure, and writing a letter to Mr. Hicks, assuring him that they did contain that measure; when in fact they did not contain such measure, but so much less, etc. This indictment was quashed on argument, upon a motion: which is a stronger case than the present. Therefore the law is clearly established and settled; and I think on right grounds: but on whatever grounds it might have been originally established, yet it ought to be adhered to, after it is established and settled. Therefore (though I may be sorry for it in the present case, as circumstanced) the judgment must be arrested."

Upon the whole, we may observe that, in taking cognizance of all wrongs or unlawful acts, the law has a double view, viz.: not only to redress the party injured by either restoring to him his right, if possible, or by giving him an equivalent, * * * but also to secure to the public the benefit of society, by preventing or punishing every breach and violation of those laws which the sovereign power has thought proper to establish for the government and tranquillity of the whole.

Sir William Blackstone, Commentaries (1765) bk. 4, p. 5.

The distinction between civil and criminal wrongs depends on the nature of the appropriate remedy provided by law. A civil wrong is one which gives rise to civil proceedings—proceedings, that is to say, which have as their purpose the enforcement of some right claimed by the plaintiff as against the defendant: for example, an action for the recovery of a debt, or the restitution of property, or for the specific performance of a contract, or for an injunction against a threatened injury, or for the recovery of damages for an injury committed. Criminal proceedings, on the other hand, are those which have for their object the punishment of the defendant for some act of which he is accused. He who proceeds civilly is a claimant, demanding the enforcement of some right vested in himself; he who proceeds criminally is an accuser, demanding nothing for himself, but merely the punishment of the defendant for a wrong committed by him.

It is often the case that the same wrong is both civil and criminal—capable of being made the subject of proceedings of both kinds. Assault, libel, theft, and malicious injury to property, for example, are wrongs of this kind. Speaking generally, in all such cases the civil and criminal remedies are not alternative but concurrent, each being independent of the other. The wrongdoer may be punished criminally by imprisonment or otherwise, and also compelled in a civil action to make compensation or restitution to the injured person.[12]

John W. Salmond, Law of Torts (1910) 1, 2.

The duty, whatever else it may be, is a duty towards our neighbor. Breach of it will entitle some one to bring an action for redress. An offence punishable by the State may not create any such private right. If it does not, it is no civil wrong; and this is in fact the case with some of the gravest public offences. Also in cases of tort the duty that has been violated is general. It is owed either to all our fellow-subjects, or to some considerable class of them, and it is fixed by the law and the law alone. Here lies the difference between civil wrongs, properly so called, and breaches of contract. It is not right to break

[12] Frequently the tort and the crime bear the same name, yet with a difference. Compare, for instance, the crimes of "assault," "battery," "champerty," "conspiracy," "false imprisonment," "libel," "nuisance," "trespass" (see Mikell's Cas. Crim. Law, passim), with the torts of the same name, given infra.

But compare the following cases, in which substantially the same act was held to be a crime, but not a tort: Deaton v. State (1908) 53 Tex. Cr. R. 393, 110 S. W. 69, and Robertson v. Edelstein (1899) 104 Wis. 440, 80 N. W. 725 (D. had uttered violent and abusive but not defamatory language of P.).

Compare also the following, in which substantially the same act was held a tort but not a crime:

Whittington v. Gladwin (1826) 5 B. & C. 29 R. R. 211, and State v. McArthur (1893) 5 Wash. 558, 32 Pac. 367 (D. had orally imputed insolvency to P.)

Beach v. Hancock (1853) 27 N. H. 223, 59 Am. Dec. 373, and Chapman v. State (1884) 78 Ala. 463, Mikell's Cas. Crim. Law 296 (D. had pointed at P., in a threatening manner and within shooting distance, a gun which D. knew, but P did not know to be unloaded). But see, also, State v. Shepard (1859) 10 Iowa, 126; Com. v. White (1813) 110 Mass. 409; State v. Smith (1841) 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 457—where the act was deemed a crime.

Garrett v. State (1906) 49 Tex. Cr. R. 235, 91 S. W. 577, and Baseley v. Clarkson (1681) 3 Lev. 37 (D. had inadvertently entered upon the premises of P.).

Malcom v. Spoor (1847) 12 Metc. (Mass.) 279, 46 Am. Dec. 675, and Milton v. State (1898) 40 Fla. 251, 24 South. 60, Mikell's Cas. Crim. Law 186 (D., an officer, after entering P.'s property by authority of the law, abused the liberty which the law gave him: held, a tort [trespass ab initio] but not a crime).

one's contract, though in cases of honest error due to the parties' intentions not being clearly expressed or otherwise, or of innocent disability preventing performance, there may be legal liability without any moral blame. But breach of contract, wilful or not, is the breach of duties which the parties have fixed for themselves. Duties under a contract may have to be interpreted or supplemented by artificial rules of law, but they cannot be superseded while there is any contract in being. The duties broken by the commission of civil wrongs are fixed by law, and independent of the will of parties; and this is so even where they arise out of circumstances in which the responsible party's own act has placed him. Again, these general duties are different in other important respects from those which arise out of the domestic relations, although they agree with them in not depending on the will of the parties. For the mutual duties of husband and wife, parents and children, and the like, are strictly personal, and moreover only part of them can be or is dealt with at all by positive rules of law. Down to modern times they were regarded in this country as not belonging to the ordinary jurisdiction of temporal courts; marital and parental authority were incidentally recognised but matrimony and matrimonial causes were "spiritual" matters.

Sir Frederick Pollock, The Law of Torts (7th Ed.) 2.

No civil wrong is a tort, if it is exclusively the breach of a contract. The law of contracts stands by itself, as a separate department of our legal system, over against the law of torts; and to a large extent liability for breaches of contract and liability for torts are governed by different principles. It may well happen, however, that the same act is both a tort and a breach of contract, and this is so in at least two classes of cases.

(a) The first and simplest of these is that in which a man undertakes by contract the performance of a duty which lies on him already, independently of any contract. Thus he who refuses to return a borrowed chattel commits both a breach of contract and also the tort known as conversion: a breach of contract, because he promised expressly or impliedly to return the chattel; but not merely a breach of contract, and therefore also a tort, because he would have been equally liable for detaining another man's property, even if he had made no such contract at all.

(b) The second class of cases is one which involves considerable difficulty, and the law on this point cannot yet be said to have been thoroughly developed. In certain instances the breach of a contract made with one person creates liability towards another person, who is no party to the contract. It is a fundamental principle, indeed, that no person can sue on an obligatio ex contractu, except a party to the contract; nevertheless it sometimes happens that one person can sue ex delicto for the breach of a contract which was not made with him, but from the breach of which he has suffered unlawful damage. That is to say a man may take upon himself, by a contract with A., a duty which does not already or otherwise rest upon him, but which, when it has once been undertaken, he cannot break without doing such damage to B., a third person, as the law deems actionable. Thus, if X. lends his horse to Y., who delivers it to Z., a livery stablekeeper, to be looked after and fed, and the horse is injured or killed by insufficient feeding, presumably Z. is liable for this, not only in contract to Y., but also in tort to X., the owner of the horse. It is true that, apart from his contract with Y., Z. was under no obligation to feed the animal; apart from the contract, this was a mere omission to do an act which he was not bound to do. Yet having taken this duty upon himself, he has thereby put himself in such a situation that he cannot break the duty without inflicting on the owner of the horse damage of a kind which the law deems wrongful. The omission to feed the horse, therefore, although a breach of contract, is not exclusively such, and is therefore a tort, inasmuch as it can be sued on by a person who is no party to the contract.

TORTS AND THE COMMON LAW ACTION FOR DAMAGES

No civil injury is to be classed as a tort unless the appropriate remedy for it is an action for damages. Such an action is an essential characteristic of every true tort. * * * No civil injury is to be classed as a tort if it is merely a breach of trust or a breach of some other merely equitable obligation. The reason of this exclusion is historical only. The law of torts is in its origin a part of the common law, as distinguished from equity, and it was unknown to the Court of Chancery. Wrongs, therefore, such as breach of trust, which fell exclusively within the jurisdiction of that court, stand outside the category of tort, and are governed, just as the breach of contract is, by a body of special rules differing in sundry respects from those which have been developed by the common law of torts. And although at the present day the difference between equitable and common-law jurisdiction has disappeared, it is still requisite to preserve the memory of it in defining the limits of the law of torts.

John W. Salmond, Law of Torts (1910) 2, 5, 6.

The body of the act provides that "a married woman may maintain an action in her own name, and without joining her husband therein, for all torts committed against her, or her separate property, in the same manner as she lawfully might if a feme sole." * * * The word "torts" in legal phraseology has a well-defined meaning. It does not include all wrongful acts done by one person to the injury of another, but only those for which individuals may demand legal redress; or, stated in another way, those which give rise to an action for damages. Cooley on Torts, p. 2; Add. on Torts, p. 3. Substituting the definition of the word in place of the word itself, the statute provides that a married woman may maintain an action in her own name, and without joining her husband therein, for all wrongful acts which give rise to an action for damages committed against her or her separate property, in the same manner as she lawfully might if a feme sole. In our judgment no legislative intent is to be perceived, either in the title of this act or in its body, to confer upon a married woman any right of action which did not exist previous to its enactment. The defendants are entitled to judgment upon the demurrer.

Gummere, J., in Sims v. Sims (1909) 77 N. J. Law, 251, 72 Atl. 424.[13]

In addition to the remedy by action for damages in respect of torts which have actually been committed, there is, in certain cases, an ancillary remedy by way of injunction to prevent the commission of torts which are threatened or anticipated, or in cases of continuing injuries to restrain their continuance.

The principle upon which such injunction is granted is that the injury, if suffered to be inflicted, would be of such a character that the plaintiff could not practically be compensated in damages. In [13] Delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, 77 N. J. Law, 251, 72 Atl. 424. The action was by a married woman for the alienation of her husband's affections. The plaintiff based her right to sue upon the statute quoted in the text. On error (79 N. J. Law, 577, 76 Atl. 1063, 29 L. R. A. [N. S.] 842) the judgment of the Supreme Court was reversed, the Court of Errors and Appeals holding that the wife had at common law a legal right in such a case but that a rule of common law procedure stood in the way of its enforcement by her, and that the statute merely removed this obstacle.

Compare the ratio decidendi of this case and the following definitions or descriptions of a tort, found in standard treatises of to-day:

(1) "A tort may be described as a wrong independent of contract, for which the appropriate remedy is a common-law action." Clerk & Lindsell, Law of Torts (1906) 1.

(2) "A tort may be said to be a breach of duty established by municipal law for which a suit for damages can be maintained." Bigelow, Law of Torts (1907) 61.

(3) "A tort is an act or omission which unlawfully violates a person's right, created by the law, and for which the appropriate remedy is a common-law action for damages by the injured person." Burdick, Law of Torts (1908) 11.

(4) "A tort is a breach of duty (other than a contractual or quasi contractual duty) creating an obligation, and giving rise to an action for damages." J. C. Miles, Dig. Eng. Civ. Law (1908) § 722.

some cases the injunction takes a mandatory form, where the defendant has created a permanent source of injury, such as the erection of a building to the nuisance of the plaintiff's lights or to the obstruction of his right of way, and orders him to restore the plaintiff to his right by removing the offending building or other source of damage.

Clerk and Lindsell, Law of Torts (1906) 783.

In Edward I's day, at the end of the thirteenth century, three great courts have come into existence, the King's Bench, the Common Bench or Court of Common Pleas and the Exchequer. Each of these has its own proper sphere, but as time goes on each of them attempts to extend its sphere and before the middle ages are over a plaintiff has often a choice between these three courts and each of them will deal with his case in the same way and by the same rules. The law which these courts administer is in part traditional law, in part statute law. Already in Edward I's day the phrase "common law" is current. It is a phrase that has been borrowed from the canonists—who used "jus commune" to denote the general law of the Catholic Church; it describes that part of the law that is unenacted, non-statutory, that is common to the whole land and to all Englishmen. It is contrasted with statute, with local custom, with royal prerogative. It is not as yet contrasted with equity, for as yet there is no body of rules which bears this name.

One of the three courts, namely, the Exchequer, is more than a court of law. From our modern point of view it is not only a court of law but a "government office," an administrative or executive bureau; our modern Treasury is an offshoot from the old Exchequer. What we should call the "civil service" of the country is transacted by two great offices or "departments"; there is the Exchequer which is the fiscal department, there is the Chancery which is the secretarial department, while above these there rises the king's permanent Council. At the head of the Chancery stands the Chancellor, usually a bishop; he is we may say the king's secretary of state for all departments, he keeps the king's great seal and all the already great mass of writing that has to be done in the king's name has to be done under his supervision.

He is not as yet a judge, but already he by himself or his subordinates has a great deal of work to do which brings him into a close connexion with the administration of justice. One of the duties of that great staff of clerks over which he presides is to draw up and issue those writs whereby actions are begun in the courts of law—such writs are sealed with the king's seal. A man who wishes to begin an action must go to the Chancery and obtain a writ. Many writs there are which have been formulated long ago; such writs are writs of course (brevia de cursu), one obtains them by asking for them of the clerks—called Cursitors—and paying the proper fees. But the Chancery has a certain limited power of inventing new writs to meet new cases as they arise. That power is consecrated by a famous clause of the Second Statute of Westminster authorising writs "in consimili casu." Thus the Chancellor may often have to consider whether the case is one in which some new and some specially worded writ should be framed. This however is not judicial business. The Chancellor does not hear both sides of the story, he only hears the plaintiff's application, and if he grants a writ the courts of law may afterwards quash that writ as being contrary to the law of the land.

But by another route the Chancellor is brought into still closer contact with the administration of justice. Though these great courts of law have been established there is still a reserve of justice in the king. Those who can not get relief elsewhere present their petitions to the king and his council praying for some remedy. Already by the end of the thirteenth century the number of such petitions presented in every year is very large, and the work of reading them and considering them is very laborious. In practice a great share of this labour falls on the Chancellor. He is the king's prime minister, he is a member of the council, and the specially learned member of the council. It is in dealing with these petitions that the Chancellor begins to develop his judicial powers. * * *

We ought not to think of common law and equity as of two rival systems. Equity was not a self-sufficient system, at every point it presupposed the existence of common law. Common law was a self-sufficient system. I mean this: that if the legislature had passed a short act saying "Equity is hereby abolished," we might still have got on fairly well; in some respects our law would have been barbarous, unjust, absurd, but still the great elementary rights, the right to immunity from violence, the right to one's good name, the rights of ownership and of possession would have been decently protected and contract would have been enforced. On the other hand had the legislature said, "Common law is hereby abolished," this decree if obeyed would have meant anarchy. At every point equity presupposed the existence of common law. Take the case of the trust. It's of no use for Equity to say that A is a trustee of Blackacre for B, unless there be some court that can say that A is the owner of Blackacre. Equity without common law would have been a castle in the air, an impossibility.

For this reason I do not think that any one has expounded or ever will expound equity as a single, consistent system, an articulate body of law. It is a collection of appendixes between which there is no very close connexion. If we suppose all our law put into systematic order, we shall find that some chapters of it have been copiously glossed by equity, while others are quite free from equitable glosses. Since the destruction of the Star Chamber we have had no criminal equity. The Court of Chancery kept very clear of the province of crime, and since the province of crime and the province of tort overlap, it kept very clear of large portions of the province of tort. For example, before 1875 it would grant no injunction to restrain the publication of a libel, for normally the libel which is a tort is also a crime and it was thought, and rightly thought, that such a matter should not be brought before a court where a judge without any jury tried both fact and law. Indeed if you will look at your books on tort you will find that on the whole—if we except the province of fraud—equity has had little to do with tort, though it has granted injunctions to restrain the commission of nuisances and the like. The law of contract has been more richly provided with equitable appendixes. The power of the Chancery to compel specific performance, and its power to decree the cancellation or rectification of agreements brought numerous cases of contract before it, and then it had special doctrines about mortgages, and penalties, and stipulations concerning time. Property law was yet more richly glossed. One vast appendix was added to it under the title of trusts. The bond which kept these various appendixes together under the head of Equity was the jurisdictional and procedural bond. All these matters were within the cognizance of courts of equity, and they were not within the cognizance of the courts of common law. That bond is now broken by the Judicature Acts. Instead of it we find but a mere historical bond—"these rules used to be dealt with by the Court of Chancery"—and the strength of that bond is being diminished year by year. The day will come when lawyers will cease to inquire whether a given rule be a rule of equity or a rule of common law: suffice it that it is a well-established rule administered by the High Court of Justice. * * *

A very large part of the whole province of Tort is a proper field for the injunction.[14] I should say that the only torts which lie outside the field of injunctions are assault and battery, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution. I do not think that an injunction has been used or could be used to prevent these torts, which if they be torts will also at least in most cases be crimes. Here there are other remedies. If you go in fear of a man you can have him bound over to keep the peace, while if you are wrongfully imprisoned the writ of habeas corpus with its rapid procedure should serve your turn. A civil court, again, must not prohibit a man from instituting criminal proceedings. The Attorney-General's nolle prosequi should be a sufficient preventive check on criminal proceedings of an obviously vexatious kind. But with these exceptions it would be hard to find a tort which might not in a given case be a proper subject for an injunction. Of libel I have already spoken, and something I have said of trespass and of waste. It was the Chancery's power of issuing injunctions against acts of waste that begot the doctrine of equitable waste. Sometimes the Chancery would give an injunction against waste for which a Court of Law would give no damages. Nuisance is a fertile field, so is the infringement of copyright, of patents, of trade marks. Indeed there are many rights which are chiefly, though not solely, protected by an injunction—the remedy by action for damages being but a poor one. Damages and injunction are not, you will understand, alternative remedies—in old times you could get the one from the Courts of Common Law, the other from the Court of Equity; now-a-days you may well get both from the same court, the same division of the court in the same action, damages to compensate you for wrong suffered, and an injunction to prevent a continuance of the wrong, it may be a mandatory injunction to prevent the continued existence of a wrongful state of things. But while the remedy by damages is a matter of strict right, the remedy by injunction is not. This is best seen by referring to the cases in which a plaintiff can recover nominal damages. He has not really been hurt; he has not been made the poorer; but still his rights have been infringed and the court pronounces a judgment in his favour. But the court will not interfere by injunction where the tort complained of, though a tort, is one which does no real damage, and it will not interfere by injunction if damages will clearly be an adequate remedy. Then again it may consider the plaintiff's conduct, and in particular any delay of his in bringing the action. To an action for damages delay is no defence unless the case has been brought within one of the Statutes of Limitation. Either the plaintiff still is entitled to the remedy or it has been taken from him by a statute, and you can fix the precise moment of time at which the statute takes effect—one moment he has a remedy, the next moment he has none. It is not so with the injunction; the court may well hold for example that my neighbour must pay me damages for having blocked out light from my ancient windows, and yet, as I stood by and let him build, it would be inequitable to compel him to pull down his wall. Especially when a mandatory injunction is to be sought, the plaintiff must at once take action and prosecute his action diligently. The court, it is said, in granting a mandatory injunction may look at the balance of convenience. The defendant is by supposition in the wrong, but on the whole and considering the conduct of both parties, shall we not be inflicting on him more harm than he deserves if we compel him to pull down his wall?

[14] In the thirteenth edition of Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 873 (1886), the following are enumerated among the principal objects of an injunction: "To restrain waste, to restrain nuisances, to restrain trespasses, and to prevent other irreparable mischiefs."

F. W. Maitland, Equity, 2, 19, 261 (1910).*

*The "province of Tort as a proper field for the injunction" is developed in Chapter IV, pages 798-1136, "Injunction in Relation to Torts," in Professor Boke's Cases on Equity.

CLASSIFICATION OF TORTS

The older books treat the different specific torts under the heads of the different forms of action. Our present doctrine is apparently coming to a view of torts as an individual branch of the law, but it has not yet settled upon a general principle of division applicable to all specific torts. As a result, the current classifications of torts are many and varied. But since the broad generalization by Mr. Justice Blackburn, in Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Ex. 265, when that famous case was in the Exchequer-Chamber, nearly a half century ago, there has been authority for a distribution of torts into two main categories. The characteristic of the torts in the first category is that the duty which the law casts upon the defendant is an absolute duty to do or to refrain from doing a certain thing. Here the defendant's act is an act at peril—an act of absolute liability. The plaintiff's prima facie cause is complete with a showing of the defendant's act, except that in some cases, although not regularly in the older torts in this class, actual damage resulting from the act must be shown.

In the second class the defendant's liability does not turn on the mere question whether he has done or omitted to do a certain thing. The defendant may have acted, and harm may have come to the plaintiff as the proximate result of this act, but his prima facie cause is not complete unless something further appears in the defendant's act.

The nature and extent of this additional element are not yet fully determined. Perhaps, all its aspects cannot be exactly marked until the doctrine of torts has ceased to grow. But in general, as the cases now stand, the torts which turn upon an act of conditional liability show two markedly different classes, first, torts in which the plaintiff, in order to show a prima facie case, must allege and prove negligence on the part of the defendant, and, secondly, torts in which, to show his prima facie case, the plaintiff must allege and prove an act, in some form, of intentional harm by the defendant.

The classification then which will be used in the following pages, as a setting for the cases on the elements of the specific torts, will be primarily two-fold: (1) Torts through Acts of Absolute Liability; (2) Torts through Acts of Conditional Liability. The torts within the first category fall into various groups which may be roughly classified as Trespasses and Absolute Torts other than Trespasses. The second category has the two main divisions already indicated, Torts through Negligence, and Torts through Act of Intentional Harm.[15]—[Ed.

Working classifications will be found in Pollock on Torts (8th Ed.) 7; Clerk & Lindsell's Law of Torts (3d Ed.) 7; Bigelow on Torts (8th Ed.) 35; Jaggard on Torts, 107. Rev. 652, 663, afterwards developed in "The Common Law" (1881); Piggott's Law of Torts (1885) 382; Innes' Principles of the Law of Torts (1891) xxxii, p. 146; Wigmore's General Analysis of Tort Relations (1895) 8 Harv. Law Rev. 377; Salmond's Jurisprudence (1910) 339.

In Fletcher v. Rylands the question was put in this form: "The plaintiff, though free from all blame on his part, must bear the loss, unless he can establish that it was the consequence of some default for which the defendants are responsible. The question of law therefore arises, what is the obligation which the law casts on a person who, like the defendants, lawfully brings on his land something which, though harmless whilst it remains there, will naturally do mischief if it escape out of his land. It is agreed on all hands that he must take care to keep in that which he has brought on the land and keeps there, in order that it may not escape and damage his neighbors, but the question arises whether the duty which the law casts upon him, under such circumstances, is an absolute duty to keep it in at his peril, or is, as the majority of the Court of Exchequer have thought, merely a duty to take all reasonable and prudent precautions, in order to keep it in, but no more. If the first be the law, the person who has brought on his land and kept there something dangerous, and failed to keep it in, is responsible for all the natural consequences of its escape. If the second be the limit of his duty, he would not be answerable except on proof of negligence, and consequently would not be answerable for escape arising from any latent defect which ordinary prudence and skill could not detect." PART I

TORTS THROUGH ACTS OF ABSOLUTE LIABILITY

CHAPTER I

TRESPASSES

SECTION 1.—TRESPASSES IN GENERAL

I. Historical

With the punishable offence we contrast the "tort" which gives rise to a civil action, though the tort may also be, and very often is, a punishable offence. Torts again fall into two classes, and only those which involve some violence—the violence may be exceedingly small—are known as trespasses.

In the thirteenth century we see but the germs of this scheme. "Trespass" ("transgressio") is the most general term that there is; it will cover all or almost all wrongful acts and defaults. Every felony, says Bracton, is a trespass, though every trespass is not a felony. In a narrower sense therefore "trespass" is used as a contrast to "felony." The word "misdemeanor" belongs as a term of art to a much later age. * * *

The writs of trespass are closely connected with the appeals for felony. The action of trespass is, we may say, an attenuated appeal. The charge of "felonia" is omitted; no battle is offered; but the basis of the action is a wrong done to the plaintiff in his body, his goods or his land "by force and arms and against the king's peace." In course of time these sonorous words will become little better than a hollow sound; there will be a trespass with force and arms if a man's body, goods or land have been unlawfully touched. From this we may gather that the court had never taken very seriously the "arms" of the writ or fixed a minimum for the "force" that would beget an action. Still the action was aimed at serious breaches of the king's peace, and, so far as we can see, the court in Henry III.'s reign was seldom, if ever, troubled with "technical trespasses" or claims for "nominal damages." * * *

In the days when the writ of trespass was taking a foremost place in the scheme of actions, the king's court had its hands full if it was to redress and punish the wrongs done by gentlemen who at the head of armed bands of retainers ravaged the manors of their neighbors. We must not therefore expect to find cases which indicate the limits of trespass. We may guess that some self-defence was permissible, while all self-help, unless it took the form of the timely ejectment of a disseisor, was strictly prohibited. Also we may guess that this somewhat terrible action could not have been used against those who were not to be charged with any assault on a person, entry on land or asportation of goods, but were guilty of some misfeasance while engaged in a lawful operation. In later days, slowly and with difficulty, the court gave an action against the clumsy smith who lames the horse that he is shoeing, against the stupid surgeon who poisons the wound that he should cure. Such persons could not be charged with breaking the king's peace by force and arms.

[1] "All civil injuries are of two kinds, the one without force or violence, as slander or breach of contract; the other coupled with force and violence, as batteries or false imprisonment. Which latter species savor something of the criminal kind, being always attended with some violation of the peace; for which in strictness of law a fine ought to be paid to the king, as well as a private satisfaction to the party injured." 3 Bl. Com. (1765) 118, 119.

"The recorded instances of trespass in the royal courts prior to 1252 are very few. In the 'Abbreviatio Placitorum' some twenty-five cases of appeals of different kinds are mentioned, belonging to the period 1194–1252, but not a single case of trespass. In the year 37 Henry III. (1252–1253) no fewer than twenty-five cases of trespass are recorded, and from this time on the action is frequent, while appeals are rarely brought. It is reasonable to suppose that the writ of trespass was at first granted as a special favor, and became, soon after the middle of the fourteenth century, a writ of course.

"The introduction of this action was a very simple matter. An original writ issued out of Chancery directing the sheriff to attach the defendant to appear in the King's Bench to answer the plaintiff. The jurisdiction of the King's Court was based upon the commission of an act vi et armis and contra pacem regis, for which the unsuccessful defendant had to pay a fine. These words were therefore invariably inserted in the declaration. Indeed, the count in trespass was identical with the corresponding appeal, except that it omitted the offer of battle, concluded with an ad damnum clause, and substituted the words "vi et armis" for the words of felony,—"feloniter," "felonice," "in felonia," or "in robberia." The count in the appeal was doubtless borrowed from the ancient count in the popular or communal courts, the words of felony and "contra pacem regis" being added to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the royal courts.

"The procedure of the King's Courts was much more expeditious than that of the popular courts, the trial was by jury instead of by wager of law, and judgment was satisfied by levy of execution and sale of the defendant's property, whereas in the popular courts distress and outlawry were the limits of the plaintiff's rights. As an appeal might be brought for the theft of any chattel worth 12d. or more, and as the owner now had an option to bring trespass where an appeal would lie, there was danger that the royal courts would be encumbered with a mass of petty litigation. To meet this threatened evil the Statute 6 Ed. I. c. 8, was passed, providing that no one should have writs of trespass before justices unless he swore by his faith that the goods taken away were worth 40s. at the least."

James Barr Ames, "The History of Trover," 11 Harv. Law Rev. 277, 282; 3 Anglo-Amer. Legal Essays, 417, 422.

The writ of trespass was fast coming into use in the course of Henry III.'s reign. During the twenty-two years between the middle of the century and his death it became common. We think of an action of trespass nowadays as a purely civil remedy, a means of recovering damages if the plaintiff succeeds; and that was no doubt its main object and advantage even from the first. But it was also a penal and semi-criminal proceeding, and preserved traces of this character down to modern times. The trespass was complained of and dealt with as a punishable breach of the king's peace, and the plaintiff was bound to allege force and arms and breach of the peace in order to give the king's court jurisdiction; without those words it was only a matter for the county court. In fact this action was, in its original form, closely connected with the distinctly criminal procedure by way of "appeal" for felony. One might almost regard it, using the analogy of modern French procedure, as the civil side of such an appeal, which became separated by some ingenious experiment or happy accident, and started on a new career of its own.

Sir Frederick Pollock, "The King's Peace," 13 H. L. R. 177, 185; 2 Legal Essays, 403, 412.

In their determination to win all litigation for the king's courts, the royal justices, at the very end of this period, invented or adopted a new writ, destined to be of enormous importance in all branches of our law. This was the Writ of Trespass, which makes its appearance in the middle of the thirteenth century, just at the outbreak of the Barons' War. Doubtless, in those troubled times, offences of violence were unusually frequent; whilst the old methods of redress only tended to aggravate the disorder. The notion of the "peace" or suspension of hostilities was very familiar in theory; whatever its rarity in practice. And, of all "peaces" the peace of the king was the most powerful and best protected. If the royal officials could once establish the rule, that any interference with possession, however slight, was a breach of the king's peace, and subjected the offender to be summoned before the king's justices, the ultimate triumph of the royal courts was secure. With a little ingenious straining, almost any offence known in a simple state of society could be treated as a breach of the peace. The notion of the sanctity of possession had, as has been seen, been growing by means of the protection afforded to "seisin" by the "petty (or 'possessory') assises" and the Writs of Entry. But the notion of seisin was becoming technical. It was, for special reasons, gradually being restricted to the possession of land (as distinct from chattels), and of land by a freeholder, or a man who claimed as such. Moreover, the notion of "diseisin" was held to imply a deliberate attempt to assert a right of possession. Something simpler was wanted—some process which should make a mere casual raid or blow punishable by sharp and speedy process in the royal courts.

This is exactly what the Writ of Trespass did, as the following form will show:

If A. gives pledges to prosecute his complaint, then put B. by gage and pledge that he (B.) be before our Justices at Westminster (on such a day) prepared to show why with force and arms he assaulted the said A. at N. (or broke the close of A. at N., or took and carried away the sheep of A.) and other enormities to him did, to the grave damage of the said A., and against our peace. * * *

It [the Writ of Trespass] aimed originally and, to some extent, aims still, at punishment, rather than compensation—at fine and imprisonment, rather than "damages" in the modern sense. It was not long before English Law took the one step needed to produce the modern scheme of legal remedies. And when it did, it used the Writ of Trespass as the starting point.

II. Jurisdictional Features of a Cause in Trespass

INCLEDON v. BURGESS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1688. 2 Salk. 636, 91 Reprint, 536.)

Trespass for breaking, entering, and depasturing, 36 Car. 2, continuando the depasturing till 4 Jac. 2, contra pacem domini Regis nunc, which was K. James the Second. This was held naught, for then there is no contra pacem to the trespass tempore Caroli Secundi, but it is omitted, and contra pacem is substance. Vide Cro. Car. 325; Cro. Jac. 426, 443, 537.

[2] "The king's courts were approaching the field of tort through the field of crime"; in the closing years of the seventeenth century, the unsuccessful defendant in a civil action of trespass is nominally still a criminal. The preamble of the statute of 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 12 (1694), runs thus: "Whereas there are divers suits and actions of trespass, ejectment, assault, and false imprisonment, brought by party against party in the respective courts of law at Westminster, and upon judgment entered against the defendant or defendants in such suits or actions, the respective courts aforesaid do (ex officio) issue out process against such defendant and defendants, for a fine to the crown, for a breach of the peace thereby committed, which is not ascertained, but is usually compounded for a small sum of money by some officer in each of the said courts, but never estreated into the Exchequer; which officers or some of them, do very often outlaw the defendants for the same, to their very great damage." For this fine the statute substitutes a fee of 6s. and 8d., to be paid by the plaintiff and taxed as costs against the defendant.—[Ed.

WILDGOOSE v. KELLAWAY.

(Court of King's Bench, 1691. 2 Salk. 636, 91 Reprint, 537.)

Trespass for breaking his house and taking away his dishes; the defendant justified under a by-law, but that being ill, the plaintiff demurred; but the defendant took exception to the declaration, because it wanted the words "vi et armis"; and the court held it naught on a general demurrer, being an omission of the substance; for it alters the judgment from a capiatur to a misericordia. Item, it belongs to the jurisdiction of the County Court, if it be a trespass without vi et armis.

DAND v. SEXTON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1789. 3 Term R. 37, 100 Reprint, 442.)

This was an action of trespass vi et armis for beating the plaintiff's dog, whereby the dog was hurt, and the plaintiff lost the use of him. The defendant pleaded the general issue. On the trial the plaintiff recovered 1s. damages; and Lord Kenyon, Ch. J., certified under the 43 Eliz. c. 6,[3] that the damages were under 40s.

Shepherd moved last term for a rule to shew cause why the certificate should not be set aside, on the ground that the statute only applied to those actions which could be brought in the County Court, and that of course it did not extend to an action vi et armis. And a case of Delamotte v. Dixon [4] was cited, in which Buller, J., under an idea that the statute had been understood to be thus confined, refused to grant a certificate.

Lord KENYON, Ch. J. It seems to me that this case comes within the statute, which extends to all personal actions, not being for any title of lands, nor for any battery. And, on the maxim exceptio probat regulam, it includes all other actions vi et armis. It is true indeed that an action vi et armis cannot be brought in a County Court; but there are other Inferior Courts which by charter have a power of trying actions vi et armis. But, as some of the Judges have entertained doubts upon the question, take a rule to shew cause.

[3] By this statute, passed in 1601, it was provided that "If upon any action personal to be brought in any of her Majesty's Courts at Westminster, not being for any title or interest of lands, nor concerning the free hold or inheritance of any lands nor for any battery, it shall appear to the judges for the same court, and so signified or set down by the justices before whom the same shall be tried, that the debt or damages to be recovered therein in the same court, shall not amount to the sum of forty shillings or above," then the judges should not award for costs to the plaintiff any greater sum than "the debt or damages so recovered shall amount unto."

[4] Sittings after Mich., 27 Geo. III, B. R.

Cause was to have been shewn this day, but the Court were extremely clear, on the authorities of Walker v. Robinson, 1 Wils. 93, White v. Smith, 1 Wils. 94, and Bartlet v. Robins, 2 Wils. 258, that the statute extended to the present cases; and they Discharged the rule.

E. III. Characteristics of a Cause in Trespass

I. DE S. and WIFE v. W. DE S.

(At the Assizes, Coram Thorpe, C. J., 1348 or 1349. Y. B. Lib. Ass. fol. 99, pl. 60.)

I. De S. & M. uxor ejus querunt de W. De S. de eo quod idem W. anno, etc., vi et armis, etc., apud S., in ipsam M. insultum fecit, et ipsam verberavit, etc. And W. pleaded not guilty. And it was found by verdict of the inquest that the said W. came in the night to the house of the said I., and would have bought some wine, but the door of the tavern was closed; and he pounded on the door with a hatchet, which he had in his hand, and the female plaintiff put her head out at a window and told him to stop; and he saw her and aimed at her with the hatchet, but did not hit her. Whereupon the inquest said that it seemed to them that there was no trespass, since there was no harm done.

Thorpe, C. J. There is harm done, and a trespass for which they shall recover damages, since he made an assault upon the woman, as it is found, although he did no other harm. Wherefore tax his damages, etc. And they taxed the damages at half a mark. Thorpe, C. J., awarded that they should recover their damages, etc., and that the other should be taken. Et sic nota, that for an assault one shall recover damages.[5]

NORVELL v. THOMPSON.

(Court of Appeals of South Carolina, 1834. 2 Hill, 470.)

The presiding judge made the following report:

Trespass quare clausum fregit. The trespass was committed on the woodlands of the plaintiffs, and consisted in cutting a few saplings and bushes along an old path, in order to open it sufficiently for the passage of wagons, carts, etc. The defendant supposed the land belonged to another person, to whom he applied for permission and obtained it, both being under a misapprehension as to the plaintiffs' line. None of the witnesses could venture to assess the value of the timber cut, or estimate the damage. I instructed the jury if there were actually no damage done, or if it were so inconsiderable that it could not be estimated, as the defendant set up no claim to the land, and supposed he had permission of the real owner, they might find a verdict for the defendant; and they did so.

The plaintiffs gave notice of an appeal in this case, and that they would move the Court of Appeals for a new trial, on the following grounds:

1. Because a trespass having been proven, the verdict could not legally be for the defendant.

2. Because his honor was mistaken in law, in charging the jury that where the trespass was very small they might find for defendant.

HARPER, J. This is a very unimportant case, but in strictness of law I suppose the plaintiffs are entitled to their motion. If a trespass be proved, the plaintiffs are entitled to some damages, though they may be merely nominal. Some damage was certainly proved, though very trifling. In some cases, where the jury has been rightly instructed on the point of law, but in cases of very trifling trespass has thought proper to find for the defendant, this Court, being satisfied that substantial justice was done, has refused to interfere. But this is the privilege of the jury. The Court is bound to afford relief against an erroneous instruction by the Court on a point of law. There is something in the reasoning of the plaintiffs' counsel. No trespass can be conceived more trifling than the mere passing over the unclosed land of another, and it would be impossible to estimate the damage resulting from a particular act of this sort. Yet, if no recovery could be had in a case of this sort, the trespasser, by repetition of the act and the lapse of time, might acquire the right of way, in spite of anything that could be done to prevent it.

The motion is granted.

SMITH v. STONE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1648. Style, 65, 82 Reprint, 533.)

Smith brought an action of trespasse against Stone pedibus ambulando, the defendant pleads this speciall plea in justification, viz. that he was carryed upon the land of the plaintiff by force, and violence of others, and was not there voluntarily, which is the same trespasse, for which the plaintiff brings his action. The plaintiff demurs to this plea: in this case Roll Iustice said, that it is the trespasse of the party that carryed the defendant upon the land, and not the trespasse of the defendant: as he that drives my cattel into another mans land is the trespassor against him, and not I who am the owner of the cattell.

GILBERT v. STONE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1648. Style, 72, 82 Reprint, 539.)

Gilbert brought an action of trespasse quare clausum fregit, and taking of a gelding, against Stone. The defendant pleads that he for fear of his life, and wounding of twelve armed men, who threatened to kill him if he did not the fact, went into the house of the plaintiff, and took the gelding. The plaintiff demurred to this plea; Roll Iustice, This is no plea to justify the defendant; for I may not do a trespasse to one for fear of threatenings of another, for by this means the party injured shall have no satisfaction, for he cannot have it of the party that threatened. Therefore let the plaintiff have his judgment.[6]

GIBBONS v. PEPPER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1694. 4 Mod. 405, 87 Reprint, 469.)

Assault and battery. The defendant pleaded, that he was riding on a horse in the highway, and that on a sudden fright the horse started and run upon the plaintiff, who continued in the way after he was called to go out, which was the same assault. To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

It was moved in behalf of the defendant, that what he had pleaded was a sufficient excuse; for it was no neglect in him, and the mischief done was inevitable. It is like the case of Weaver v. Ward,

[6] In the case of The Eliza Lines (1905) 199 U. S. 119, 130, 26 Sup. Ct. 8, 50 L. Ed. 115, 4 Ann. Cas. 406, it was argued that for a crew to leave a ship under stress of perils of the sea was not distinguishable in principle from being torn bodily away from it by the tempest. "This," said Mr. Justice Holmes, "is one of the oldest fallacies of the law. The difference between the two is the difference between an act and no act. The distinction is well settled in the parallel instance of duress by threats, as distinguished from overmastering physical force applied to a man's body and imparting to it the motion sought to be attributed to him. In the former case there is a choice and therefore an act, no less when the motive commonly is recognized as very strong or even generally overpowering, than when it is one that would affect the particular person only, and not the public at large. It has been held on this ground that duress created by fear of immediate death did not excuse a trespass. Gilbert v. Stone, Aleyn, 35, Style, 72; Scott v. Shepherd (1763) 2 W. Bl. 892, 896. See Miller v. Horton (1891) 152 Mass. 540, 547, 26 N. E. 100, 10 L. R. A. 116, 23 Am. St. Rep. 850. It has been held that a similar plea in the case of shipwrecked men at sea did not prevent the killing of one of them from being murder. Queen v. Dudley (1884) L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 273. See United States v. Holmes (1842) 1 Wall. Jr. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 15,383. It is clear that a contract induced by such fear is voidable only, not void, and that the ground of avoidance being like fraud, that the party has been subjected to an improper motive for action, when that motive has been created by a stranger, and is unknown to the party, the contract stands. Keilwey, 154a, pl. 3; Fairbanks v. Snow (1887) 145 Mass. 153, 13 N. E. 596, 1 Am. St. Rep. 446. So a conveyance induced by duress is operative until avoided, and can not be set aside when the property has passed to a purchaser without notice. Bainbrigge v. Browne (1881) L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 188, 197; 2 Wms. Vend. & P. 767; Clark v. Pease (1860) 41 N. H. 414. The distinction is as old as the Roman law. Tamen coactus volui. D. 4, 2. 21, § 5; 1 Windscheid, Pandekten, § 80."

See also an early application of the principle, in English law, in Y. B. 20 Edw. IV (1481) f. 11, pl. 10, an action of trespass because the defendant's cattle came upon the plaintiff's land, in an effort to escape from the dogs of a third person. The prima facie trespass here was admitted and the question before the court was whether the facts if pleaded would make a defense—a question which a chief justice of Edward the Fourth's reign answered in the negative.

Hobart, 134, where in trespass, assault, and battery, the defendant pleaded, that he was a trained soldier, and that he and the plaintiff were under one captain, and in mustering he discharged his gun, which casualiter, et per infortunium, et contra voluntatem suam, did hurt the plaintiff; and it was there held, that if the defendant had pleaded that he could not have avoided it, or that the plaintiff had run across the gun when it was discharging, or had set forth the circumstances so that it might appear to the Court to be inevitable, that such a plea had been a sufficient justification.

But it was answered, that case was not parallel with this, because the fact was confessed there; but the battery is not answered here. He should have pleaded the general issue, for if the horse run away against his will, he would have been found not guilty, because in such a case, it cannot be said with any colour of reason to be a battery in the rider.[7]

The plaintiff had judgment.

GREGORY v. PIPER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1829. 9 Barn. & C. 591, 109 Reprint, 220, 33 R. R. 268, 17 E. C. L. 266.)

Trespass for casting rubbish against the plaintiff's wall. Plea, not guilty. At the trial it appeared that the plaintiff occupied a public-house called the "Rising Sun," in Newmarket, with a stable-yard belonging to it, where he put up the horses of his guests. The way to the stable was by the back gate from High Street, through a yard called the Old King's Yard. A wall belonging to the plaintiff separated his stable yard from the Old King's Yard. The defendant having purchased the property surrounding the Old King's Yard, disputed the plaintiff's right to pass along the same to his stable, and employed one Stubbings, a labourer, to lay down a quantity of rubbish, consisting of bricks, mortar, stones, and dirt, near the plaintiff's stable-yard, in order to obstruct the way; and Stubbings, on the 26th of April, and several days following, laid down rubbish accordingly, part of which rolled against the plaintiff's wall and gates. It lay about two feet high against the plaintiff's wall for about five or six yards in length. Stubbings being called as a witness on the part of the plaintiff, stated that he was employed by the defendant to lay rubbish in the yard; that the defendant had given him orders not to let any rubbish touch the plaintiff's wall, that he executed those orders as nearly as he could, and accordingly laid the rubbish at first at the distance of a yard and a half from the wall; and that the rubbish, being of a loose kind, as it became dry naturally shingled down toward and ran against the wall. He added that some of it would of course run against the wall. It further appeared that on the 3rd of May, when an application was made by the plaintiff to the defendant to remove the rubbish, the latter said he was determined not to remove it. Upon this evidence it was objected by the defendant that trespass was not maintainable, inasmuch as the defendant had given express orders to the servant not to let the rubbish touch the plaintiff's wall; that, therefore, the touching of the wall was occasioned by the negligence of the defendant's servant, and that case, not trespass, was therefore maintainable.

The Lord Chief Baron directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, but reserved liberty to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. A rule nisi was obtained for that purpose.

Bayley, J. The only question is whether the trespass was the act of the master. The master desired the servant to lay down the rubbish so as not to let it touch or lean against the wall of the plaintiff. But if in execution of the order it was the necessary or natural consequence of the act ordered to be done that the rubbish should go against the wall, the master is answerable in trespass. The evidence shews that it was the natural consequence. The rule must, therefore, be discharged.

Parke, J. I think that the defendant is liable in this form of action. If a single stone had been put against the wall it would have been sufficient. Independently of Stubbing's evidence there was sufficient evidence to satisfy the jury that the rubbish was placed there by the defendant, for he expressed his determination not to remove it. It does not rest there. Stubbings said he was desired not to let the rubbish touch the wall. But it appeared to be of a loose kind, and it was probable that some of it naturally might run against the wall. Stubbings said that some of it of course would go against the wall. Now the defendant must be taken to have contemplated all the probable consequences of the act which he had ordered to be done, and one of these probable consequences was, that the rubbish would touch the plaintiff's wall. If that was so, then the laying of the rubbish against the wall was as much the defendant's act as if it had been done by his express command. The defendant, therefore, was the person who caused the act to be done, and for the necessary or natural consequence of his own act he is responsible as a trespasser.

Rule discharged.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1855. 7 Ind. 317.)

DAVISON, J. Trespass. The complaint is that the defendant's cattle broke and entered the plaintiffs' close and destroyed their corn. Verdict for the defendant. New trial refused and judgment.

It appeared that in January, 1852, the defendant was the owner of three hundred and eighteen head of cattle, from three to four years old, and had rented from Page, one of the plaintiffs, a stock field for pasture, which was inclosed by an indifferent fence; that the cattle were pastured in this field in the day time, and there watched by Peter and Thomas Kennedy, who were employed by the defendant to take care of them, but at night they were put into a stubble field furnished by Page, which was inclosed by a good fence, such as careful husbandmen generally keep; that the corn field, in which the trespasses were committed, belonged jointly to the plaintiffs, and adjoined the stubble field in which the cattle were kept in the night time; that the Kennedys went round this field every evening, saw that the fences were up and that the rails which the cattle had knocked off the night before were all put up again; and that on a stormy night, a few days after the cattle had been at Page's, they broke through the fence from the stubble field into the plaintiffs' corn field and destroyed a quantity of their corn. Upon the trial, there was evidence sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the cattle were not breachy; that they were carefully attended by the defendant's employés; and that on his part there was no want of care.

There is in the record a bill of exceptions, which shows that the Court instructed the jury as follows:

1. If the defendant exercised all the attention and care over the cattle that was necessary, in their situation, to keep that number of cattle from trespassing or breaking the inclosure, and was guilty of no wrongful act or omission of duty in the premises, and the damages were done unavoidably, by circumstances which the defendant could not control or avoid, the law is with the defendant.

2. There must be some positive wrong on the part of the defendant in this cause, before a verdict can be found against him.

If the trespass in this case had been committed against the person or personal property of the plaintiffs, and not against their real estate, the instructions would have been clearly right, because cattle, such as those charged with having broken and entered the plaintiffs' close, viz., cows, oxen, steers, and the like, are regarded mansuetæ naturæ, not naturally inclined to commit mischief. And the owner, for such trespass merely against the person or personal property, would not be held liable, unless it could be shown that he previously had notice of their viciousness, or that the injury was attributable to some neglect on his part. 1 Chit. Pl. 82, 83; Bac. Ab. tit. Trespass, 1; Vrooman v. Lawyer, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 339; Lyke v. Van Leuven, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 127.

But this rule does not apply to the case before us. Here a close was broken and entered by such animals; and though their owner may not know when they are inclined to commit mischief, still it is said "they have a natural and notorious propensity to rove," which he is always presumed to know. Hence, he is bound, at his peril, to confine them on his own land; for if they escape and commit a trespass on the land of another, unless through the defect of fences which the latter ought to repair, the law deems the owner himself a trespasser, and holds him liable in trespass quare clausum fregit, though he had no notice in fact of such propensity. 3 Bl. Comm. 211; Rust v. Low, 6 Mass. 90; Thayer v. Arnold, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 589; Sheridan v. Bean, 8 id. 284, 41 Am. Dec. 507; Chit. Pl. 83. This is the common law rule on the subject, and we have heretofore decided that, as a general rule, it prevails in Indiana. Williams v. New Albany, etc., R. Co., 5 Ind. 111; Lafayette, etc., R. Co. v. Shriner, 6 Ind. 141.

If the principles above stated are sound, as we think they are, the ruling of the Common Pleas can not be sustained. Against the plaintiffs, no delinquency was shown. The fence through which the cattle broke and entered the corn field, was considered by the parties sufficient and in good repair, and the authorities we have cited establish the principle, that the owner of such cattle can not, in defence of a suit like the present, set up the care and diligence which he may have exercised in an unavailing effort to confine them on his own land. Indeed the defendant in this case may have been entirely innocent; yet his cattle having broken and entered the close, and therein destroyed corn, the plaintiffs not being in fault, the law holds him responsible for the trespass. The jury, in our opinion, were improperly instructed.

The judgment is reversed with costs.[8]

(Court of Common Pleas, 1863. 13 C. B. [N. S.] 430, 143 Reprint, 171, 134 R. R. 586.)

A horse belonging to the defendant was grazing on a newly made road which led to some houses, and which had for some time been used as a road, but not adopted by the parish. The plaintiff, a little boy about five years of age, was playing in the road, when the horse, which was on the foot-path, struck out and kicked him in the face, injuring him very severely. There was no evidence to show how the horse got to the spot, or that the defendant knew he was there, or that the animal was at all vicious, or that the child had done anything to irritate it.

Under these circumstances, it was submitted on the part of the defendant that there was no case to go to the jury. The learned Judge, however, did not like to withdraw the case; but he reserved the question of liability; and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £20. The defendant obtained a rule nisi to enter a non suit.

negligence. Such a rule may probably be justified as based on a reasonable presumption of law that all such trespasses are the outcome of negligent keeping. Viewed historically, however, the rule is worth notice as one of the last relics of the ancient principle that a man is answerable for all damage done by his property. In the theory of ancient law I am liable for the trespasses of my cattle, not because of my negligent keeping of them, but because of my ownership of them. For the same reason in Roman law a master was liable for the offences of his slaves. The case is really, in its historical origin, one of vicarious liability." Salmond, Jurisprudence (1910) 378. And see the question whether accident excuses a trespass, discussed infra, "The Different Kinds of Justification or Excuse in Trespass."

For the limits of the doctrine, see the remarks of Willes, J., in Read v. Edwards (1864) 17 C. B. (N. S.) 245, 260: "The question was much argued whether the owner of a dog is answerable in trespass for every unauthorized entry of the animal into the land of another, as in the case of an ox. And reasons were offered, which we need not now estimate, for a distinction in this respect between oxen and dogs or cats, on account, first, of the difficulty or impossibility of keeping the latter under restraint, secondly, the slightness of the damage which their wandering ordinarily causes, thirdly, the common usage of mankind to allow them a wider liberty, and lastly, their not being considered in law so absolutely the chattels of the owner, as to be the subject of larceny.

"It is not, however, necessary in the principal case to answer this question; because it was proved at the trial that the dog which did the damage was of a peculiarly mischievous disposition, being accustomed to chase and destroy game on its own account, that that vice was known to its owner, the defendant, and that he notwithstanding allowed it to be at large in the neighbourhood of the plaintiff's wood, in which there were game: so that the entry of the dog into the wood, and the destruction of the game, was the natural and immediate result of the animal's peculiarly mischievous disposition, which his owner knew of, and did not control."

See also the remarks of Palles, C. B., in Brady v. Warren, [1900] 2 I. R. 632, 659 (rabbits from D.'s land trespass upon P.'s land).

For other distinctions and cases in the doctrine see 2 Cyc. 376, note 38; and Key-No., "Animals," § 97.

WILLIAMS, J. * * * If I am the owner of an animal in which by law the right of property can exist, I am bound to take care that it does not stray into the land of my neighbour; and I am liable for any trespass it may commit, and for the ordinary consequences of that trespass. Whether or not the escape of the animal is due to my negligence, is altogether immaterial. I am clearly liable for the trespass, and for all the ordinary consequences of the trespass, subject to a distinction which is taken very early in the books, that the animal is such that the owner may have a property in it which is recognizable by law. May v. Burdett, 9 Q. B. 101. For instance, if a man's cattle, or sheep, or poultry, stray into his neighbour's land or garden, and do such damage as might ordinarily be expected to be done by things of that sort, the owner is liable to his neighbour for the consequences.

The question, then, is, whether the injury which is the subject of this action falls within that rule. Upon the result of the authorities, I am of opinion that it does not. We must assume that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the horse having viciously kicked him, as a horse of ordinary temper would not have done. Taking that to be so, I am of opinion that the plaintiff cannot maintain the action because he has not shown that the defendant knew that the horse was subject to that infirmity of temper. That brings the case within the ordinary rule by which it is established that the owner is not liable unless it can be shown that he was aware of the irritable temper and vice of the animal. There is no trace to be found in the books of an owner being held liable beyond the consequences of ordinary trespasses, in the absence of such evidence as I have above pointed out: and I think we ought not to introduce a new ground of action.[9]

HAY v. COHOES CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1849. 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279.)

Hay sued the Cohoes Company, a New York corporation, in the court of common pleas of Albany county. The declaration alleged that the defendants, by their agents, wrongfully and unjustly blasted and threw large quantities of earth, and stones upon the dwelling house and premises of the plaintiff, and broke the windows, doors, etc., to the plaintiff's damage. Plea, not guilty. On the trial the plaintiff gave evidence tending to prove his declaration, and, among other things, that the agents of the defendants, in excavating a canal on land of which they claimed to be the owners, knocked down the stoop of plaintiff's house and part of his chimney. The defendants moved for a nonsuit, insisting that to make them liable the plaintiff must both aver and prove that there was negligence, unskillfulness, or wantonness on the part of the defendants, and this the plaintiff failed to do. The common pleas nonsuited the plaintiff. On error, the supreme court reversed the judgment, and granted a new trial, from which decision the defendants appealed.[10]

[9] The statement of the case, which was framed in negligence, is abridged. The concurring opinions of Erle, C. J., and Willes, J., are omitted.

GARDINER, J. The defendants insist that they had the right to excavate the canal upon their own land, and were not responsible for injuries to third persons, unless they occurred through their negligence and want of skill, or that of their agents and servants.

It is an elementary principle in reference to private rights, that every individual is entitled to the undisturbed possession and lawful enjoyment of his own property. The mode of enjoyment is necessarily limited by the rights of others—otherwise it might be made destructive of their rights altogether. Hence the maxim sic utere tuo, etc. The defendants had the right to dig the canal. The plaintiff had the right to the undisturbed possession of his property. If these two rights conflict, the former must yield to the latter, as the more important of the two, since, upon grounds of public policy, it is better that one man should surrender a particular use of his land, than that another should be deprived of the beneficial use of his property altogether, which might be the consequence if the privilege of the former should be wholly unrestricted. The case before us illustrates this principle. For if the defendants in excavating their canal, in itself a lawful use of their land, could, in the manner mentioned by the witnesses, demolish the stoop of the plaintiff with impunity, they might, for the same purpose, on the exercise of reasonable care, demolish his house, and thus deprive him of all use of his property.

The use of land by the proprietor is not therefore an absolute right, but qualified and limited by the higher right of others to the lawful possession of their property. To this possession the law prohibits all direct injury, without regard to its extent or the motives of the aggressor. A man may prosecute such business as he chooses upon his premises, but he cannot erect a nuisance to the annoyance of the adjoining proprietor, even for the purpose of a lawful trade. Aldred's Case, 9 Coke, 58. He may excavate a canal, but he cannot cast the dirt or stones upon the land of his neighbor, either by human agency or the force of gunpowder. If he cannot construct the work without the adoption of such means, he must abandon that mode of using his property, or be held responsible for all damages resulting therefrom.

[10] The declaration was in case. Whether this form of action was proper for the cause asserted was questioned by the Supreme Court; and the action was saved with difficulty. See the report of the case in Hay v. Cohoes Co. (1848) 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 45–49. For the principle of pleading involved, see Whittier's Cases on Common Law Pleading.

The act of the New York Legislature incorporating the defendant company authorized it to excavate canals on its own land. See Hay v. Cohoes Co. (1848) 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 42, 46.

The statement of facts is slightly abridged. Part of the opinion is omitted.

He will not be permitted to accomplish a legal object in an unlawful manner. * * *

In this case, the plaintiff was in the lawful possession and use of his own property. The land was his, and, as against the defendant, by an absolute right from the center usque ad cœlum. The defendants could not directly infringe that right by any means or for any purpose. They could not pollute the air upon the plaintiff's premises, Morley v. Pragnell, Cro. Car. 510, nor abstract any portion of the soil, Rol. Abr. 565, note; Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 221; nor cast anything upon the land, Lambert v. Bessy, Sir T. Raymond, 421, by any act of their agents, neglect, or otherwise. For this would violate the right of domain. Subject to this qualification the defendants were at liberty to use their land in a reasonable manner, according to their pleasure. If the exercise of such a right upon their part, operated to restrict the plaintiff in some particular mode of enjoying his property, they would not be liable. It would be damnum absque injuria.

No one questions that the improvement contemplated by the defendants upon their own premises was proper and lawful. The means by which it was prosecuted were illegal notwithstanding. For they disturbed the rightful possession of the plaintiff and caused a direct and immediate injury to his property. For the damages thus resulting, the defendants are liable. * * *†

Judgment affirmed.

BOOTH v. ROME, W. & O. T. R. CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1893. 140 N. Y. 267, 35 N. E. 592, 24 L. R. A. 105, 37 Am. St. Rep. 552.)

In making a lawful excavation on its own land, in order to remove rock, the defendant railway company loosened the rock by blasting. In consequence of this blasting the plaintiff's house, on an adjoining lot, was seriously damaged, the foundations being cracked, the beams and joists pulled apart, the plaster loosened. No rocks or materials, however, were thrown upon the plaintiff's lot or against his house. The inference was that the damage to the plaintiff's house was caused by † Accord: Henry Hall Sons' Co. v. Sundstrom Co. (1910) 138 App. Div. 548, 123 N. Y. Supp. 390: The complaint alleged that the defendant was blasting near the plaintiff's factory, and that this "blasting was conducted in such a manner by reason of the negligence of the defendant that large rocks, stones and other material were thrown" upon and against the plaintiff's factory. The character of the cause was held to be trespass, notwithstanding the isolated allegation of negligence.

Langhorne v. Turman (1911) 141 Ky. 809, 133 S. W. 1008, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211: D., a railway company, was blasting upon its right of way, and thereby caused soil and rocks to be thrown upon P.'s land. The instruction authorized a recovery without regard to whether the blasting in the right of way was done negligently.

For other cases, see Dec. Dig., Key No., "Explosives," § 12.

the jarring of the ground or the concussion of the atmosphere created by the explosion, or by both causes combined. It was conceded that the defendant exercised due care in the blasting, and that blasting was necessary in order to remove the rock.

In an action to recover for the damage thus sustained the trial judge instructed the jury that the defendant in using powerful explosives in blasting the rock used them at its peril, and that if the plaintiff's house was injured thereby the defendant was liable for the damages occasioned, and "that it made no difference whether the work was done carefully or negligently." Exception was taken by the defendant to this instruction. The jury found that the damage to the house from the blasting was $1,750, and this sum was included in the verdict.[11] A judgment for the plaintiff upon this verdict was affirmed by the General Term of the Supreme Court. The defendant appealed.[12]

ANDREWS, C. J. * * * The plaintiff, upon the findings of the jury, sustained a serious injury. It is true that witnesses on the part of the defendant gave evidence tending to show that the house was imperfectly constructed, and that the foundation walls were giving way before the excavation was commenced. But the verdict having been affirmed by the General Term, there can be no controversy here that the blasting caused damage to the house to the amount of the verdict. But mere proof that the house was damaged by the blasting [11] This statement is substituted for a longer statement by the reporter. The arguments of counsel and portions of the opinion are omitted.

[12] "When an examination is made of the cases in which the exact point raised in the case at bar has been at issue, viz., whether one, who, by blasting with powerful explosives, produces severe concussions or vibrations in surrounding earth and air, and so materially damages buildings belonging to others, is liable irrespective of negligence on his part, a sharp and irreconcilable conflict of authority is disclosed. The point seems to have come up first in the lower courts of New York, where it was decided in favor of the plaintiff, following the reasoning of Hay v. Cohoes Co., supra, [(1849) 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279], and other cases. Morgan v. Bowes, 62 Hun, 623, 17 N. Y. Supp. 22 (Sup. Ct. 1891); Booth v. Rome, etc., R. Co., 63 Hun, 624, 17 N. Y. Supp. 336 (Sup. Ct. 1892). In the former of these two cases the Supreme Court says: 'The appellants claim reversal upon two grounds: * * * Second, that an action for damages caused by blasting on one's own land will only lie when an actual trespass upon the res is committed, as where rock or soil is blown over into the adjoining lot or against the adjoining house. * * * We think the second point taken by the appellants also is untenable. The rules which have been laid down upon the subject of private nuisances, causing damage to individuals, do not limit the right of action as thus contended for. It is true that in Hay v. Cohoes Co. (1849) 2 N. Y. 159 [51 Am. Dec. 279], fragments of the rock blasted by the defendants were actually thrown against and injured the adjoining building, which belonged to the plaintiff. The observations of the learned court were made with reference to that fact; but it was by no means intimated that such an action could not be maintained, where the same damage was produced by violent and continuous concussions. On the contrary, the disturbance of the plaintiff's rightful possession, and the direct and immediate injury to his property, were the grounds upon which the right of recovery was placed. There the plaintiff's stoop was demolished. It was certainly unimportant whether such demolition resulted from the direct attack of broken rock or from the concussion caused by the blast.'" Per Johnson, J., delivering the opinion in Hickey v. McCabe (1910) 30 R. I. 346, 75 Atl. 404, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 425, 19 Ann. Cas. 783.

would not alone sustain the action. It must further appear that the defendant in using explosives violated a duty owing by him to the plaintiff in respect of her property, or failed to exercise due care. Wrong and damage must concur to create a cause of action.

If the injury was occasioned by the omission to use due care, this alone would sustain the action, even if the right of the defendant to use explosives in removing the rock was conceded. If one by carelessness in making an excavation on his own land causes injury to an adjoining building, even where the owner of the house has no easement of support, he will be liable. Leader v. Moxon, 3 Wils. 460; Lawrence v. Great Northern Railway Co., 16 Ad. & El. 643–653; Leake's Law of Real Prop. 248. The law exacts from a person who undertakes to do even a lawful act on his own premises, which may produce injury to his neighbor, the exercise of a degree of care measured by the danger, to prevent or mitigate the injury. The defendant could not conduct the operation of blasting on its own premises, from which injury might be apprehended to the property of his neighbor, without the most cautious regard for his neighbor's rights. This would be reasonable care only under the circumstances. If it was practicable in a business sense for the defendant to have removed the rock without blasting, although at a somewhat increased cost, the defendant would, we think, in view of the situation, and especially after having been informed of the injury that was being done, have been bound to resort to some other method. * * * The plaintiff, however, on this record, is precluded from claiming that the judgment may be sustained because of negligence in the mode of blasting. It must be assumed from concessions made on the trial and from the rule of law laid down by the court, that blasting was the only mode of removing the rock practically available, that it was conducted with due care, and that it was necessary to enable the defendant to conform the roadbed to the established grade. * * *

The rule announced by the trial judge, that the use, by an owner of property, of explosives in excavating his land, is at his peril and imposes liability for any injury caused thereby to adjacent property irrespective of negligence, is far reaching. It would constitute, if sustained, a serious restriction upon the use of property, and in many cases greatly impair its value. The situation in the city of New York furnishes an apt illustration. The rocky surface of the upper part of Manhattan Island makes blasting necessary in the work of excavation, and, unless permitted, the value of lots, especially for business uses, would be seriously affected. May the man who has first built a store or warehouse or dwelling on his lot and has blasted the rock for a basement or cellar, prevent his neighbor from doing the same thing when he comes to build on his lot adjoining, on the ground that by so doing his own structure will be injured? Such a rule would enable the first occupant to control the uses of the adjoining property, to the serious injury of the owner, and prevent or tend to prevent the improvement of property. The first occupant in building on his lot exercised an undoubted legal right. But his prior occupation deprived his neighbor of no legal right in his property. The first occupant acquires no right to exclude an adjoining proprietor from the free use of his land, nor to use his own land to the injury of his neighbor subsequently coming there. Platt v. Johnson, 15 Johns. 213, 8 Am. Dec. 233; Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 220; Tipping v. St. Helen's Smelting Co., L. R. (1 Ch. App.) 66; Campbell v. Seaman, 63 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567. The fact of proximity imposes an obligation of care, so that one engaged in improving his own lot shall do no unnecessary damage to his neighbor's dwelling, but it cannot, we think, exclude the former from employing the necessary and usual means to adapt his lot to any lawful use, although the means used may endanger the house of his neighbor.

We have found no case directly in point upon the interesting and important practical question involved in this appeal. It was held in the leading case of Hay v. Cohoes Co., 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279, that the right of property did not justify the owner of land in committing a trespass on the land of his neighbor by casting rocks thereon in blasting for a canal on his own land for the use of his mill, although he exercised all due care in executing the work. In that case there was a physical invasion by the defendant of the land of the plaintiff. This the court held could not be justified by any consideration of convenience or necessity connected with the work in which the defendant was engaged. In the conflict of rights the court considered that public policy required that the right of the defendant to dig the canal on his own land must yield to the superior right of the plaintiff to be protected against an invasion of his possession by the act of the defendant. * * *

Many of the cases cited by the counsel are cases of the permanent appropriation of property, for damages, or noxious uses causing damage. The distinction between such cases and those where the injury arises from acts done in the necessary adjustment of property for a lawful use by means necessary, and not unusual, but involving damage to adjacent property, has been adverted to. We recognize the difficulty of formulating a general rule regulating the rights of adjacent landowners in the use of their property, and we realize how narrow the margin is which separates this from some decided cases. In Marvin v. Brewster Iron Co., 55 N. Y. 557, the opinion of the learned judge who wrote in that case sustains the conclusion we have reached in this case. But the point was not necessarily involved, since it was held that the defendant there had acquired by grant the right to employ blasting in removing the mineral, and that the plaintiff, a subsequent grantee of the surface, could not complain of injury to his house therefrom, in the absence of negligence on the part of the defendant in conducting the work. Judge Folger, in that case, said: "Whatever it is necessary for him [defendant] to do for the profitable and beneficial enjoyment of his own possession, and which he may do with no ill effect to the adjacent surface in its natural state, that he may do, though it harm erections lately put there." If the learned judge intended to lay down the rule that the owner of land may do anything on his own land which would do no injury to the adjacent property if it had remained in its natural state, the proposition is probably too broad. One may do in a barren waste many things which he could not lawfully do in or near an inhabited town.

But the defendant here was engaged in a lawful act. It was done on its own land, to fit it for a lawful business. It was not an act which, under all circumstances, would produce injury to his neighbor, as is shown by the fact that other buildings near by were not injured. The immediate act was confined to its own land; but the blasts, by setting the air in motion, or in some other unexplained way, caused an injury to the plaintiff's house. The lot of the defendant could not be used for its roadbed until it was excavated and graded. It was to be devoted to a common use; that is, to a business use. The blasting was necessary, was carefully done, and the injury was consequential. There was no technical trespass. Under these circumstances, we think, the plaintiff has no legal ground of complaint. The protection of property is doubtless one of the great reasons for government. But it is equal protection to all which the law seeks to secure. The rule governing the rights of adjacent landowners in the use of their property seeks an adjustment of conflicting interests through a reconciliation by compromise, each surrendering something of his absolute freedom so that both may live. To exclude the defendant from blasting to adapt its lot to the contemplated uses, at the instance of the plaintiff, would not be a compromise between conflicting rights, but an extinguishment of the right of the one for the benefit of the other. This sacrifice, we think, the law does not exact. Public policy is sustained by the building up of towns and cities and the improvement of property. Any unnecessary restraint on freedom of action of a property owner hinders this. The law is interested, also, in the preservation of property and property rights from injury. Will it, in this case, protect the plaintiff's house by depriving the defendant of his right to adapt his property to a lawful use, through means necessary, usual, and generally harmless? We think not.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event. All concur.

Judgment reversed.[13]

Law, 486, 41 Atl. 692: "The temporary use of explosives in the blasting of rock, provided reasonable care be exercised, is lawful, and damage resulting from concussion thereby produced is damnum absque injuria." And see Derrick v. Kelly (1910) 136 App. Div. 433, 120 N. Y. Supp. 996 (D. is blasting rock on his own property, without negligence. CLISSOLD v. CRATCHLEY and RICHARDS.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1910] 1 K. B. 374.)

In an earlier action by the plaintiff, against Mrs. Cratchley, the Court had ordered Clissold to pay costs amounting to £27. 12s. 4d. This order was equivalent to a judgment. Mrs. Cratchley's solicitor, Richards, who had an office in London with a branch office in Gloucestershire, wrote from his London office to plaintiff's agents in London demanding payment by 11 A. M. of December 16. At 3:45 P. M. of that day, thinking that payment had not been made, Richards took out a writ of fi. fa. in London. This writ was sent to the sheriff of Gloucestershire, where Clissold resided, and an execution was there levied upon personal property belonging to Clissold, on December 17. About noon of December 16, Clissold had paid the full amount of the costs to Richard's agent in Gloucestershire, and taken a receipt; and this agent had at least implied authority to receive payment and give a receipt. He did not, however, notify Richards of the payment until after the levy of the execution. Richards then telegraphed 358, 138 N. Y. Supp. 413 (P.'s damage was caused by D.'s hammering on the joists of his adjoining house. "In the absence of evidence that this hammering was excessive, there can be no recovery for this damage. The defendant has a right to alter her house if she did so without negligence." Per Lehman, J.).

On the application of the principle of Booth v. Rome R. R. Co., see, also, French v. Vix (1894) 143 N. Y. 90, 93, 37 N. E. 612; Holland House v. Baird (1901) 169 N. Y. 136, 140, 62 N. E. 149; Page v. Dempsey (1906) 184 N. Y. 249, 251, 77 N. E. 11; Dec. Dig., Key No., "Explosives," § 12; "Adjoining Landowners," § 8; 19 Cyc. 7, 8, note 32.

But in some cases the historic reason for the distinction taken, because of the technical trespass, in Hay v. Cohoes Co. and Booth v. Railway Co. is disregarded. Thus, it is remarked, per Holloway, J., in Longtin v. Persell (1904) 30 Mont. 306, 76 Pac. 699, 65 L. R. A. 655, 104 Am. St. Rep. 723, 2 Ann. Cas. 198: "If the damages to plaintiff's property had been caused by fragments of rock thrown upon his property or against his dwelling house by the blasting which defendants were doing, the authorities are practically unanimous in holding that the defendants would be liable even though they exercised reasonable care in their operations. Cooley on Torts, 332. We can see no reason whatever for adopting that view, and at the same time holding that they are not liable for damages occasioned by the vibrations of the ground or the concussion of the air. The agency employed in either case is the same, and the danger as imminent in one case as in the other." And see Hickey v. McCabe (1910) 30 R. I. 346, 75 Atl. 404, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 425, 19 Ann. Cas. 783; Patrick v. Smith (1913) 75 Wash. 407, 134 Pac. 1076, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 740; 10 Columbia Law Rev. 465, 27 Harvard Law Rev. 188. The result is either to widen our inherited doctrine of trespass, imposing a civil liability irrespective of the question of blameworthiness, or to bring the concussion of the air, through the defendant's intentional act, into the historic class of acts vi et armis. "Probably the reason for the distinction is that the courts have felt themselves fettered by precedent in the case of the technical trespass, and yet have been unwilling to extend the doctrine of the vibration cases." 27 Harvard Law Rev. 189.

the sheriff to withdraw from possession immediately, and this was accordingly done.[14]

DARLING, J. (after stating the facts). Upon these facts an action is brought by the plaintiff against the two defendants, and it is contended that they are liable inasmuch as the debt was paid before the writ of fi. fa. was issued, and that therefore the writ was irregular and void. Many authorities have been referred to which seem to me to establish this, that an action on the case will not lie against a person suing out a writ after the debt has been paid unless malice on his part is proved. * * *[15]

It is contended, however, that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain an action of trespass. That contention is based upon this, that Richards indorsed upon the writ of fi. fa. a direction to the sheriff to levy the amount specified therein as being due and payable, whereas in fact it was not then due and payable, and that such direction to the sheriff to levy execution when no debt existed made Richards, who gave the direction, and his client trespassers. I was at first rather captivated by that argument, and thought that the plaintiff might perhaps maintain an action of trespass, but I have upon further reflection come to the conclusion that, before he can do so, he must distinguish the present case from Gibson v. Chaters.[16] I do not think that he has succeeded in distinguishing that case. It was said that that case was distinguishable by reason of the fact that the affidavit of the defendant upon which the writ was issued was made before the debt was paid. That is true, but the affidavit was not the ground of the action. The ground of the action was this, that the affidavit having been made by the defendant while the debt was unpaid and a writ of capias having been issued upon it, inasmuch as that writ could not be executed, afterwards when the debt had been paid an alias writ was taken out by the defendant's attorney grounded upon the former affidavit, and the plaintiff was arrested under this latter writ. It was not the making of the affidavit, but the issue of the alias writ, which caused the plaintiff to be arrested. In the present case Richards has done nothing more than was done by the defendant's attorney in that case. Richards by mistake, thinking that the debt of £27. 12s. 4d. had not been paid, sued out a writ of fi. fa., indorsing upon the writ a statement that the debt was due and payable in order to entitle him to have the writ issued. So too the attorney in the case of Gibson v. Chaters could not have taken out the alias writ unless he had stated that the debt was unpaid. Therefore, unless Gibson was entitled to maintain an action of trespass against Chaters, this action will not lie against the present defendants. It was not suggested in Gibson v. Chaters that an action of trespass would lie if the action on the case was not maintainable. Therefore I am of opinion that that case is not distinguishable and that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action for trespass. * * *[17]

CLISSOLD v. CRATCHLEY and RICHARDS.

(Court of Appeal [1910]. 2 K. B. 244.)

The Divisional Court (Darling and Phillimore, JJ.) having held that the defendants were not liable in trespass, the plaintiff appealed.[18]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L. J. I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed, although I do not think that the principles of law upon which I base my judgment are in any way contravened by the judgments delivered in the Divisional Court. When those judgments are read, it is clear that both of them recognize the distinction between an action on the case and an action of trespass; they recognize that in an action on the case for maliciously suing out process the allegation of malice is one of fact which must be proved by the plaintiff, and that, if it is not proved, the action cannot be supported. They further recognize that, if an action for maliciously suing out process is not an action on the case but an action of trespass, malice is in no sense essential to its maintenance. I am not sure how it came to pass that, recognizing these distinctions, the judges in the Divisional Court decided the present case on the basis that this action could not succeed without proof of malice. The plaint in the action shews that there were alternative causes of action alleged: the action was in part for maliciously issuing process, and alternatively for trespass: the county court judge in terms recognized this fact in his judgment, which was delivered as a judgment in an action of trespass. Arriving, as I do, at the conclusion that this was an action of trespass, and that it was totally unnecessary for the plaintiff to give evidence of malice, it is necessary to see whether anything can be relied on as shewing that a judgment in trespass was wrong. I can see nothing at all to warrant such a conclusion. It is suggested that, when execution was issued, the judgment against the plaintiff was still in force, notwithstanding that the total amount of debt and costs ordered by it to be paid by the plaintiff had in fact been paid, and a receipt had been given for it by a person authorized to receive the money and give the receipt. It is said that, notwithstanding that fact, there was a still existing judgment which would support the writ of execution, and which was still in force. But common sense, wholly apart from authority, tells one that, when the total amount has been paid which is ordered by a judgment to be paid, the judgment ought no longer to be of any force or effect. But, as it has been argued that a writ of execution is good so long as the judgment under which the moneys have been paid has not in law been set aside, it is convenient to shew the authority for the proposition that, when the total amount of a judgment debt has been paid, the judgment ceases to be of any avail. In Tebbutt v. Holt (1844) 1 Car. & K. 280, at p. 289, Parke, B., said, "The law also is that, if the debt and costs are paid or satisfied, the judgment is at an end." This judgment is at an end. And in Bullen and Leake's Precedents (3d Ed.) at p. 353, I find this statement: "An action will not lie for an arrest on final process upon a subsisting unsatisfied judgment (Blanchenay v. Burt [1843] 4 Q. B. 707; Huffer v. Allen L. R. 2 Ex. 15, 36 L. J. Ex. 17); but if the party arrested can get the judgment set aside for irregularity or on any other ground, or can shew that the judgment was satisfied by payment or otherwise before the arrest, he may then maintain an action: the arrest in such case would in general support an action of trespass." Under the circumstances it seems unnecessary to add anything. The cases on which reliance has been placed on behalf of the defendants are all instances of actions on the case for maliciously issuing process; not a single authority has been cited to justify the proposition that a satisfied judgment is nevertheless still an existing judgment for the purpose of issuing a writ of execution. If the judgment was not an existing judgment, it is manifest that the writ of execution issued under it was void ab initio, and that an entry has been made upon the plaintiff's premises under a writ void ab initio. The defendants are consequently liable in an action of trespass.

Fletcher Moulton, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The acts complained of clearly constituted a trespass, and it was for the defendants to justify their action. The sole defence relied on is that there was an order for payment of costs which was equivalent to a judgment, and that a writ of execution was sued out, under which the defendants acted. The plaintiff replies that (as is now admitted to be the case) prior to the suing out of the writ the order had been obeyed. I am satisfied that in this state of things the order was dead for all purposes, and that the suing out of a writ of execution under an order which had already been obeyed was an act void ab initio and could justify nothing. This is therefore, in my opinion, an undefended action of trespass. The judges in the Divisional Court did not, I think, realize that at the date of the decision of Gibson v. Chaters [19] the form of an action was of prime importance in the eyes of the Court, nor did they realize how great would be considered the difference between actions for maliciously holding to bail or actions on the case in which malice is alleged, on the one hand, and actions of trespass, on the other. No case, however, was cited either in the Divisional Court or before us which in any way contravenes the proposition that a writ of execution upon a satisfied judgment is null and void.

Appeal allowed.

SECTION 2.—ELEMENTS OF A PRIMA FACIE CAUSE IN TRESPASS

I. In Trespass to the Person

(A) In Assault

SMITH v. NEWSAM.

(Court of King's Bench, 1674. 3 Keble, 283, 84 Reprint, 722.)

In trespass of assault and battery, on verdict of the assault, and not guilty of the battery, being only of a woman's shaking a sword against the plaintiff in a cutlers shop, being on the other side of the street.

Hale, Chief Justice, certified the assault well proved: and now Saunders prayed no more costs than damages, which was a noble; and per curiam it was granted: and Hale, Chief Justice, said he certified industriously, thinking this not within the statute unless the battery had been found.[20]

TOMBS v. PAINTER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1810. 13 East, 1, 104 Reprint, 265.)

Debt on bond, in the penalty of £100., conditioned not to assault, molest, or injure the person of the plaintiff wilfully or designedly in anywise howsoever. Plea, that the defendant had not done so. Replication, that the defendant on such a day, assaulted, molested, and injured the person of the plaintiff wilfully and designedly, by then and there with force and arms wilfully and designedly beating, bruising, wounding, and otherwise ill-treating him. Rejoinder, that the defendant did not assault, molest, or injure the person of the plaintiff, wilfully and designedly, modo et forma; and concluding to the country.

[20] The statute referred to is the act of 1670 (22–23 Car. II, c. 9), which provided that "in all actions of trespass, assault and battery, and other personal actions," if the jury found the damages to be under 40s., the plaintiff should have no more costs than damages, unless the judge "shall find and certify under his hand upon the back of the record that an assault and battery was sufficiently proved by the plaintiff against the defendant, or that the freehold or title of the land mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration was chiefly in question." That the question was a troublesome one, see Newsam v. Smith (1674) 3 Keble, 292; Smith v. Nusam (1674) 3 Keble, 303.

At the trial, the evidence was that these parties being in the same public-house in different parts of the room, the defendant jumped up from his seat, with his fist clenched, as if to strike the plaintiff, but was pulled back to his seat by another person, and did not get within reach of the plaintiff; but he abused him and swore at him, and drank the beer out of his cup. This, it was contended, did not support the issue of the plaintiff, which was that the defendant assaulted, molested, and injured the plaintiff's person by beating, etc., "and otherwise ill-treating" him. But the learned Judge thought that the evidence satisfied the latter words, and the plaintiff took a verdict with one shilling damages for the detention of the debt and one shilling damages upon the breach assigned. And now,

Lens, Serjt., moved, by leave, to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit; and, first, renewed the objection, that the evidence did not sustain the issue, which was confined to an ill treatment of the plaintiff's person.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. The clenching his fist at the plaintiff was an assault, and an act of personal offence. * * *

Rule refused.

LEWIS v. HOOVER.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1834. 3 Blackf. 407.)

Trespass, assault and battery. Plea, not guilty. Verdict and judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff asked the Court to charge the jury that if they thought from the evidence that the defendant struck at the plaintiff with a stick, in a violent and angry manner, within striking distance of him, they ought to find for the plaintiff. This charge the Court gave, but added, as an additional charge, that if no damage was proved to have resulted from the said assault, they ought to find for the defendant. To this additional and latter charge the plaintiff excepted, and prosecuted a writ of error.

STEVENS, J. The only question to be determined is, whether that latter and additional charge of the Court was correct? An assault is an attempt or offer with violence to do a corporal hurt to another, as if one lift up his cane or fist at another in a threatening manner, or strike at him with a stick, his fist, or any weapon, within striking distance, but miss him. This is called an unlawful setting upon one's person, and is an inchoate violence for which the party assaulted may have redress by an action of trespass vi et armis, and shall recover damages as a compensation, although no actual suffering or injury is proved. The damages are not assessed for the mere corporal injury or pecuniary loss, but for the malicious and insulting conduct of the defendant. 3 Bl. Com. 120; 1 Bac. Abr. 242; 1 Saund. on

Pl. & Ev. 103, 104. From this it appears that the above additional and latter charge of the Circuit Court to the jury is incorrect, and should not have been given.

PER CURIAM. The judgment is reversed, and the verdict set aside, with costs. Cause remanded, etc.

TUBERVILLE v. SAVAGE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1669. 1 Mod. 3, 86 Reprint, 684.)

Action of assault, battery, and wounding. The evidence to prove provocation was, that the plaintiff put his hand upon his sword and said, "If it were not assize-time, I would not take such language from you." The question was, If that were an assault?

The Court agreed that it was not; for the declaration of the plaintiff was, that he would not assault him, the Judges being in town; and the intention as well as the act makes an assault. Therefore if one strike another upon the hand, or arm, or breast in discourse, it is no assault, there being no intention to assault; but if one, intending to assault, strike at another and miss him, this is an assault: so if he hold up his hand against another in a threatening manner and say nothing, it is an assault.

In the principal case the plaintiff had judgment.[21]

UNITED STATES v. MYERS.

(Circuit Court, District of Columbia, 1806. 1 Cranch, C. C. 310, 27 Fed. Cas. 43.)

Presentment, for an assault on Jane McGrath. The evidence was that the defendant (Samuel Myers) doubled his fist and ran it towards the witness, saying, "If you say so again, I will knock you down."

Mr. Key, for defendant, contended that it was not an assault. The words explain the act, and show the intention not to be to commit a battery. It was like the case of the man putting his hand on his sword, and saying, "If it were not term time or assizes, I would kill you," etc.; and he moved the court to instruct the jury that it was no assault.

The Court (nem. con.) refused to give the instruction.

Verdict, "Guilty." Fined five dollars.[22]

[21] Compare Keep v. Quallman (1887) 68 Wis. 451, 32 N. W. 233, the facts of which are given infra, "Defence of the Person."

[22] Accord: United States v. Richardson (1837) 5 Cranch, C. C. 348, 27 Fed. Cas. 798 (D. raised a club over the head of a woman, within striking distance, and threatened to strike her if she opened her mouth); State v. Morgan (1842) 3 Ired. (25 N. C.) 186, 38 Am. Dec. 714 (D., stepping within reach of P.

and holding an ax up in a position to strike, said to P.: "Give up the gun, or I'll split you down"); Keefe v. State (1857) 19 Ark. 190 (K. drew a pistol, cocked it, pointed it towards the breast of F., and said: "If you do not pay me my money I will have your life").

On the reason for the rule, see the remarks of Gaston, J., in State v. Morgan, ante: "There are several ancient cases in which it was held, that an assault might be committed by threats of future violence; but it has long been settled, that words alone can not constitute an assault. They may endanger the public peace, but do not break it. There is no assault, unless there be some act, amounting to an attempt or offer to commit personal violence. The instances usually given of such attempts or offers to do wrong to the person of another, are 'by the striking at him with or without a weapon, or presenting a gun at him within a distance which the gun will carry, or pointing a pitchfork at him standing within the reach of it, or by holding up one's fist at him in an angry, threatening manner.' 1 Hawk., c. 15. The law regards these acts as breaches of the peace, because they directly invade that personal security, which the law guarantees to every citizen. They do not excite an apprehension that his person may be attacked on a future occasion, and thus authorize a resort to cautionary remedies against it; but they are the beginnings of an attack, excite terror of immediate personal harm or disgrace, and justify a resort to actual violence to repel the impending injury and insult. But even acts, which prima facie and unexplained are undoubtedly assaults, like other acts which are not unequivocal in their character, may be shown to be in truth different from what they purport to be; that they are not attempts or offers to do harm, but merely angry gestures without any accompanying purpose of mischief. The attending circumstances may plainly show this, and, among other circumstances, the declarations of the party at the time, inasmuch as such declarations are ordinarily indicative of the party's purpose, are very proper to be considered and weighed. The ordinary illustration of the doctrine, that a seeming assault may be explained away by the declarations of the supposed assailant, is the very familiar case, where a man laid his hand on his sword and said to the person, with whom he was quarreling: 'If it were not assize-time, I would not take such language from you.' There is also an illustration of it in the case of the State v. Crow (1841) 23 N. C. 375, where the defendant, when he raised the whip, used the words: 'If you were not an old man, I would knock you down.' In both it was held to be a fair subject of inquiry, whether, at the time these acts were done, there was a present purpose of doing harm, and that, if there was not, the acts did not amount to an assault. But these, and all the cases within our recollection where this doctrine has been held, were cases, in which there was a declared intent not to do harm at the time. The present case is one of a very different character. The act was not only apparently a most dangerous assault, but accompanied with a present purpose to do great bodily harm; and the only declaration, by which its character is attempted to be changed, is, that the assailant was not determined to execute his savage purpose unconditionally and without a moment's delay. He had commenced the attack and raised the deadly weapon and was in the attitude to strike, but suspended the blow, to afford the object of his vengeance an opportunity to buy his safety, by compliance with the defendant's terms. To hold that such an act, under such circumstances, was not an offer of violence—not an attempt to commit violence—would be, we think, to outrage principle and manifest an utter want of that solicitude for the preservation of peace which characterizes our law, and which should animate its administrators. To every purpose—both in fact and in law—the attack on the prosecutor was begun; and in the pause, which intervened before its consummation, most happily for both parties an arrangement was made, which prevented the probably fatal result. But this pause—though intentional, and announced when the attack began—does not prevent that attack from being an offer or attempt to strike. If a ruffian were to level his rifle at a traveler, and announce to him that he might have fifteen minutes to make his peace with his God—and the unfortunate man should save his life by prayers, by remonstrance, by money, or by any other means before the expiration of that time, could it be pretended that there had been no attempt nor offer to hurt him, because the intent was not to kill instantaneously, and therefore

BEACH v. HANCOCK.

(Supreme Court of Judicature of New Hampshire, 1853. 27 N. H. 223, 59 Am. Dec. 373.)

Trespass for an assault. At the trial it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in an angry altercation, when the defendant stepped into his office and brought forth a gun, which he pointed in an excited and threatening manner at the plaintiff, who was standing three or four rods distant. The gun was not loaded, but this fact was not known to the plaintiff. The evidence tended to show that the defendant snapped the gun twice at the plaintiff. The court ruled that pointing a gun, in an angry and threatening manner, at a person three or four rods distant, who was ignorant whether the gun was loaded or not, was an assault, though it should appear that the gun was not loaded, and that it made no difference whether the gun was snapped or not. The court further instructed the jury that, in assessing the damages, it was their right and duty to consider the effect which the finding of light or trivial damages would have to encourage disturbances and breaches of the peace. Defendant excepted to both of these instructions.

GILCHRIST, C. J. * * * One of the most important objects to be attained by the enactment of laws and the institutions of civilized society is, that each of us shall feel secure against unlawful assaults. Without such security, society loses most of its value. Peace and order and domestic happiness, inexpressibly more precious than mere forms of government, cannot be enjoyed without the sense of perfect security. We have a right to live in society without being put in fear of personal harm. But it must be a reasonable fear of which we complain. And surely it is not unreasonable for a person to entertain a fear of personal injury when a pistol is pointed at him in a threatening manner, when, for aught he knows, it may be loaded, and may occasion his immediate death. The business of the world could not be carried on with comfort if such things could be done with impunity.

We think the defendant guilty of an assault, and we perceive no reason for taking any exception to the remarks of the court. Finding trivial damages for breaches of the peace, damages incommensurate did not accompany the act? Will it be doubted, if a bully should present his pistol at a citizen and order him, under pain of death, not to walk on the same side of the street with him, whether there was an offer of violence, because the purpose to kill was not absolute but conditional merely? Whether the act is done in part execution of a purpose of violence—whether that purpose be absolute or provisional—makes no difference as respects the question, whether the act be an assault. In both cases the assailant equally violates the public peace. In both he breaks down the barrier which the law has erected for the security of the citizen. In the former he sets up none in its place. In the latter, he substitutes for it the protection of his grace and favor."

with the injury sustained, would certainly lead the ill disposed to consider an assault as a thing that might be committed with impunity. But at all events, it was proper for the jury to consider whether such a result would or would not be produced: Flanders v. Colby, 28 N. H. 34.

Judgment on the verdict.[23]

WHITE v. SANDER (two cases).

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1897. 168 Mass. 296, 47 N. E. 90.)

These were two actions of tort, one by Benjamin White, and the other by Emma White, his wife, against Sander, to recover damages for personal injuries from fright caused by the defendant throwing a stone into a room where the wife was. The jury returned a verdict for the husband for $179.30 and for the wife for $847.47, and the defendant excepted.

ALLEN, J. There was no evidence that the defendant had any intention to injure the female plaintiff, or that he was aware of her condition of health. The house did not belong to her, but to her father, with whom the defendant had an altercation. The defendant's declared purpose was to injure the house, and he threw a large stone against it, in her presence. She then ran into the front room, with her little child, whereupon a large stone was willfully thrown by the defendant, which passed through one of the blinds, all of the blinds upon the front windows being closed. This greatly frightened her, though she was not struck or touched. We do not understand by the bill of exceptions that the defendant knew that she was in that room, or that he had any purpose either to hit or to frighten her, or that it was designed to present to us a case of an intentional injury to her or to her property. These elements being absent, the defendant was not responsible in damages for her fright or the consequent injury to her health. Spade v. Railroad Co., 168 Mass. 285, 47 N. E. 88, 38 L. R. A. 512, 60 Am. St. Rep. 393. Under the order taking off the default, the defendant was responsible for nominal damages. Exceptions sustained.

NELSON v. CRAWFORD.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1899. 122 Mich. 466, 81 N. W. 335, 80 Am. St. Rep. 577.)

Action for personal injuries by Sarah Nelson against Robert Crawford. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error.

Plaintiff and her husband resided on a farm about 40 rods from the residence of defendant. One evening defendant, dressed in woman's clothes, navy blue bicycle skirt, light waist, sailor hat, with flowers on it, and thin, black face veil, took a parasol, and went to her house. He had been a frequent visitor there and was accustomed to play with her children. Although for many years he had been adjudged insane or incompetent, his malady was of a harmless character, and it had never been considered necessary to restrain him. There is no testimony to show that he acted from malicious motives, or with any intent to do injury to plaintiff or any one. He said to others, shortly afterwards, "I did it to have a little fun; to see if they had any nerve." As he approached the back of the house, plaintiff stepped to the back door, and saw defendant standing three or four rods away. She spoke to him, but he made no reply, * * * only "mumbled." She testified that she was frightened and ran into the house, and into her bedroom, where her husband was in bed; that she called to her husband to get up, telling that "there is something here; I don't know what it is;" that defendant followed her into the house, and to the bedroom door; that her husband took up a stick of wood, raised it, and told defendant to get out of the house; that defendant then gave his name; that she was made ill by fright; and that on October 22d, 42 days after the fright, she had a miscarriage, which she attributes to the fright. The only demonstration he made was by tapping the end of his parasol on the ground or floor. This suit is brought to recover damages resulting from the fright. The court directed a verdict for the defendant.

GRANT, C. J. We think the court properly held that no violence was offered or threatened, and therefore there was no assault.[24]

[24] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point.

In the omitted portion of the opinion, the court considers the question whether fright unaccompanied by physical injury is recognized by the law as a basis for damages. The answer was in the negative.

Compare the query of Chief Justice Jervis, in Read v. Coker (1853) 13 C. B. 850, 854: "If a man comes into a room, and lays his cane on the table, and says to another, 'If you don't go out I will knock you on the head' would not that be an assault?" And consider the answer of Sergeant Byles: "Clearly not: it is a mere threat unaccompanied by any gesture or action towards carrying it into effect."

In Read v. Coker, the plaintiff was in the defendant's workshop and refused to leave when ordered by the defendant; thereupon the defendant and his servants surrounded the plaintiff, and tucking up their sleeves and aprons threatened to break his neck if he did not go out; "fearing that the men would strike him if he did not do so, the plaintiff went out."

Compare, also, Plonty v. Murphy (1901) 82 Minn. 268, 84 N. W. 1005 (The defendant, a man 78 years of age, was the owner of tenements near the house in which the plaintiff, a woman of 38 years, resided with her husband and children. A pailful of banana peelings and other refuse had been emptied in the yard of one of these tenements. Defendant went to the plaintiff's house, unceremoniously entered the kitchen, where she was at work alone, demanded that her boy, aged 5 years, remove this refuse, and notified her that if he again found the boy in that yard he would "thrash" him. The plaintiff informed him that the boy would do as requested. Defendant remained in the house about 10 minutes, talking in an excited and angry manner, shook his fist at plaintiff

MITCHELL v. MITCHELL.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1890. 45 Minn. 50, 47 N. W. 308.)

GILFILLAN, C. J. But the general allegation that they "assaulted her" standing alone would be sufficient. Whether they assaulted her is, so far as pleading is concerned, a conclusion of fact, or statement of an ultimate fact, although it may have to be arrived at by applying rules of law to minor or proved facts or details of fact, just as, for the purposes of pleading, title to real or personal property is ordinarily a pleadable fact, although to establish it may require the application of rules of law to the proved facts. The general allegation of an assault may, of course, be qualified by a specification of the acts which it is claimed constituted the assault. One of the particulars specified is that defendants shook their fists in plaintiff's face, accompanied with a threat to strike her. It is to be understood from this that they shook their fists at her face in close proximity to it; within reach of it. That would constitute an assault.[25] when within striking distance, raised his hand as if he would strike her, and she testified that she was afraid he would strike).

And see State v. Daniel (1904) 136 N. C. 571, 48 S. E. 544, 103 Am. St. Rep. 970: P., a colored man in a southern State, on a Sunday morning went to feed his hogs. As P. was leaving the pig pen, D., a white man, who with another was near by, called to P. bidding him come. P., instead of returning, said that he was in a hurry to go home and dress for church. Thereupon D. responded: "You come here." P. replied, "Yes, boss-man, of course if you order me to come, I'll come," and taking off his hat went to D., who cursed him and said, "Why can't you come when I call you." The trial court instructed the jury that if D. cursed P. and ordered him to come to him, and P. obeyed through fear, then D. was guilty of an assault. The defendant excepted.

[25] "It is not necessary to aver in a complaint to recover damages for an alleged assault and battery, that the beating was unlawful and wrongful." Carey v. Sheets (1877) 60 Ind. 17.

An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury upon the person of another. When it is charged that the defendant assaulted and beat the plaintiff, the legal implication is that the act was unlawful, and the burden of justifying his conduct is cast upon the defendant. Benson v. Bacon (1884) 99 Ind. 156; 3 Works Pr. 28.

Compare Singer Sewing Machine Co. v. Phipps (1911) 49 Ind. App. 116, 94 N. E. 793, where a complaint alleging that the defendant "did wrongfully and unlawfully make an assault on this plaintiff" was met with the objection on the part of the defendant that it stated a mere conclusion.

It has been the practice from an early day to plead an assault and a battery together, and to permit a recovery on whichever cause is proven. "For every battery includes an assault; therefore, if the assault be ill laid, and the battery good, it is sufficient." Jacob's Law Dictionary (1809) "Assault," 135.

See the declaration in Trespass for Assault and Battery in Whittier's Cases in Common Law Pl. 25. Compare the Statement of Claim for an assault in Cunningham & Mattinson's Precedents under the Judicature Acts (1884) 131: "The plaintiff has suffered damage from personal injuries to the plaintiff, caused by the defendant assaulting him on the 1st of May, 1882, and beating him about the head and shoulders." And see the form of Petition recommended by the Ohio Code Commissioners in 1853 for Assault and Battery: "Plaintiff says that on * * * at * * * the defendant assaulted and beat the plaintiff by which he says he is damaged to the amount of * * * dollars, for which he asks judgment."

PURSELL v. HORN et ux.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1838. 8 Adol. & E. 602, 112 Reprint, 966.)

Trespass. The declaration stated that the defendant Elizabeth assaulted the plaintiff, "and then cast and threw divers large quantities of boiling water on the plaintiff, and then also wetted, damaged, and spoiled the clothes and wearing apparel, to wit, one great coat, which the plaintiff then wore:" by means of which he was hurt, scalded, etc., and forced to expend money in endeavoring to cure himself. Plea of not guilty, with a verdict for the plaintiff for one farthing above his costs and 40s. costs.

On argument whether the case was within the statute of 22 & 23 Car. II., c. 9, which deprived of costs "in all actions of trespass, assault and battery, and other personal actions," where the damages were found below 40s. and the judge does not certify "that an assault and battery was sufficiently proved."

Waddington, for the defendant, obtained a rule nisi for amending the postea by substituting one farthing costs for 40s.

Humfrey, for the plaintiff, argued that this was not a case within the statute, because no battery was alleged. It is laid down in Com. Dig. Battery (C), that, "If a man strike at another, and do not touch him, it is no battery, but it will be an assault." So, "If he throws stones, water, or other liquor upon him." (Lord Denman, C. J. Is it no battery, if a man throws a stone at another and breaks his arm? The notion must have been that battery could not be committed except with something that the party held in his hand at the time; but that cannot be maintained.)

Waddington, contra, argued that "the words 'upon him,' in Com. Dig. Battery (C), must have been used by mistake."

LORD DENMAN, C. J. I think that a battery does not necessarily mean something done cominus. But it must imply personal violence. * * *

LITTLEDALE, J. The argument for the plaintiff on the first point would go the length of saying that to shoot at a person and hit him would be no battery. PATTESON and WILLIAMS, JJ., concurred.

Rule absolute.[26]

SCOTT, an Infant, by His Next Friend, v. SHEPHERD, an Infant, by His Guardian.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1773. 3 Wils. 403, 95 Reprint, 1124.)

Trespass and assault for throwing a lighted squib against the plaintiff and striking him therewith on the face and so burning one of his eyes that he lost the sight of it.

The defendant by his guardian pleaded not guilty, whereupon issue being joined, this cause came on to be tried at the last Summer Assizes for the county of Somerset, before Mr. Justice Nares; when it appeared by the plaintiff's evidence that in the evening of the 28th day of October 1770, at Milborne Port in the said county, it being the day the fair was held there, the defendant threw a lighted serpent, being a large squib, consisting of gunpowder and other combustible materials, from the street into the market-house, which is a covered building supported by arches, and inclosed at one end, but open at the other end and on both sides, when a large concourse of people were then assembled; and that the said lighted serpent or squib, so thrown by the defendant, fell upon the standing there of one William Yates, who was then exposing to sale gingerbread, cakes, pies and other pastry wares upon his said standing; that one James Willis instantly, and to prevent injury to himself and to the said wares of the said William Yates, took the said lighted serpent or squib from off the said standing, and then threw it across the said market-house, when it fell upon another standing there, of one James Ryall, on which he was also exposing the same sort of wares to sale; that the said James Ryall instantly, and to save himself and his goods from being injured, took up the said lighted serpent or squib from off the said standing, and then threw it to another part of the said market-house, and in so throwing it struck the plaintiff then in the said market-house in the face therewith, and the said lighted serpent or squib so striking against the plaintiff's face, and the combustible matter therein then bursting put out one of the plaintiff's eyes.

Upon this evidence the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with £100. damages, subject to the opinion of this Court; whether upon these facts this action is maintainable against the defendant.

NARES, J. * * * I am of the opinion that this action of trespass vi et armis doth well lie against the defendant. * * * It is objected that the plaintiff's eye was not put out by the immediate act of the defendant but by the immediate act of James Ryall, and therefore this action will not lie against the defendant, but would well have laid against Ryall.

I answer, that the act of throwing the squib into the market place was of a mischievous nature, and bespeaks a bad intention, and whether the plaintiff's eye was put out mediately or immediately thereby, the defendant, who first threw the squib, is answerable in this action: but supposing the defendant had no bad or mischievous intention when he threw the squib, yet as the injury done was not inevitable, this action well lies against him; for the malus animus of a defendant is not necessary to be alleged, proved or taken into consideration in this action; "but in felony it shall be considered, as where a man shoots [with a bow] arrows at butts and kills a man it is not felony, and it should be construed that he had no intent to kill him; and so of a tyler upon a house who with a tyle kills a man unknowingly, it is not felony: but where a man shoots at butts, and wounds a man, although that it be against his will, he shall be said to be a trespasser. 21 Hen. 7, 28 a." If the injury done be not inevitable, the person who doth it, or is the immediate cause thereof, even by accident, misfortune, and against his will is answerable in this action of trespass vi et armis; so is Stran. 596, Underwood v. Hewson, Hob. 134, Weaver v. Ward, Sir Thomas Jones, 205, Dickenson v. Watson, 6 Ed. 4, 7, 8. Sir Thomas Raym. 422. 4 Mod. 404, 5. If the act in the first instance be unlawful, trespass will lie; but if the act is prima facie lawful, and the prejudice to another is not immediate, but consequential, it must be an action upon the case, and this is the distinction laid down by Lord Chief Justice Raymond in Reynolds v. Clarke, 1 Stran. 635, 2 Ld. Raym. 1399, S. C. * * *

BLACKSTONE, J. I am of a different opinion. I take it here is no verdict; the declaration and special case are stated for the opinion of the Court, whether the facts in the case amount to an assault and battery vi et armis by the defendant upon the plaintiff?

The declaration alleges that the defendant threw, cast and tossed a lighted squib against the plaintiff, and struck him on the face therewith, whereby he lost his eye; this is laid as an immediate injury done by the defendant to the plaintiff, which is the gist of this action of assault and battery; for if the injury received from the act of the defendant was not immediate, but a consequence, trespass vi et armis will not lie, but it must be an action on the case; and my Lord Raymond, in the case of Reynolds v. Clarke, 2 Ld. Raym. 1402, puts the difference where he says, "The distinction in law is, where the immediate act itself occasions a prejudice or is an injury to the plaintiff's person, house, land, etc., and where the act itself is not an injury, but a consequence from that act is prejudicial to the plaintiff's person, house, land, etc. In the first case trespass vi et armis will lie; in the last it will not, but the plaintiff's proper remedy is by action on the case." And this distinction runs through all the cases which have been cited.

The lawfulness or unlawfulness of an act is not the criterion between these two actions, for a man may become an immediate trespasser vi et armis by doing a lawful act; as if a man doing an act lawful in itself, hurts another by accident, misfortune, and against the will of the actor, yet he shall be answerable in trespass vi et armis for immediate injury done; unless the injury was inevitable, 27 Hen. 7, 28a. 1 Stran. 596, and many other cases in the books to this purpose. Trespass on the case will lie for doing an unlawful act, if the damage sustained thereby be not immediate but consequential, 11 Mod. 108. The first act in the present case (I allow) was unlawful; but the squib by the first act did not strike the plaintiff, the first act was complete when it lay on Yates' stall, afterwards Willis a bystander threw it across the market-house, it fell on the stall of another man who threw it to another part of the market-house and struck the plaintiff therewith and put out his eye. Willis who took up the squib and threw it across the market-house is not answerable in trespass vi et armis, for he did that act to prevent injury to himself, and did no harm to any body. Willis and Yates gave the squib two new directions, acting as free agents, not by the instigation, command, request, or as servants of the defendant, but in defence of their persons, so the injury which happened to the plaintiff was the consequence of, and not done immediately by the first act of the defendant.

It is said the first act is not complete until the explosion of the squib; I admit the squib had no power to do mischief until the explosion; but it doth not follow from thence that the first act was not complete, at the instant the squib received a new direction from a second act. Suppose several persons are playing at foot-ball, which is tossed by many, and at last breaks windows; trespass vi et armis will only lie against the man who struck it against the windows. The throwing the squib against Yates' stall was the only act the defendant did. * * *

GOULD, J. I differ with my Brother BLACKSTONE, but with the utmost respect to his sentiments. I think that neither Willis nor Ryall are liable to an action in this case; if that be so, and this action will not lie against the defendant Shepherd who did the first act, which was unlawful, the plaintiff who has been greatly injured will be without remedy. The damage done did instantly arise by and from the act of the defendant: Willis and Ryall in defence of themselves and their goods, being in a state of fear, without power of recollection, instantly tossed and threw the squib away from themselves, what they did was inevitable, as it seemeth to me. Suppose a burning squib thrown into a coach passing along the street, and one of the persons therein throws it out, and the like misfortune as this happens; surely the person throwing the squib out of the coach might justify or excuse himself by pleading; though this is not so strong a case I think as the present. The defendant is the only wrong doer; his act put Willis and Ryall under an inevitable necessity of acting as they did, so neither of them is liable to an action: upon the whole I am of opinion judgment must be for the plaintiff.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE DE GREY. The distinction between actions of trespass on the case, and trespass vi et armis should be most carefully and precisely observed, otherwise we shall introduce much confusion and uncertainty; this is that kind of injury where the distinction is very nice. It strikes me thus; trespass vi et armis lies against the person from whom an injury is received by force. So the question is, whether this personal injury was received by the plaintiff by force from the defendant? Or whether the injury was received from, or resulting from a new force of another?

The real or true question (I think) is not whether the first act of throwing the squib by the defendant was lawful or not; for I see, that in doing a lawful act, trespass vi et armis will, in some cases, lie against the actor; and yet there are cases where trespass vi et armis will not lie against a person for doing an unlawful act. * * *

The throwing the squib by the defendant was an unlawful act at common law, the squib had a natural power and tendency to do mischief indiscriminately; but what mischief, or where it would fall, none could know; the fault egreditur è persona of him who threw the squib, it would naturally produce a defence to be made by every person in danger of being hurt thereby, and no line can be drawn as to the mischief likely to happen to any person in such danger; the two persons Willis and Ryall, did not act with or in combination with the defendant, and their removal of the squib for fear of danger to themselves seems to me to be a continuation of the first act of the defendant until the explosion of the squib; no man contracts guilt in defending himself; the second and third man were not guilty of any trespass, but all the injury was done by the first act of the defendant; here I lay the stress, and here I differ with my brother Blackstone; for I conceive all the facts of throwing the squib must be considered as one single act, namely the act of the defendant; the same as if it had been a cracker made with gunpowder which had bounded and rebounded again and again before it struck out the plaintiff's eye. I am of opinion that judgment must be for the plaintiff, and the postea was accordingly delivered to him, by the opinion of three judges against one.[27]

[27] Part of the opinion is omitted. The statement of the plaintiff's pleading is abridged.

This case is fully reported, also, in 2 Wm. Bl. 892, whose report is followed in 1 Smith L. C. (8th Ed.) 737. Compare Blackstone's statement of the principle in 3 Bl. Com. 123: "It is a settled distinction that where an act is done which is in itself an immediate injury to another's person or property, there the remedy is usually an action of trespass vi et armis; but where there is no act done, but only a culpable omission, or where the act is not immediately injurious, but only by consequence and collaterally; there no action of trespass vi et armis will lie, but an action on the special case, for the damages consequent on such omission or act."

See Holmes' Common Law, 104: "In the latter case [Scott v. Shepherd], it is pretty clear that the majority of the court considered that to repel personal danger by instantaneously tossing away a squib thrown by another upon one's stall was not a trespass, although a new motion was thereby imparted to the squib, and the plaintiff's eye was put out in consequence."

See, also, Terry's Leading Principles of Anglo-American Law, 75: "If one person wrongfully causes another to make one of those bodily movements which

The plaintiff declared that the defendant with force and arms drove a gig against a carriage in which the plaintiff's wife was riding, and overturned it, and greatly hurt the plaintiff's wife.

After verdict for the plaintiff Pell, Serjt., moved in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that this ought not to have been an action of trespass, but an action on the case, for that the declaration did not state that the carriage in which the plaintiff's wife was riding was the carriage of the plaintiff, nor aver any injury to the carriage, but was solely for an injury to the wife. Though that injury received by the plaintiff's wife arose out of an act of the defendant, yet it was in consequence of the defendant having run against the carriage of some other person, for such it must be intended to be, not being stated to be the carriage of the plaintiff, and no act could be more consequential in its nature, than this injury to the plaintiff's wife. The case of Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892, 3 Wils. 403, went beyond the law, but not so far as this. The Court granted a rule nisi.

GIBBS, Ch. J. I do not think I could point out any defect in the legal argument of either of the counsel, but the facts are not brought within the law stated by the defendant's counsel; for I am of opinion that he who throws over a chair or a carriage in which another person is sitting, commits a direct trespass against the person of him who is sitting in that carriage or chair, and that the action of trespass may be well maintained for it.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. Will Horn administered to Ernest Barrett a dose of croton oil, and the oil had an injurious effect on Barrett. Defendant admits he sold the oil to Horn, and at his request dropped it into a piece of candy. * * * Defendant is indicted for an assault on Barrett. If guilty, he must be so as a principal, and not as an accessory. His guilt, then, depends upon whether he knew or had reason to believe that the dose was intended for Barrett or some other person as a trick, and not for medicinal purposes.

The whole evidence was submitted to a jury who rendered a verdict of guilty. His honor instructed the jury that when the defendant sold the oil, if he "knew or had reason to believe, and did believe that it was intended for Barrett or some other person by way of a trick or joke, and not for a medicinal purpose, the defendant would be guilty of assault and battery."

He also charged that it was not necessary that it should be a poisonous or deadly dose; that it was sufficient if it was an unusual dose, likely to produce serious injury. To this instruction we see no objection. * * *[29]

GRAY, P. J. * * * The husband of the appellee was to pay the appellant $5. The appellant wrote a receipt which (whether against the will of the appellant or not was disputed) the husband took into his hands. The husband gave it to the appellee and she said something about it (but what, is also disputed), and the appellant then attempted to take it from her by pulling it out of her grasp. In this attempt the receipt was torn, but no injury came to the appellee from the force thus used. * * *

The appellant complained of the refusal of this instruction:

"The jury are further instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, with force, and without the consent of the defendant, obtained the possession of the receipt in question, with the intention of keeping the same without paying the money described in the receipt for the purpose of fraudulently using the same at some future time, then the defendant had a right to obtain the same, using no more force or violence than was necessary to obtain the same."

corn does not necessarily so connect him with the horses that the touching of the horses would be an assault and battery on him. There was no evidence that she by force obtained the possession of the receipt. If he was entitled to it, and she withheld it, a request must, in such a case, precede the exercise of force. Tullay v. Reed, 1 C. & P. 6, and cases cited in 2 Ch. Pl. 698 et seq., 16th Am. from 7th Lond. Ed.

The mere snatching of the paper, or a part of it, from her, was a technical assault, 1 Selw. N. P. 27; Respublica v. De Longchamps, 1 Dallas, 114, 1 L. Ed. 59; State v. Davis, 1 Hill (S. Lord Denman, Ch. J. (in summing up). * * * The society was, in my opinion, wrong in removing him without giving him distinct and positive notice that he was to come and answer the charge that was made against him, and I hold that he should have been told what the charge was, and called on to answer it, and told that it was meant to remove him if he did not make his defence. No proceeding in the nature of a judicial proceeding can be valid unless the party charged is told that he is so charged, is called on to answer the charge, and is warned of the consequences of refusing to do so. As no such notice was given here, I think that the removal was altogether a void act, and I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff is still a member of the society. Being so, it appears that he went to one of its meetings on the 30th of November, 1843, and was then prevented, by a policeman acting under the orders of the defendants, from entering the room. You will say, whether, on the evidence, you think that the policeman committed an assault on the plaintiff, or was merely passive. If the policeman was entirely passive like a door or a wall put to prevent the plaintiff from entering the room, and simply obstructing the entrance of the plaintiff, no assault has been committed on the plaintiff, and your verdict will be for the defendant. The question is, did the policeman take any active measures to prevent the plaintiff from entering the room, or did he stand in the door way passive, and not move at all.

Compare the remark of McKean, C. J., in Respublica v. De Longchamps (1784) 1 Dallas, 111, 114 (1 L. Ed. 59): "As to the assault [the defendant had struck a cane in the hand of the complainant] this is, perhaps, one of the kind in which the insult is more to be considered than the actual damage; for, though no great bodily pain is suffered by a blow on the palm of the hand, or the skirt of the coat, yet these are clearly within the legal definition of assault and battery, and among gentlemen too often induce duelling and terminate in murder."

Verdict for the plaintiff. Damages, 40s.[31]

THE LORD DERBY.

(United States Circuit Court, E. D. Louisiana, 1883. 17 Fed. 265.)

Admiralty Appeal.

The libelant, a pilot, was taken on board the steamship at the mouth of the Mississippi, and while on the voyage up the river to New Orleans he was very seriously bitten by a dog, which had been brought from Europe for sale in this country, and which was kept in the cabin, chained under the table. This suit was brought against the vessel in rem for damages suffered thereby by the libelant.

PARDEE, J. The questions presented in this case are: First. Is the proceeding properly brought against the ship?[32] * * *

1. It is contended that the case, as presented in the libel, shows a case of assault and battery, which, under the sixteenth admiralty rule, "shall be in personam only." The ingenuity which suggested the point has not failed to supply the court with an ingenious argument to support it. This definition is given of assault and battery, as taken from 3 East (Leame v. Bray) 593:

"Whenever one willfully or negligently puts in motion a force, the direct result of which is an injury, it constitutes an assault and battery, and the action brought should be trespass vi et armis."

An examination of the case shows that the brief goes further than the authority cited. The question before the court was whether the action was properly brought in trespass, and all the judges agreed that where an injury results directly from force trespass lies, but nothing is said of assault and battery. The other cases cited (Gibbons v. Pepper, 1 Ld. Raym. 39; Blackman v. Simmons, 3 Car. & P. 138) are also cases of trespass. An assault and battery is where one intentionally inflicts unlawful violence upon another, and if there is a case in the books which goes further than this, it is an unsafe case to follow. That there may be such gross negligence that an intent to injure may be inferred therefrom, may be conceded, and perhaps Blackman v. Simmons, supra, shows such gross negligence; but the case made by the libel does not show such negligence, nor does it bring such negligence home to any particular individual, as would be necessary in a case of assault and battery.

In my opinion the case made in the libel is very far from a case of "assaulting and beating," within the sixteenth admiralty rule. And the case, as disclosed by the evidence, seems to me to be a clear case of liability on the part of the ship. The dog inflicting the injuries on libelant was brought over on the ship, with the consent of the masters and owners, to be disposed of in this port. It was part of the cargo. The libelant was lawfully on board as pilot, and entitled to be carried safely. An injury to him from carelessness, or negligence in handling or caring for the dog, would entitle him to remuneration from the ship the same as if his injuries had resulted from goods falling on him, or from defective spars or rigging. * * *

A decree will be entered for the libelant.

HOLMES et ux. v. MATHER.

(Court of Exchequer, 1875. L. R. 10 Exch. 261.)

The first count of the declaration alleged that the female plaintiff was passing along a highway, and the defendant so negligently drove a carriage and horses in the highway that they ran against her and threw her down, whereby she and the male plaintiff were damnified. The second count alleged that the defendant drove a carriage with great force and violence against the female plaintiff and wounded her, whereby, etc. Plea, not guilty, and issue thereon.

At the trial the following facts were proved: In July, 1874, the defendant kept two horses at a livery stable in North Shields, and wishing to try them for the first time in double harness, had them harnessed together in his carriage. At his request a groom drove, the defendant sitting on the box beside him. After driving for a short time, the horses, being startled by a dog which suddenly ran out and barked at them, ran away and became so unmanageable that the groom could not stop them, though he could to some extent guide them. The groom begged the defendant to leave the management to him, and the defendant accordingly did not interfere. The groom succeeded in turning the horses safely around several corners, and at last guided them into Spring Terrace, at the end of which and at right angles runs Albion Street, a shop in Albion Street being opposite the end of Spring Terrace. When they arrived at the end of Spring Terrace the horses made a sudden swerve to the right, and the groom then pulled them more to the right, thinking that was the best course, and tried to guide them safely round the corner. He was unable to accomplish this and the horses were going so fast that the carriage was dashed against the palisades in front of the shop; one of the horses fell, and at the same time the female plaintiff, who was on the pavement near the shop, was knocked down by the horses and severely injured. The jury stopped the case before the close of the evidence offered on the defendant's part, and said that in their opinion there was no negligence in anyone. The plaintiff's counsel contended that since the groom had given the horses the direction which guided them against the female plaintiff, that was a trespass which entitled the plaintiffs to a verdict on the second count.

The verdict was entered for the defendant, leave being reserved to the plaintiffs to move to enter it for them for £50. on the second count, the Court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact, and to make any amendment in the pleadings necessary to enable the defendant to raise any defence that ought to be raised.

Herschell, Q. C., having obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs for £50., pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that, upon the facts proved, the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict on the trespass count,

C. Russell, Q. C., and Crompton, for the defendant, shewed cause.

BRAMWELL, B. I am inclined to think, upon the authorities, that the defendant is in the same situation as the man driving; but, without deciding that question, I assume, for the purposes of the opinion I am about to express, that he is as much liable as if he had been driving.

Now, what do we find to be the facts? The driver is absolutely free from all blame in the matter; not only does he not do anything wrong, but he endeavours to do what is best to be done under the circumstances. The misfortune happens through the horses being so startled by the barking of a dog that they run away with the groom and the defendant who is sitting beside him. Now, if the plaintiff under such circumstances can bring an action, I really cannot see why she could not bring an action because a splash of mud, in the ordinary course of driving, was thown upon her dress or got into her eye and so injured it. It seems manifest that, under such circumstances, she could not maintain an action. For the convenience of mankind in carrying on the affairs of life, people as they go along roads must expect, or put up with, such mischief as reasonable care on the part of others cannot avoid. I think the present action not to be maintainable.

That is the general view of the case. Now I will put it a little more specifically, and address myself to the argument of Mr. Herschell. Here, he says, if the driver had done nothing, there is no reason to suppose this mischief would have happened to the woman; but he did give the horses a pull, or inclination, in the direction of the plaintiff—he drove them there. It is true that he endeavoured to drive them further away from the place by getting them to turn to the right, but he did not succeed in doing that. The argument, therefore, is, if he had not given that impulse or direction to them, they would not have come where the plaintiff was. Now, it seems to me, that argument is not tenable, and I think one can deal with it in this way. Here, as in almost all cases, you must look at the immediate act that did the mischief, at what the driver was doing before the mischief happened, and not to what he was doing next before what he was then doing. If you looked to the last act but one, you might as well argue that if the driver had not started on that morning, or had not turned down that particular street, this mischief would not have happened.

I think the proper answer is, You cannot complain of me unless I was immediately doing the act which did the mischief to you. Now the driver was not doing that. What I take to be the case is this: he did not guide the horses upon the plaintiff; he guided them away from her, in another direction; but they ran away with him, upon her, in spite of his efforts to take them away from where she was. It is not the case where a person has to make a choice of two evils, and singles the plaintiff out, and drives to the spot where she is standing. That is not the case at all. The driver was endeavoring to guide them indeed, but he was taken there in spite of himself. I think the observation made by my Brother POLLOCK during the argument is irresistible, that if Mr. Herschell's contention is right, it would come to this: if I am being run away with, and sit quiet and let the horses run wherever they think fit, clearly I am not liable, because it is they, and not I, who guide them; but if I unfortunately do my best to avoid injury to myself and other persons, then, it may be said that it is my act of guiding them that brings them to the place where the accident happens. Surely it is impossible.

As to the cases cited, most of them are really decisions on the form of action, whether case or trespass. The result of them is this, and it is intelligible enough: if the act that does an injury is an act of direct force vi et armis, trespass is the proper remedy (if there is any remedy) where the act is wrongful, either as being wilful or as being the result of negligence. Where the act is not wrongful for either of these reasons, no action is maintainable, though trespass would be the proper form of action if it were wrongful. That is the effect of the decisions. In Sharrod v. London and North Western Ry. Co., 4 Ex. 580, the master was not present. In M'Laughlin v. Pryor, 4 Man. & G. 48, the defendant was present, and was supposed to be taking part in the control of the animals. In Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, 599, there was an act of direct force vi et armis, and there was negligence. I think, therefore, that our judgment should be for the defendant.

I think I could distinguish the case cited from the Year Book, but I will only say that there the defendant let out animals, liable to stray, whether frightened or not, in a place not inclosed, and without anybody to keep them in bounds.[33]

CLEASBY, B. I would only add a word as to a point on which my Brother BRAMWELL has not given judgment, and that is this. This is not a case where the act that is done must be justified, as where a man does a particular thing to avoid something else, but it is a case where it must be shewn that it was the act of the defendant himself. I sum up all in these words: in my opinion the horses were not driven there by the defendant's servant, but they went there in spite of him, so far as he directed them at all.

Rule discharged.

[33] The "case cited from the Year Book" is the case in Y. B. 21 Hen. VIII, with the comment upon it by Grose, J., in Leame v. Bray (1803) 3 East, 593, 599. See infra, "Inevitable Accident."

The arguments of counsel are omitted.

Accord: Goodman v. Taylor (1832) 5 Car. & P. 410: Trespass, because P.'s horse had been hit by D.'s pony and chaise. Plea, not guilty. The evidence showed that P.'s wife stood by the head of the pony holding it by the rein when a Punch and Judy show coming by frightened the pony so that he ran away, breaking from D.'s wife notwithstanding her best efforts to hold him. Chief Justice Denman was inclined to consider this "as an inevitable accident." See infra, "The Different Forms of Justification or Excuse in Trespass."

Steudle v. Rentchler (1872) 64 Ill. 161: D.'s horses had run over P. The evidence showed that a boy had hit one of the horses with some missile. He began to kick and frightened the other horse. The driver jumped from the vehicle and seized them by the head. They overpowered him and ran away.

Compare Vincent v. Stinehour (1835) 7 Vt. 62, 64 (29 Am. Dec. 145), where Williams, C. J., remarks: "The principle of law, which is laid down by all the writers upon this subject, and which is gathered from and confirmed by the whole series of reported cases, is that no one can be made responsible, in the action of trespass for consequences, where he could not have prevented those consequences by prudence and care. Thus it has been laid down, that if a horse, upon a sudden surprise, run away with his rider, and runs against a man and hurts him, this is no battery. Where a person, in doing an act which it is his duty to perform, hurts another, he is not guilty of battery. A man falling out of a window, without any imprudence, injures another—there is no trespass. A soldier, in exercise, hurts his companion—no recovery can be had against him. In the case of Gibbons v. Pepper (1695) 4 Mod. 405, it was distinctly decided, that if a horse runs away with his rider, against his will, and he could not have avoided it, and runs against another, it is no battery in the rider, and he can defend under the general issue. In the case of Wakeman v. Robinson (1823) 1 Bing. 213, in trespass for driving against plaintiff's horse, and injuring him with shafts of a gig, it was considered a good defence, that the horse was frightened by the noisy and rapid approach of a butcher's cart, and became ungovernable, so that the injury was occasioned by unavoidable accident."

Action by the administratrix of Annie E. Harten against Carroll Dunham and others. From a judgment of the appellate division (36 App. Div. 639, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1117) affirming a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendants appeal.

The plaintiff's intestate, a young lady 19 years of age, while traveling on a public highway near the village of Irvington, was killed by a blow from a section of a tree which fell upon her after it had been hurled more than 400 feet by a blast. The defendants Dinkel & Jewell, as co-partners, had been employed by the defendant Dunham, the owner of a tract of rough land, to blast out certain trees standing upon it. On the south side of the tract, about 300 feet from the nearest point of the highway in question, there was a large living elm tree, from 60 to 70 feet in height, between which and the highway was some woodland. Dynamite was placed under the roots of this tree and exploded, shattering it and throwing a section of the stump over the intervening forest, a distance of 412 feet, to a point in the highway where the plaintiff's intestate was traveling. She was struck by it with such force as to cause her death within a few hours.

This action was brought to recover damages for the benefit of the next of kin on account of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, caused, as alleged, by the wrongful act of the defendants. Notwithstanding their objection and exception, the case was submitted to the jury on the theory that it was not essential for the plaintiff to establish negligence in order to make out a cause of action. The judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff upon the first trial was reversed by the appellate division on account of erroneous rulings (10 App. Div. 438, 41 N. Y. Supp. 1083), but the judgment rendered in her favor upon the second trial was unanimously affirmed; and the defendants, having first obtained leave, now come here.

VANN, J. The main question presented by this appeal is whether one who, for a lawful purpose, and without negligence or want of skill, explodes a blast upon his own land, and thereby causes a piece of wood to fall upon a person lawfully traveling in a public highway, is liable for the injury thus inflicted.

The statute authorizes the personal representative of a decedent to "maintain an action to recover damages for a wrongful act, neglect, or default, by which the decedent's death was caused, against a natural person who, or a corporation which, would have been liable to an action in favor of the decedent, by reason thereof, if death had not ensued." Code Civ. Proc. § 1902. It covers any action of trespass upon the person which the deceased could have maintained if she had survived the accident. Stated in another form, therefore, the question before us is whether the defendants are liable as trespassers.

This is not a new question, for it has been considered, directly or indirectly, so many times by this court that a reference to the earlier authorities is unnecessary. In the leading case upon the subject the defendant, in order to dig a canal authorized by its charter, necessarily blasted out rocks from its own land with gunpowder, and thus threw fragments against the plaintiff's house, which stood upon the adjoining premises. Although there was no proof of negligence or want of skill, the defendant was held liable for the injury sustained. All the judges concurred in the opinion of Gardiner, J., who said: "The defendants had the right to dig the canal; the plaintiff, the right to the undisturbed possession of his property. If these rights conflict, the former must yield to the latter, as the more important of the two, since, upon grounds of public policy, it is better that one man should surrender a particular use of his land than that another should be deprived of the beneficial use of his property altogether, which might be the consequence if the privilege of the former should be wholly unrestricted. The case before us illustrates this principle; for if the defendants, in excavating their canal, in itself a lawful use of their land, could, in the manner mentioned by the witnesses, demolish the stoop of the plaintiff with impunity, they might, for the same purpose, on the exercise of reasonable care, demolish his house, and thus deprive him of all use of his property. The use of land by the proprietor is not, therefore, an absolute right, but qualified and limited by the higher right of others to the lawful possession of their property. To this possession the law prohibits all direct injury, without regard to its extent or the motives of the aggressor. * * * He may excavate a canal, but he cannot cast the dirt or stones upon the land of his neighbor, either by human agency or the force of gunpowder. If he cannot construct the work without the adoption of such means, he must abandon that mode of using his property, or be held responsible for all damages resulting therefrom. He will not be permitted to accomplish a legal object in an unlawful manner." Hay v. Cohoes Co., 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279. This case was followed immediately by Tremain v. Same, 2 N. Y. 163, 51 Am. Dec. 284,—a similar action against the same defendant,—which offered to show upon the trial "that the work was done in the best and most careful manner." It was held that the evidence was properly excluded, because the manner in which the defendant performed its work was of no consequence, as what it did to the plaintiff's injury was the sole question.

These were cases of trespass upon lands, while the case before us involves trespass upon the person of a human being, when she was where she had the same right to protection from injury as if she had been walking upon her own land. As the safety of the person is more sacred than the safety of property, the cases cited should govern our decision, unless they are no longer the law. * * *

We think that the Hay Case has always been recognized by this court as a sound and valuable authority. After standing for 50 years as the law of the state upon the subject, it should not be disturbed, and we have no inclination to disturb it. It rests upon the principle, founded in public policy, that the safety of property generally is superior in right to a particular use of a single piece of property by its owner. It renders the enjoyment of all property more secure, by preventing such a use of one piece by one man as may injure all his neighbors. It makes human life safer, by tending to prevent a landowner from casting, either with or without negligence a part of his land upon the person of one who is where he has a right to be. It so applies the maxim of "Sic utere tuo" as to protect person and property from direct physical violence, which, although accidental, has the same effect as if it were intentional. It lessens the hardship by placing absolute liability upon the one who causes the injury. The accident in question was a misfortune to the defendants, but it was a greater misfortune to the young woman who was killed. The safety of travelers upon the public highway is more important to the state than the improvement of one piece of property by a special method is to its owner. As was said by the supreme court of Indiana, in following the Hay Case: "The public travel must not be endangered to accommodate the private rights of individuals." Wright v. Compton, 53 Ind. 337.

We think the courts below were right in holding the defendants liable as trespassers, regardless of the care they may have used in doing the work. Their action was a direct invasion of the rights of the person injured, who was lawfully in a public highway, which was a safe place until they made it otherwise by throwing into it the section of a tree. * * *

The judgment is right and should be affirmed, with costs.

Accord: Wright v. Compton (1876) 53 Ind. 337 (D., quarrying stone near a public highway, by a blast of gunpowder threw fragments of stone against a traveller passing along the highway. Said the Court: "The question involved is not one of negligence on the part of the defendants. The act charged against them is itself unlawful—not the act of blasting and quarrying stone, but the act of casting fragments of rock against the plaintiff. * * * The defendants could not lawfully so use their stone quarry as to embarrass the rights of travellers along the public highway"); Hoffman v. Walsh (1906) 117 Mo. App. 278, 93 S. W. 853 (A blast lawfully set off, by D., without negligence, caused a piece of rock to strike P., standing on a scaffold, on the inside of a wall, some 500 feet distant).

Compare Cleghorn v. Thompson (1901) 62 Kan. 727, 64 Pac. 605, 54 L. R. A. 402: Dogs trespassing on D.'s land around his slaughter house had caused trouble. To get rid of the dogs, D. shot at one of them. The bullet, missing the dog, struck a stone, was deflected at a wide angle, and hit and killed P. There was no negligence on the part of D. Held, in the absence of negligence, there can be no recovery.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1831. 5 Ohio, 250.)

The action was for an assault and battery; verdict for the plaintiff. Three reasons were assigned for a new trial:

1. That the court charged the jury, that if the defendant incited or in any degree promoted the commission of the assault and battery upon the plaintiff, he was liable in this action, though not in a situation to afford any actual aid to the person who committed it. * * *

By THE COURT. All concerned in the commission of a trespass are considered principals. An assault and battery may be committed by a party not present, if he be a principal actor in or advisor and promoter of making the attack. If one person employ another to commit an assault and battery or any other trespass, and the act is perpetrated, both are guilty, and both responsible in damages. It was not supposed that this was now a debatable question. There is no error in the charge of the court. * * *

New trial refused.[35]

DAINGERFIELD v. THOMPSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 1880. 33 Grat. 136, 36 Am. Rep. 783.)

Thompson sued Daingerfield and Harrison for an alleged assault and battery. The facts, in brief, were as follows: Daingerfield and Harrison, about midnight, came to Thompson's restaurant. It was closed but a light was burning within. They demanded admission, pounding on the door. Failing to get in, Daingerfield said to Harrison, "Fire a salute." Harrison thereupon fired a pistol at the door. Thompson, who was just opening the door, was struck by the ball and badly hurt. Daingerfield subsequently testified that he had not supposed that Harrison "was fool enough to shoot into the house."

Both parties appeared by their attorneys, and the defendant Daingerfield moved the court that the cause be tried as to each of the defendants separately. This motion the court granted, and the cause was continued as to the defendant Harrison, and was proceeded with as to the defendant Daingerfield, upon the issue of not guilty as to him. And upon this issue the jury, after hearing the evidence, found a verdict for the plaintiff (the defendant in error), against the defendant Daingerfield, and assessed his damages at the sum of $8,000. Upon this verdict the Circuit Court entered its judgment for the sum of $8,000—the damages by the jury in their verdict ascertained, with costs. To this judgment a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court.

[35] The statement of facts is abridged and part of the opinion is omitted.

CHRISTIAN, J. * * * It is earnestly insisted however by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error (Daingerfield), that the evidence against him does not sustain the charge in the declaration, and in each count thereof, of assault and battery; that while such assault is proved against Harrison, who fired the pistol, it is not proved against Daingerfield; that he committed no assault, but simply advised and instigated an act which was in itself harmless, to wit: "Fire a salute," and that this act was not a trespass or assault as far as Daingerfield was concerned; that he did not direct Harrison to shoot Thompson, or to fire into his house, but simply to "fire a salute," and that Harrison did another and different act from the one which was advised and instigated by Daingerfield, and that the injury resulted from Harrison's act done differently from the act directed by Daingerfield, and consequently Daingerfield cannot be held liable in this action.

Now, the fatal defect in this argument is that the firing of a pistol in the streets of a city is not a harmless act, but, on the contrary, is an unlawful and dangerous act, prohibited and made unlawful by express ordinance. And besides, the evidence abundantly shows that even before the firing of the pistol Daingerfield and Harrison were joint trespassers upon the premises of Thompson. The firing of the pistol was an aggravation of the trespass, and being in itself an unlawful act (and that unlawful act causing the fatal injury), being instigated and prompted by Daingerfield, he is equally responsible with Harrison for its unhappy consequences, although it was not done maliciously and not done by the hand of Daingerfield.

The law is well settled that any person who is present at the commission of a trespass, encouraging or inciting the same by words, gestures, looks or signs, or who in any way or by any means countenances or approves the same, is in law deemed to be an aider and abettor, and liable as principal. 1 Hale P. C. 438; 3 Greenl. §§ 40, 41; McMannus v. Lee, 43 Mo. 206, 97 Am. Dec. 386, and cases there cited.

There seems indeed to be no principle of law better settled, and for which numerous authorities may be cited if necessary, than this: That all persons who wrongfully contribute in any manner to the commission of a trespass are responsible as principals, and each one is liable to the extent of the injury done.

The defendant Daingerfield being present, aiding and abetting and instigating Harrison, was equally guilty with him of an assault to the same degree as if he had fired the fatal shot himself. * * *

[36] The statement of facts is rewritten and part of the opinion is omitted.

Compare Bird v. Lynn (1850) 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 422: A boy who had been whipped by a man sued him in assault and battery and made a Mrs. Jouett a co-defendant. There was no evidence that Mrs. Jouett was present when the boy was whipped. But the court charged that if she "encouraged the trespass" she was a party to it. The verdict and the judgment went against her, and she

FORDE v. SKINNER et al.

False imprisonment, with a count for a common assault. Plea, general issue.

The defendants were the parish officers of the parish of Ninfield, in Sussex, and the plaintiff was a young woman, who was a pauper in the poor-house there. The false imprisonment was not proved; and the assault complained of was, that, on the 10th of December, 1829, the defendants sent for the plaintiff into a room in the poor-house, and by force, and against her consent, cut off her hair; and it appeared, that in the struggle, occasioned by her resisting, one of her arms was bruised. It was shewn that the plaintiff wore long hair, and kept it in a clean and neat state; and there was also evidence given that when the plaintiff had, shortly before, gone with two of the defendants before the magistrates at Battle, one of the defendants said, alluding to the plaintiff and her sister, who was also in the poor-house, that he would soon do something "to take their pride down." It also appeared that the sister's hair was cut off in a similar way.

BAYLEY, J. (in summing up). However desirable such a regulation as that of cutting off the hair of persons in a poor-house may be with regard to health and cleanliness, yet it is altogether unauthorized by law and is a wrongful act, if done without the consent of the party. If, in this case, it was done violently and with force, and with the malicious intent imputed, namely, "of taking down their pride," appealed. Marshall, C. J., delivering the opinion of the Court of Appeals, remarked as follows: "As Mrs. Jouett was not present when the trespass was committed, the word 'encourage' seems to be not sufficiently definite to express the true ground of liability. If Mrs. Jouett had directed Bird to whip or beat the plaintiff, and he had done it in consequence, this would, undoubtedly, have been an encouragement of the trespass, which would make her a party. If she had said in Bird's presence that the plaintiff was a bad boy and deserved a whipping, or that he had mistreated her, and she wished somebody would whip him, in consequence of which Bird had beaten him, this might, in some sense, have been deemed an encouragement of the trespass, and yet, unless she had used this language for the purpose or with the intention of inciting Bird to commit the act and of thus producing or procuring the trespass, we apprehend that Bird, though in fact committing the act, in consequence of what she had said, should be regarded as a mere volunteer, and that she would not be a co-trespasser on the ground of having encouraged the trespass. To make Mrs. Jouett liable as having encouraged the trespass by words used on a prior occasion, those words must have had a direct relation to the trespass, and have been calculated and intended to produce it by stimulating or exciting some person hearing them to do the act or procure it to be done. If it were sufficient that the act was done in consequence of the words spoken, then one person might be made a trespasser and even a felon against his or her consent, and by the mere rashness or precipitancy or overheated zeal of another, and the mere expression of just anger or resentment, or the statement of a fact calculated to excite indignation against an individual, and to create an opinion or desire that he should be chastised might make the party using such expressions or making the statement liable for the inconsiderate act of another."

and not with a view to cleanliness, that will be an aggravation, and ought to increase the damages. You will therefore decide on the motives which actuated the defendants, and according to that decision you will estimate the amount of damages.

Verdict for the plaintiff. Damages £60.[37]

ANDERSON v. ARNOLD'S EX'R.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1881. 79 Ky. 370.)

JUDGE PRYOR delivered the opinion of the court. Section 1 of chapter 10, General Statutes, provides: "No right of action for personal injury, or injury to real or personal estate, shall cease or die with the person injuring or the person injured, except actions for assault and battery, slander, criminal conversation, and so much of the action for malicious prosecution as is intended to recover for the personal injury; but for any injury other than those excepted, an action may be brought or revived by the personal representative, or against the personal representative, heir, or devisee, in the same manner as causes of action founded on contract."

The appellant, James Anderson, instituted his action in the Hardin circuit court, in which he alleges that on the ——— day of ———, in the year 1878, the appellee's testator negligently and recklessly, but not intentionally, inflicted a wound upon the body of the plaintiff (appellant) with a pistol; in other words, that the appellee's testator shot the plaintiff with a pistol, causing him great pain and bodily suffering, and for which he asks a judgment, etc. On the hearing of the cause, a demurrer was filed and sustained to the petition on the ground that the cause of action died with the person, and no action could be maintained against Arnold's personal representative.

In Courtney v. Kneib (1908) 131 Mo. App. 204, 110 S. W. 665, an action for assault and battery, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff made the first assault. The trial court refused to give the following instructions asked by the defendant: "The court instructs the jury that when the plaintiff got into the wagon of Phillip Kneib, Sr., for the purpose of taking the corn away from Philip Kneib, Sr., and Philip Kneib, Sr., then undertook to prevent him from so doing, and the plaintiff laid his hands upon the person of the said Philip Kneib, Sr., the plaintiff then committed an assault and battery upon the said Philip Kneib, Sr., and his conduct was in violation of the law." On this, Broaddus, P. J., delivering the opinion of the Kansas City Court of Appeals, remarked: "There is one very serious objection to said instruction, and that is that it seeks to make an assault and battery out of the fact that plaintiff merely laid his hand on defendant's father, Philip Kneib, Sr. Such an act of itself did not constitute an assault and battery. In order to have it made such, the act must have been accompanied with anger or some other circumstance of the kind evincing hostility. All concur."

And see In re Murphy (1884) 109 Ill. 31, 34: In our judgment malice was the gist of the action (for assault and battery) within the sense (in which) the word "malice" is used in the statute (as to arrests in civil action when malice "is not the gist of the action"). See, also, 3 Cyc. 1068: "Malice is the gist of the action for assault and battery."

Counsel for the plaintiff proceeded on the idea that the injury must be intentional in order to constitute it an assault and battery, and if involuntary, the remedy was by an action on the case: as if A. shoot at B. and wound C., the shooting of C. being unintentional is not an assault and battery on C., but the result of an assault on B.

The various statutes authorizing actions by the widow, heirs, and personal representative of one whose life has been lost by the negligence of another are not involved in the question presented in this case, and there is no reason why the court should depart from the common law rule in defining what constitutes an assault and battery, although the appellant may have sustained great injury. The action of trespass lies for injuries committed by force, and generally is only for such as are immediate. (Chitty's Pleadings, vol. 1, p. 190.) When the act complained of, and not the consequences of the act, causes the injury, the remedy is trespass and not case. "Nor," says Chitty, "is the motive, intent, or design of the wrong-doer towards the complainant the criterion as to the form of the remedy; and it is clear that the mind need not in general concur in the act that causes an injury to another; and if the action occasion an immediate injury, trespass is the proper remedy without reference to the intent." (Chitty's Pleadings, vol. 1, p. 147.) When on uncocking a gun it went off accidentally and wounded a bystander, it was held that the action was properly brought in trespass. So when the defendant, in firing his musket, accidentally wounded the plaintiff, trespass and not case was the remedy.

The familiar illustrations given in the elementary books as to the distinction between trespass and case settle the question here. When a log is thrown in the highway, and in the act of throwing it strikes one, it is a trespass; but if, when placed in the highway, one is injured by falling over it, case is the proper remedy. So of the lighted squib that was thrown in the market space, and afterwards thrown about by others in self-defense; the new impetus given to it by others was held to be a continuance of the original force, and trespass was the remedy. Following, therefore, this common law definition, it was an assault and battery committed upon the plaintiff, although the shot was fired at a third person; and the meaning of the words "assault and battery" will not be restricted to an actual and intentional beating of another so as to authorize the recovery. If an assault and battery at common law, the action does not survive, and that it was there can be no doubt.

Judgment affirmed.

VOSBURG v. PUTNEY.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1891. 80 Wis. 523, 50 N. W. 403, 14 L. R. A. 226, 27 Am. St. Rep. 47.)

The action was brought to recover damages for an assault and battery, alleged to have been committed by the defendant upon the plaintiff on February 20, 1889. The answer is a general denial. At the date of the alleged assault the plaintiff was a little more than 14 years of age, and the defendant a little less than 12 years of age. The injury complained of was caused by a kick inflicted by defendant upon the leg of the plaintiff, a little below the knee. The transaction occurred in a school-room in Waukesha, during school hours, both parties being pupils in the school. A former trial of the cause resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $2,800. The defendant appealed from such judgment to this court, and the same was reversed for error, and a new trial awarded. 78 Wis. 84, 47 N. W. 99. The case has been again tried in the circuit court, and the trial resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for $2,500.

On the last trial the jury found a special verdict, as follows: "(1) Had the plaintiff during the month of January, 1889, received an injury just above the knee, which became inflamed and produced pus? Answer. Yes. (2) Had such injury on the 20th day of February, 1889, nearly healed at the point of the injury? A. Yes. (3) Was the plaintiff, before said 20th of February, lame, as the result of such injury? A. No. (4) Had the tibia in the plaintiff's right leg become inflamed or diseased to some extent before he received the blow or kick from the defendant? A. No. (5) What was the exciting cause of the injury to the plaintiff's leg? A. Kick. (6) Did the defendant, in touching the plaintiff with his foot, intend to do him any harm? A. No. (7) At what sum do you assess the damages of the plaintiff? A. Twenty-five hundred dollars." The defendant moved for judgment in his favor on the verdict, and also for a new trial. The plaintiff moved for judgment on the verdict in his favor. The motions of defendant were overruled, and that of the plaintiff granted. Thereupon judgment for plaintiff, for $2,500 damages and costs of suit, was duly entered. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

LYON, J. Several errors are assigned, only three of which will be considered.

I. The jury having found that the defendant, in touching the plaintiff with his foot, did not intend to do him any harm, counsel for defendant maintain that the plaintiff has no cause of action, and that defendant's motion for judgment on the special verdict should have been granted. In support of this proposition counsel quote from 2 Greenl. Ev. § 83, the rule that "the intention to do harm is of the essence of an assault." Such is the rule, no doubt, in actions or prosecutions for mere assaults. But this is an action to recover damages for an alleged assault and battery. In such case the rule is correctly stated, in many of the authorities cited by counsel, that plaintiff must show either that the intention was unlawful, or that the defendant is in fault. If the intended act is unlawful, the intention to commit it must necessarily be unlawful.

Hence, as applied to this case, if the kicking of the plaintiff by the defendant was an unlawful act, the intention of defendant to kick him was also unlawful. Had the parties been upon the playgrounds of the school, engaged in the usual boyish sports, the defendant being free from malice, wantonness, or negligence, and intending no harm to plaintiff in what he did, we should hesitate to hold the act of the defendant unlawful, or that he could be held liable in this action. Some consideration is due to the implied license of the playgrounds. But it appears that the injury was inflicted in the school, after it had been called to order by the teacher, and after the regular exercises of the school had commenced. Under these circumstances, no implied license to do the act complained of existed, and such act was a violation of the order and decorum of the school, and necessarily unlawful. Hence we are of the opinion that, under the evidence and verdict, the action may be sustained. * * *[38]

RICHMOND v. FISKE.

Trespass by Richmond against Fiske. From a judgment in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals.

The case was submitted upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"Plaintiff was in the rightful possession of a tenement on the second floor of No. 152 Hancock street, Springfield. His tenement was reached by a flight of stairs, at the head of which was a door opening into a hall 12 or 15 feet long, at one end of which a door opened into the kitchen, and at the other end a door opened into plaintiff's sleeping room. The hallway was part of the plaintiff's premises, and the outer entrance was about midway of its length. Defendant was a milkman in the employ of the Springfield Milk Association, and he delivered milk to plaintiff at an early hour every morning. The hall and kitchen doors were left unlocked, so that defendant could enter, and leave the milk in the kitchen. For some time prior to the act complained of, defendant had, with plaintiff's permission, occasionally entered plaintiff's sleeping room, through the door from the hall, for the purpose of collecting the milk bills. Prior to the alleged trespass, plaintiff had forbidden defendant entering the sleeping room any more, and requested him to keep out. On the morning in question, after a night of suffering from sick headache, the plaintiff had dropped off into sleep, when defendant, entering the sleeping room from the hall, after having left milk in the kitchen as usual, and finding plaintiff asleep, took hold of his arm and shoulders, and used sufficient force to awaken the plaintiff for the purpose of presenting a milk bill. If, upon these facts, defendant was guilty of a trespass, as alleged, plaintiff is to be awarded such sum for damages as to the court shall seem just; otherwise judgment is to be for defendant."

FIELD, C. J. The declaration contains two counts,—one for an assault and battery upon the plaintiff, and the other for forcibly entering the plaintiff's close. The agreed facts show that the defendant entered the plaintiff's close by his permission. The fact that after the defendant entered, by permission, through the outer door into the hall, he went, against the commands of the plaintiff, into the plaintiff's sleeping room, does not constitute a trespass upon the close. Smith v. Pierce, 110 Mass. 35.

But the facts show a trespass upon the person of the plaintiff. Com. v. Clark, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 23. On the facts agreed, it must be taken that the defendant, against the express commands of the plaintiff, entered the plaintiff's sleeping room, and "took hold of his arm and shoulders, and used sufficient force to awaken the plaintiff, for the purpose of presenting a milk bill." If there were any circumstances which would justify this, they do not appear in the agreed statement of facts. Although the trespass is slight, the damages are not necessarily nominal, and they should be left to be assessed by the superior court.

The judgment should be reversed, and, in accordance with the agreed statement, the plaintiff's damages should be assessed under the first count. So ordered.

MOHR v. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1905. 95 Minn. 261, 104 N. W. 12, 1 L. R. A. [N. S.] 439, 111 Am. St. Rep. 462, 5 Ann. Cas. 303.)

Action to recover damages for an alleged assault and battery. There was a verdict for plaintiff for $14,322.50, whereupon the defendant moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, on the ground that, on the evidence presented, plaintiff was not entitled to recover, or, if that relief was denied, for a new trial on the ground, among others, that the verdict was excessive. The trial court denied the motion for judgment, but granted a new trial on the ground, as stated in the order, that the damages were excessive. Defendant appealed from the order denying the motion for judgment, and plaintiff appealed from the order granting a new trial.

BROWN, J. Defendant is a physician and surgeon of standing and character, making disorders of the ear a specialty, and having an extensive practice in the city of St. Paul. He was consulted by plaintiff, who complained to him of trouble with her right ear, and, at her request, made an examination of that organ for the purpose of ascertaining its condition. He also at the same time examined her left ear, but, owing to foreign substances therein, was unable to make a full and complete diagnosis at that time. The examination of her right ear disclosed a large perforation in the lower portion of the drum membrane, and a large polyp in the middle ear, which indicated that some of the small bones of the middle ear (ossicles) were probably diseased. He informed plaintiff of the result of his examination, and advised an operation for the purpose of removing the polyp and diseased ossicles. After consultation with her family physician, and one or two further consultations with defendant, plaintiff decided to submit to the proposed operation. She was not informed that her left ear was in any way diseased, and understood that the necessity for an operation applied to her right ear only. She repaired to the hospital, and was placed under the influence of anæsthetics; and, after being made unconscious, defendant made a thorough examination of her left ear, and found it in a more serious condition than her right one. A small perforation was discovered high up in the drum membrane, hooded, and with granulated edges, and the bone of the inner wall of the middle ear was diseased and dead. He called this discovery to the attention of Dr. Davis—plaintiff's family physician, who attended the operation at her request—who also examined the ear, and confirmed defendant in his diagnosis. Defendant also further examined the right ear, and found its condition less serious than expected, and finally concluded that the left, instead of the right, should be operated upon; devoting to the right ear other treatment. He then performed the operation of ossiculectomy on plaintiff's left ear; removing a portion of the drum membrane, and scraping away the diseased portion of the inner wall of the ear. The operation was in every way successful and skillfully performed. It is claimed by plaintiff that the operation greatly impaired her hearing, seriously injured her person, and, not having been consented to by her, was wrongful and unlawful, constituting an assault and battery; and she brought this action to recover damages therefor. * * *

The last contention of defendant is that the act complained of did not amount to an assault and battery. This is based upon the theory that, as plaintiff's left ear was in fact diseased, in a condition dangerous and threatening to her health, the operation was necessary, and, having been skillfully performed at a time when plaintiff had requested a like operation on the other ear, the charge of assault and battery cannot be sustained; that, in view of these conditions, and the claim that there was no negligence on the part of defendant, and an entire absence of any evidence tending to show an evil intent, the court should say, as a matter of law, that no assault and battery was committed, even though she did not consent to the operation. In other words, that the absence of a showing that defendant was actuated by a wrongful intent, or guilty of negligence, relieves the act of defendant from the charge of an unlawful assault and battery.

We are unable to reach that conclusion, though the contention is not without merit. It would seem to follow from what has been said on the other features of the case[39] that the act of defendant amounted at least to a technical assault and battery.[40] If the operation was performed without plaintiff's consent, and the circumstances were not such as to justify its performance without, it was wrongful; and, if it was wrongful, it was unlawful. As remarked in 1 Jaggard on Torts, 437, every person has a right to complete immunity of his person from physical interference of others, except in so far as contact may be necessary under the general doctrine of privilege; and any unlawful or unauthorized touching of the person of another, except it be in the spirit of pleasantry, constitutes an assault and battery. In the case at bar, as we have already seen, the question whether defendant's act in performing the operation upon plaintiff was authorized was a question for the jury to determine. If it was unauthorized, then it was, within what we have said, unlawful. It was a violent assault, not a mere pleasantry; and, even though no negligence is shown, it was wrongful and unlawful. The case is unlike a criminal prosecution for assault and battery, for there an unlawful intent must be shown. But that rule does not apply to a civil action, to maintain which it is sufficient to show that the assault complained of was wrongful and unlawful or the result of negligence. 1 Addison on Torts, 689; Lander v. Seaver, 32 Vt. 114, 76 Am. Dec. 156; Vosburg v. Putney, 80 Wis. 523, 50 N. W. 403, 14 L. R. A. 226, 27 Am. St. Rep. 47. * * *

[40] On the general principle, see also, Schloendorff v. Society of New York Hospital (N. Y. 1914) 105 N. E. 92: A patient to whom ether was being administered in the surgical ward of a hospital said to the attendant that there must be no operation but only an ether examination. The surgeon in charge operated while the patient was unconscious. "In the case at hand," said Cardozo, J., "the wrong complained of is not merely negligence. It is trespass. Every human being of adult years and sound mind has a right to determine what shall be done with his own body; and a surgeon who performs an operation without his patient's consent commits an assault, for which he is liable in damages." See, also, Pratt v. Davis (1906) 224 Ill. 300, 79 N. E. 562, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609, 8 Ann. Cas. 197; Rolater v. Strain (1913) 39 Okl. 572, 137 Pac. 96, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880.

Holt, Chief Justice, in evidence at the trial in an action of false imprisonment. And the plaintiff was nonsuit.[41]

[41] See Bird v. Jones (1845) 7 Q. B. 742, 68 R. R. 564, 115 Reprint, 668:

A part of Hammersmith Bridge which was ordinarily used as a public footway was appropriated for seats to view a regatta, and was separated for that purpose from the carriage way by a temporary fence. The plaintiff insisted in passing along the part so appropriated, and attempted to climb over the fence. The defendant then stationed two policemen to prevent, and they did prevent, the plaintiff from proceeding forward along the footpath; but he was told that he might go back to the carriage way, and proceed to the other side of the bridge if he pleased.

Coleridge, J. "* * * I am of opinion that there was no imprisonment. To call it so appears to me to confound partial obstruction and disturbance with total obstruction and detention. A prison may have its boundary large or narrow, visible and tangible, or, though real, still in the conception only; it may itself be movable or fixed: but a boundary it must have; and that boundary the party imprisoned must be prevented from passing; he must be prevented from leaving that place, within the ambit of which the party imprisoning would confine him, except by prison breach. Some confusion seems to me to arise from confounding imprisonment of the body with mere loss of freedom: it is one part of the definition of freedom to be able to go withersoever one pleases; but imprisonment is something more than the mere loss of this power; it includes the notion of restraint within some limits defined by a will or power exterior to our own. * * * If in the course of a night, both ends of a street were walled up, and there was no egress from the house but into the street, I should have no difficulty in saying that the inhabitants were thereby imprisoned; but, if only one end were walled up, and an armed force stationed outside to prevent any scaling of the wall or passage that way, I should feel equally clear that there was no imprisonment. If there were the street would obviously be the prison; and yet, as obviously, none would be confined to it. * * *"

Lord Denman, C. J. "* * * But this liberty to do something else does not appear to me to affect the question of imprisonment. As long as I am prevented from doing what I have a right to do, of what importance is it that I am permitted to do something else? How does the imposition of an unlawful condition show that I am not restrained? If I am locked in a room, am I not imprisoned because I might effect my escape through a window, or because I might find an exit dangerous or inconvenient to myself, as by wading through water or by taking a route so circuitous that my necessary affairs would suffer by delay? It appears to me that this is a total deprivation of liberty with reference to the purpose for which he lawfully wished to employ his liberty: and, being effected by force, it is not the mere obstruction of a way, but a restraint of the person. The case cited as occurring before Chief Justice Tindal, as I understand it, is much in point. He held it an imprisonment where the defendant stopped the plaintiff on his road till he had read a libel to him. Yet he did not prevent his escaping in another direction." * * *

HERRING v. BOYLE.

(Court of Exchequer, 1834. 1 Cr. M. & R. 377, 40 R. R. 610.)

Trespass for assault and false imprisonment. Plea, the general issue. At the trial, the following appeared to be the facts of the case:

The plaintiff, who sued by his next friend, was an infant about ten years old. He was placed by his mother, who was a widow, at a school kept by the defendant. The terms of the defendant's school were twenty guineas a year, payable quarterly. The first quarter, which became due on the 29th of September, 1833, was duly paid. On the 24th of December in the same year, the plaintiff's mother went to the school and asked the defendant to permit the plaintiff to go home with her for a few days. The defendant refused, and would not permit the mother to see the son, and told the mother that he would not allow him to go home, unless the quarter ending on the 25th of December was paid. The mother remonstrated, and said she would pay the quarter's schooling in a short time, but it was not due until the next day. A few days afterwards, the mother went again to the defendant at his school, and demanded from him to see her son, and be allowed to take him home with her. The defendant refused. On the 31st of December, the mother went again with a friend, and made the same demand; but the defendant refused to let her see the plaintiff, or to allow her to take him home, and he then claimed another quarter's schooling, as a few days of the quarter after the 25th of December had then elapsed, and he insisted on keeping the plaintiff until that amount also should be paid. A formal demand was afterwards made, and on a writ of habeas corpus being sued out, the plaintiff was sent home, seventeen days having elapsed after the first demand by his mother. No proof was given that the plaintiff knew of the denial of his mother, nor was there any evidence of any actual restraint upon him.

On these facts the learned Baron was of opinion that there was no evidence of an imprisonment to go to the jury, and he nonsuited the plaintiff.

Comyn obtained a rule to set aside the nonsuit and for a new trial, against which cause was now shewn by

Hutchinson, for the defendant: The nonsuit was right. There was no corporal touch or restraint on the plaintiff. The form of the proceeding in trespass shews that there must be an actual force. It must be laid contra pacem and vi et armis. Here there was no force or restraint for which either an indictment or action of trespass vi et armis was maintainable.

Comyn and Butt, contra: The boy was sent by his mother to the defendant's school. She had authority to place him in the care of the schoolmaster, and she had authority to determine his continuance there. Now it was proved that the authority from the mother to the master was withdrawn, and the defendant could not justify the detention after such authority was withdrawn. * * * Here, when the authority to keep the boy was withdrawn, the master persisted in detaining him for the purpose of extortion. (ALDERSON, B. The without special authority, and led in the direction of the gate, always with the privilege of paying and staying, and the alternative of not paying and going. Before reaching the gate, he paid the fee, and thereafter stayed and witnessed the game. Held, P. had no ground for an action for false imprisonment).

fallacy seems to me to be, that you assume, for the purpose of your argument, that every boy at school is in prison. If that were so, you would go a long way to convince us that when the authority to keep him there is at an end, his remaining at school might be an imprisonment. That however is not so with regard to a boy at school. In the case of a lunatic perhaps it might be different. A person of full age restrained as a lunatic, might probably be taken prima facie to be detained against his will.) The assent of a child of such tender years may perhaps be assumed, in the first instance, because the law will presume the assent of an infant to what is for his benefit; but that assent must be taken to be revoked when the contract for schooling is determined by the act of the mother. In the present case, the plaintiff was detained during the holidays, and it may fairly be presumed that keeping at school during the holidays, is against the will of a school-boy. (BOLLAND, B. The evidence did not bring the schoolmaster and the plaintiff into contact, so as to shew that there was any the least restraint of the one upon the other.) Every detention against the will is a false imprisonment, and every false imprisonment includes an assault in point of law, so that any argument to be derived from the form of the action for assault is totally unfounded. The only question is, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury of a detention against the will of the plaintiff. It is submitted that there was. The child was kept through the holidays, and it ought to have been left to the jury, whether that was not against the plaintiff's will. Besides, in the case of a child of such tender years, the will of the parent is to be considered as the will of the child, and in this case the will of the mother was sufficiently expressed. The master declared distinctly that he would detain him until he was compelled by habeas corpus to deliver him up; and he was detained at school, and such declaration of the master, coupled with the fact of the boy remaining at school during the holidays, was surely evidence to go to the jury that the master had acted on such declaration and had kept the boy there against the will both of his mother and himself. (ALDERSON, B. It is clear that the assent of the plaintiff would put an end to an action in this form; that shews that the will of the mother is not the will of the child. In the present case there was no proof that the master conducted himself to the boy in a different manner in any respect before and after the refusal to deliver him up to his mother; as against the mother he detained him unlawfully; he says in respect to the mother, I will not give him up to you without a habeas corpus. That might however be with or without the assent of the boy. The plaintiff was bound to prove his dissent, and not to leave that question in ambiguity.) Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was delivered on the next day:

BOLLAND, B. This was an action of trespass for assault and false imprisonment, brought by an infant by his next friend. * * * There are many cases which shew that it is not necessary, to constitute an imprisonment, that the hand should be laid upon the person; but in no case has any conduct been held to amount to an imprisonment in the absence of the party supposed to be imprisoned. An officer may make an arrest without laying his hand on the party arrested; but in the present case, as far as we know, the boy may have been willing to stay; he does not appear to have been cognizant of any restraint, and there was no evidence of any act whatsoever done by the defendant in his presence. I think that we cannot construe the refusal to the mother in the boy's absence, and without his being cognizant of any restraint, to be an imprisonment of him against his will; and therefore I am of opinion that the rule must be discharged.[42]

MOSES v. DUBOIS.

(Court of Appeals of South Carolina, 1838. Dud. 209.)

False imprisonment against the captain of a steamboat for carrying the plaintiff, a deputy-sheriff, to sea against his will. Verdict for $100. Motion for a new trial.

EARLE, J. Every unlawful restraint of personal liberty is an imprisonment, whether accompanied by corporal touch or not; whether in a house, in a ship, or in the street. But force of some sort must be used, and it must be a detention against the will; and it is indispensable that these two circumstances should unite. The force may be exhibited in a variety of ways without actual assault or corporal touch,—by locking a door after enticing one within, and refusing to open it for his departure; by setting sail or pushing off from shore, having one on board, and refusing to allow him to go ashore; or

Com. v. Nickerson (1862) 5 Allen (Mass.) 518: N. entered a school room and forcibly seized and carried away a boy of nine years, who had been placed in the school by his father, the legal custodian of the child. N.'s acts were under the direction of the mother of the boy, who, when he learned the purpose of the seizure, wished to have it carried out. N. had no actual knowledge that his acts were violating the father's legal rights. Held that such evidence sustained an indictment for false imprisonment. "Being in the actual custody of his father, whose will alone was to govern as to his place of residence and the selection of a teacher and custodian, this child of nine years of age was incapable of assenting to a forcible removal from the custody of his teacher, and a transfer to other persons forbidden by law to take such custody. He was under illegal restraint, when taken away from the lawful custody and against the will of his rightful custodian; and such taking is in law deemed to be forcible and against the will of the child." Wood v. Cummings (1908) 197 Mass. 80, 83 N. E. 318: D. locked the outside door of a building while P. was within, not to detain P., but as a means of protection against interference from without; the door was unlocked as soon as P. made known his desire to go out.

by detaining one on the highway by threats of personal violence if he departed. And it is equally essential that the person should be detained against his will; for if he voluntarily place himself in a situation where another may lawfully do that which has the effect of restraining liberty, especially if he refuse to depart when he may, he cannot complain that he is unlawfully imprisoned against his will. A sheriff's officer goes to the house of A. on the evening of an entertainment, with a bail process against one of his guests, and enters, as he lawfully may, and makes the arrest, A. refusing to assist him, but offering no hinderance; being unable to remove his prisoner, he chooses to remain until the close of the entertainment, expecting then to accomplish his purpose on the departure of the guests; but the prisoner, being on a visit there, remains. The officer, being informed that the doors are about to be closed, is requested to depart with his prisoner, if he can take him, else without him; but he is unable to take, and refuses to go without him. If A. should lock his doors and retire to rest, could the officer complain of false imprisonment if A. should refuse to rise at a late hour of the night, at his request, to open the door? I should think not. If a man enters a tavern and continues there all night against the will of the landlord, it is a trespass,—could he complain if the landlord shuts his door upon him? The general rule is, that a trespass will not lie for a mere nonfeasance; and it seems to follow from that proposition that when an act has been done, in the first instance lawful in itself, it cannot be rendered unlawful ab initio, except by some positive act incompatible with the exercise of the legal right to do the first act. Gates v. Lounsbury, 20 John. 429; Gardner v. Campbell, 15 ib. 401.

In the case made by the evidence it does not appear that the plaintiff was carried from the shore against his will, but the reverse. The destination of the boat was known,—the accustomed hour of departure was passed; the boat was in the act of getting under way; at that moment the plaintiff chose to go on board to arrest a person on a bail process, evidently under the mistaken impression as to the extent of his authority; and, seeing the boat leaving the wharf, he chooses to remain. Here, then, there was no unlawful detention, according to the principles I have laid down: the defendant was in discharge of his known and accustomed duty, and therefore in the performance of a lawful act, and the plaintiff was not detained against his will. At what time did the false imprisonment commence? After the boat had proceeded into the stream some distance from the wharf, the defendant came and proposed to the plaintiff to send him ashore with his prisoner, if he could take him, else to send him alone. The plaintiff refused to go unless the defendant would aid him in carrying his prisoner. It need not be repeated that this the defendant was not bound to do. It was his duty to interpose no obstacle to the arrest or the removal of the prisoner, but rather to afford such facilities as he could to the service of legal process. This he seems to have done, and more could hardly have been expected. On the refusal of the plaintiff to go ashore, the defendant proceeded on his voyage,—one on which the plaintiff knew the boat was in the act of departing when he went aboard. This was also the accustomed duty, the office of the defendant, and was therefore a lawful act.

If the defendant was not bound to aid in the arrest and removal of the prisoner, I do not perceive that he was bound either to delay his voyage or put back his boat to enable the plaintiff to procure assistance. When the boat had arrived at the mouth of the harbor, near Sullivan's Island, the plaintiff demanded to be put ashore, which the defendant then refused; here commenced the detention of the plaintiff against his will. Was it unlawful? I think it cannot be so held; the defendant only proceeded on his voyage. His refusal to send the plaintiff ashore at that time, which would have delayed his progress and put him in trouble, was a mere non-feasance, which if he had been guilty of no trespass up to that time, did not render him a trespasser ab initio: it was not a positive act, incompatible with the legal exercise of the right to proceed from the wharf, the plaintiff being on board.

Spoor v. Spooner (1847) 12 Metc. (Mass.) 281: A ship was on the point of sailing when P., a constable, came on board with a civil process to arrest the steward. The sails were set and the fasts, by which the ship was held to the wharf, were singled. P. immediately upon going on board, found and arrested the steward, but remained standing with him ten or twelve minutes without attempting to leave. In common with others, P. had repeated notice that the fasts were about to be cast off, and that all persons not belonging on board should quit the ship. After full notice, the fasts were cast off and the ship sailed with P. still on board. He sues the master in trespass for false imprisonment.

Williams v. Powell (1869) 101 Mass. 467, 3 Am. Rep. 396: P., a constable, attached the desk and law books of an attorney, in the office of D., an insurance broker, and placed a keeper over them. The property attached did not amount to more than $200 in value; but P. neglected to remove them during the five hours of daylight. P. then demanded of D. a key to the door of the office, that he might continue his possession through the night, and on being refused procured a key from a locksmith. It being near sunset, D. put another lock on the door and gave P. notice to remove the attached chattels immediately and leave the office. P. refused to leave, saying that he could not move the goods that night, but would move them early in the morning. D. then secured the door for the night, locking in P. and the keeper. P. sues for false imprisonment.

GARNIER v. SQUIRES.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1900. 62 Kan. 321, 62 Pac. 1005.)

Action by Garnier against Squires on three causes of action: First, for slander in charging plaintiff with the larceny of $500; second, for false imprisonment; third, for an unlawful search of plaintiff's premises. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error.

JOHNSTON, J. * * * The facts out of which the controversy arose are substantially as follows: On the night of February 14, 1878, Squires claimed that when he retired he had $500 in his vest pocket; that it was taken therefrom at some time during the night; that Garnier was in the house, and knew that defendant had the money; that the doors of the house were securely locked, and there was no one else in the house who could or would have taken the money. And he charged that Garnier stole it from him. On the next morning after missing his money Squires went to Garnier's place of business, and pointed a loaded revolver at Garnier's head and demanded $500 which he said Garnier had stolen from him. He admits in his pleading and in his testimony that he followed Garnier to his office, accused him of stealing his money, and that he threatened to shoot him if he did not unlock the safe and give him the money. The plaintiff says that about 9 o'clock in the morning, and while he was busy, some one approached him with an oath, saying, "If you don't give me that five hundred dollars you stole from me, I will blow you full of holes," and that when he looked around he was facing a revolver in the hands of Mr. Squires; that Squires held a revolver on him and made him unlock the safe; that he was scared and thought Squires was going to kill him. But the money was not found in the safe or on the premises, and no direct proof was offered of the stealing of the money by any one. The defendant alleged that he honestly believed, and still believes, that Garnier stole the money from him.

After the testimony was received the court instructed the jury:

"If you believe from the evidence that the defendant lost said sum of $500, and had reasonable grounds for believing that the plaintiff had stolen it from him, and without malice towards the plaintiff, but in an endeavor to recover said sum of $500, went to the place of business of the plaintiff and there demanded a return of said money, and there accused the plaintiff of having stolen said money, and detained the plaintiff by pointing at him a loaded revolver, then you should render a verdict for the defendant."

Objection was made to this instruction when it was given, and it constitutes the principal ground assigned for the reversal of the judgment that was rendered against the plaintiff. It was intended to apply to the testimony given in support of the count for false imprisonment, and we think it does not correctly state the law applicable to that phase of the case. The testimony in the case justified a charge as to what were the constituent elements of false imprisonment, chief of which are the detention and restraint, and the unlawfulness of such detention and restraint. The testimony for the plaintiff tended to show actual restraint for a short time, accomplished through fear of violence and bodily harm. It is true, there was no judicial proceeding, no warrant of arrest, nor any manual touching or taking into custody. But these are not essential elements. "False imprisonment is necessarily a wrongful interference with the personal liberty of an individual. The wrong may be committed by words alone or by acts alone, or by both, and by merely operating on the will of the individual, or by personal violence, or by both. It is not necessary that the individual be confined within a prison or within walls, or that he be assaulted or even touched. It is not necessary that there should be any injury done to the individual's person or to his character or reputation; nor is it necessary that the wrongful act be committed with malice or ill will, or even with the slightest wrongful intention; nor is it necessary that the act be under color of any legal or judicial proceeding. All that is necessary is that the individual be restrained of his liberty without any sufficient legal cause therefor, and by words or acts which he fears to disregard." Comer v. Knowles, 17 Kan. 436.[44]

Judgment reversed.

SMITH v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1846. 7 Humph. 43.)

Rodgers, with horse and carryall, was carried over the Chucky river by Smith in his ferry boat. Smith was the keeper of a public ferry. When over, Smith demanded the ferriage, which Rodgers said was already paid; on this a dispute occurred, and Smith told him he should not go on till he paid the ferriage. Some other conversation ensued, when Rodgers paid the ferriage demanded. Rodgers was detained ten or fifteen minutes.

An indictment was found against Smith for an assault and false imprisonment. Rodgers stated on the trial that Smith had not touched his bridle or his horse; that he made no effort to strike or touch his person or his horse; and that he made no threats of personal violence, but that he was afraid of a difficulty with Smith. Smith told Rodgers, after he had paid the charge, that if he had not paid it he had determined to have put his carryall and horse back into the boat, and to have carried them back. A verdict and judgment were rendered for the state, and defendant appealed.

GREEN, J. The court charged the jury:

"That, to make out the offence as charged, no actual force was necessary, but that a man might be assaulted by being beset by another; and if the opposition to the prosecutor's going forward was such as a prudent man would not risk, then the defendant would, in contemplation of law, be guilty of false imprisonment."

This charge is correct in all its parts, and the facts were fairly left to the jury. A verdict of guilty has been pronounced, and we do not feel authorized to disturb it. The prosecutor and defendant disputed about the ferriage defendant claimed. Smith insisted upon his demand, and said he did not choose to sue every man that crossed at his ferry. Although he did not take hold of the prosecutor, or offer violence to his person, yet his manner may have operated as a moral force to detain the prosecutor.

And this appears the more probable, as, after the affair was settled, the prosecutor inquired what defendant would have done if he had not paid the ferriage demanded, to which the defendant replied, "he would have put his carryall and horse back into the boat and taken them across the river again." As this determination existed in his mind, it doubtless was exhibited in the manner of the defendant, and thus operated upon the fears of the prosecutor.

Affirm the judgment.[45]

[45] Compare Hebrew v. Pulis (1906) 73 N. J. Law, 621, 64 Atl. 121, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 580, 118 Am. St. Rep. 716: P., a maid servant in the employ of S., was suspected by S. of stealing a ring. S. called in a policeman in uniform, D., and summoned P. to their presence. D. asked P. if she had the ring. P. denied having it or knowing where it was. After further parley D. roughly ordered P. to go to her room "and strip herself to the hide," remarking: "We are going to search every piece of clothing you own. I am going to find that ring." P. protested but made no physical resistance, and the search was made by S. as directed, D. meanwhile standing at the door. On the question whether there was an imprisonment although D. did not lay a hand on P., Swayze, J., remarked: "The fact that Pulis [D.] was a police officer and known to the plaintiff to be such, that she was confronted not only by him, but her employers, that she was suspected of larceny for which the officer might arrest her if he had reasonable ground to believe that the crime had been committed, warranted her in believing that if she failed to submit to Pulis' demands she would be actually arrested. The emphatic language in which the officer commanded her to strip to the hide was calculated to terrorize a girl in her situation, and the very fact that the officer, wholly without right, asserted such authority and gave such a command justifies the inference that he and his employers and codefendants intended to terrorize the plaintiff and to secure the effect of a search without legal process. If it was only intended to secure the consent of the plaintiff to a thorough search, the presence of the police officer was quite unnecessary. The appeal of the Misses Sands would have been as persuasive as the command of the officer, but for his seeming authority. We think the case at least presents a question for the jury, and that the reason given by the learned trial judge is not sufficient to justify his conclusion. We think, further, that the nonsuit cannot be sustained on any other ground. There is, indeed, no proof that the defendants laid hands on the plaintiff; but that is unnecessary. Whatever doubt may have been thrown upon this question by some of the earlier English cases is now removed by the later authorities. Grainger v. Hill (1838) 4 Bingham, N. C., 212; Warner v. Riddiford (1858) 4 Common Bench, N. S., 180. The American cases are to the same effect. Bissell v. Gold (1828) 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 210, 19 Am. Dec. 480; Pike v. Hanson (1838) 9 N. H. 491; Brushaber v. Stegemann (1871) 22 Mich. 266; Johnson v. Tompkins (1833) Baldw. 571, 601, 602, Fed. Cas. No. 7,416. The essential thing is the constraint of the person. This constraint may be caused by threats, as well as by actual force; and the threats may be

Action by Fotheringham against the Adams Express Company. Verdict for the plaintiff. Motion for a new trial.

THAYER, J. * * * I entertain no doubt that the jury were warranted in finding that plaintiff was unlawfully restrained of his liberty from about the 27th or 28th of October until the 10th of November following; that is to say, for a period of about two weeks. The testimony in the case clearly showed that during that period he was constantly guarded by detectives employed by defendant for that purpose; that he was at no time free to come and go as he pleased; that his movements were at all times subject to the control and direction of those who had him in charge; that he was urged by them on several occasions to confess his guilt, and make known his confederates; and that he was subjected to repeated examinations and cross-examinations touching the robbery, of such character as clearly to imply that he was regarded as a criminal, and that force would be used to detain him if he attempted to assert his liberty. The jury in all probability found (as they were warranted in doing) that during the time plaintiff remained in company with the detectives, he was in fact deprived of all real freedom of action, and that whatever consent he gave to such restraint was an enforced consent, and did not justify the detention without a warrant. It is manifest that the court ought not to disturb the finding on that issue. * * *

Motion overruled.[46]

by conduct or by words. If the words or conduct are such as to induce a reasonable apprehension of force, and the means of coercion are at hand, a person may be as effectually restrained and deprived of liberty as by prison bars. Unless it is clear that there is no reasonable apprehension of force, it is a question for the jury whether the submission was a voluntary act, or brought about by fear that force would be used. No doubt cases may arise where it will be a question of difficulty to determine how far the free will of the plaintiff was overcome, but that determination rests with the jury."

The verdict was for $20,000 damages. The court overruled the motion for a new trial only on condition that the plaintiff "remit at least 40 per cent. of the verdict within the next five days."

While a motion for a new trial was pending in this action P. was "rough shadowed," at D.'s instance, by detectives. BENEDICT, J. These cases can be disposed of together. In each case the libelant seeks to recover of the defendant damages for false imprisonment. The wrongful detention of the men on board his vessel by the defendant is admitted. But it is not a case for large damages; no loss resulted to the libelants from their detention. If $100 be paid each libelant, a sufficient remuneration will be received for the infringement of their personal rights and any inconvenience to which they were put.

TALCOTT v. NATIONAL EXHIBITION CO.

(Supreme Court of New York. Appellate Division, 1911. 144 App. Div. 337. 128 N. Y. Supp. 1059.)

CARR, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of a Trial Term of the Supreme Court in Westchester county, entered upon a verdict of a jury in an action for false imprisonment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The facts are as follows:

On the morning of the 8th of October, 1908, the plaintiff went into the inclosure of the defendant in the city of New York to buy some reserved seats for a baseball game which was to be held there in the afternoon of that day. These seats were sold at a number of booths within the inclosure. The plaintiff was unsuccessful in his quest, as all the reserved seats had been sold. He tried to leave the inclosure through some gates used generally for ingress and exit. A considerable number of other persons were trying to leave the inclosure through the same gates at the same time. It appears that the baseball game which was to take place was one of very great importance to those interested in such games, and a vast outpouring of people were attracted to it. Many thousands of these came early in the day to seek admittance to the ball grounds, and the result was that the various gates used generally for entrance or exit were thronged with a dense mass of people coming in. The plaintiff was prevented by the servants of the defendant from attempting to pass out through this throng, and as a result of this interference he was detained in the inclosure for an hour or more, much to his annoyance and personal inconvenience. The plaintiff and those similarly situated made many attempts to get out through these gates, and in the restraint put upon them to defeat their efforts they were subjected to some hauling and pushing by the defendant's special policemen. Finally the plaintiff and the others were taken through a club house within the inclosure and allowed to go out through the entrance to the club house to the street.

Concededly the plaintiff had a legal right to leave the inclosure, and the defendant had no legal right to detain him therein against his will. But the right of each had corresponding duties. A temporary interference with the plaintiff's legal right of egress could be justified as a proper police measure, if the plaintiff sought to exercise such right under circumstances likely to create disorder and danger. Assuming, however, that the defendant was justified in preventing the plaintiff from passing out through the gates in question, it should have directed him to pass out through some other means of exit, if there were any. The plaintiff told the agents of the defendant of his desire to get out, but received no directions or suggestions how to get out. The defendant claims that the plaintiff might have gone out through other gates in another portion of the field used for the entrance of motor cars and other vehicles; but the plaintiff swears that he did not know of the other gates, and there is no proof that his attention was called to them in any way when he and the others sought to go out. He got out in the end, not through the gates for vehicles, but through the club house, on the permission and direction of the defendant. Granting that the restraint placed upon the plaintiff in preventing his going out through the gateways through which he sought exit was justifiable as a police measure, yet the defendant owed him an active duty to point out the other existing methods of egress. It could not stand idly by and simply detain and imprison the plaintiff against his will.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBINSON v. BALMAIN NEW FERRY CO., Limited.

(Judicial Committee of the Privy Council [1910] A. C. 295.)

Appeal by special leave from an order of the High Court of Australia, reversing a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales which discharged a rule nisi for a new trial or a verdict for the defendants in an action by the appellant, a barrister-at-law of the State of New South Wales, for assault and false imprisonment.

The respondents carry on the business of a harbour steam ferry between the city of Sydney and Balmain and have on the Sydney side of their steam ferry a wharf and premises held by them under lease from the Sydney Harbour Trust Commissioners. A barrier with two turnstiles separates the wharf from the street. Persons coming upon the wharf enter it by one of the turnstiles and leave it by the other. There is also a gate with a door in it opening parallel to the street and at right angles to the turnstiles. At each turnstile an officer of the respondents is stationed. By the lawful regulations of the respondents, one penny has to be paid by all persons entering the wharf to the officer at the entry turnstile and by all persons leaving the wharf to the officer at the exit turnstile. No other charge is made for the use of the ferry, either to or from Balmain. The turnstiles automatically register the number of persons passing through them and so check the takings of the two officers.

A few feet above the two turnstiles and on each side of the barrier is a notice board placed so as to be seen by passengers, on which is painted the words "Notice. A fare of one penny must be paid on entering or leaving the wharf. No exception will be made to this rule, whether the passenger has travelled by the ferry or not."

On June 5, 1905, at about 7:45 P. M., the appellant entered the wharf by the entry turnstile, intending to cross to Balmain by one of the respondents' steamers. He paid one penny to Penson, the officer of the respondents in charge of the entry turnstile. Finding that the next steamer would not start for some twenty minutes, the appellant informed Penson of his wish to leave the wharf, and was directed by him to the exit turnstile. Anderson, the officer in charge thereof, demanded a penny, which the appellant declined to pay. He then endeavoured to force his way past the two officers, who for a time prevented him. Eventually he succeeded in getting past them and squeezed himself through a narrow space between the entry turnstile and the bulkhead into the street.

At the trial Darley, C. J., refused to nonsuit, directing the jury that there was no evidence that the appellant knew of the notice when he went onto the respondents' wharf. The jury found a verdict for the appellant for £100.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD LOREBURN, L. C. * * * The plaintiff paid a penny on entering the wharf to stay there till the boat should start and then be taken by the boat to the other side. The defendants were admittedly always ready and willing to carry out their part of this contract. Then the plaintiff changed his mind and wished to go back. The rules as to the exit from the wharf by the turnstile required a penny for any person who went through. This the plaintiff refused to pay, and he was by force prevented from going through the turnstile. He then claimed damages for assault and false imprisonment.

There was no complaint, at all events there was no question left to the jury by the plaintiff's request, of any excessive violence, and in the circumstances admitted it is clear to their Lordships that there was no false imprisonment at all. The plaintiff was merely called upon to leave the wharf in the way in which he contracted to leave it. There is no law requiring the defendants to make the exit from their premises gratuitous to people who come there upon a definite contract which involves their leaving the wharf by another way; and the defendants were entitled to resist a forcible passage through their turnstile.

The question whether the notice which was affixed to these premises was brought home to the knowledge of the plaintiff is immaterial, because the notice itself is immaterial.

When the plaintiff entered the defendants' premises there was nothing agreed as to the terms on which he might go back, because neither party contemplated his going back. When he desired to do so the defendants were entitled to impose a reasonable condition before allowing him to pass through their turnstile from a place to which he had gone of his own free will. The payment of a penny was a quite fair condition, and if he did not choose to comply with it the defendants were not bound to let him through. He could proceed on the journey he had contracted for.

Under these circumstances their Lordships consider that, when the defendants at the end of the case submitted that there ought to be a nonsuit, the learned judge ought to have nonsuited the plaintiff. * * *

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.[47]

WHITMAN v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1911. 85 Kan. 150, 116 Pac. 234, 34 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1029, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 722.)

Action by Whitman against the railway company for a personal injury. Judgment for the plaintiff and defendant appealed.

The plaintiff recovered a judgment against the railway company for $400 on account of injuries received in alighting from the caboose of a freight train at the station of Cherryvale. At the time of the injury, he was 75 years of age. When the train reached Cherryvale about dusk, it did not stop at the depot, but continued across Main street in order not to block that street, and came to a stop about 275 feet from the depot. The plaintiff expected the train to stop at the depot, and, fearing that he would be carried past his station, left his seat and went upon the platform. Thinking that the train was going slowly enough he attempted to get off, and was thrown or fell to the ground, and sustained a fracture of the leg. When he came out on the platform, the conductor was standing there, facing toward the front of the train and signaling to the engineer with a lantern. After the train stopped and the conductor learned that some one had been hurt, he went to where the plaintiff lay upon the pavement, and informed him that he would have to obtain a statement in regard to the accident; that the law required the conductor to obtain such statement from every injured passenger. A cab was called, plaintiff, at his request, was lifted into it, and, at the direction of the conductor, he was driven to where the caboose was standing. The conductor brought his papers from the caboose, got into the cab with the plaintiff, and filled out the blank forms, which the plaintiff then signed. One of these was a personal injury report required by the company's rules, and the other was a report required by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Immediately after the statements were signed, plaintiff was taken to his home. When plaintiff purchased his ticket at Independence, he signed a freight train release authorized by a statute then in force, releasing the company from liability for loss or damage to his person while on such train, or while going to or from the same, except in case of willful negligence.

Plaintiff relied upon two causes of action. The first was based upon an alleged willful injury, the second, upon an alleged unlawful restraint by the conductor.

PORTER, J. * * * In the case at bar it appears from the evidence that the rules of the company required the conductor to send in a report of all accidents, and the company furnished him with a blank for the purpose of obtaining a statement of any passenger who might be injured, with instructions that: "This blank should be filled out immediately upon the happening of the accident, if the injured party is able. If not, then at the earliest time thereafter." The company also furnished the conductor a blank prepared in conformity with the interstate commerce law, to be signed by the injured passenger, which contained the following statement: "To Passengers: The law requires railway companies to report accidents to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That this law may be complied with you are requested to fill the following blank." The rules of the company authorized the conductor to obtain from any injured passenger a statement in writing; but there was no law nor any rule of the company which required a passenger to make either statement, and it will not be seriously contended that what the conductor told the plaintiff as to the law was true. It was a misrepresentation which, according to the plaintiff's evidence, induced him to consent, while suffering from his injuries and desiring needed medical attention, to remain there until what he had been falsely informed was a requirement of the law had been complied with. This amounted to an unlawful restraint of his personal liberty, and it is obvious that the same principle should apply as though he had suffered an unlawful imprisonment, notwithstanding there is no evidence of such coercion by the conductor as to bring the case squarely within the rules which ordinarily govern in cases of false imprisonment. The conductor had the right to request him, if able, to make the statement, but had no right to induce him to remain and make the statements by misrepresenting that the law of the state required him to make them at that time and place.

Probably the injuries sustained by plaintiff by reason of this unlawful detention were slight; but that does not affect the principle involved. If he had sustained a severed artery which required immediate attention to prevent him from bleeding to death, and the conductor had used the same unlawful means to detain him, and procured the statement against his will, the case would only differ in degree, but not in principle. The giving of the instruction complained of cannot, therefore, be regarded as error, although it might have been worded differently in order to apply to the actual facts in evidence. All that was necessary, in order for the plaintiff to recover upon the second cause of action, was to show that he was unlawfully restrained of his liberty without any sufficient legal cause therefor, and by words or acts which he feared to disregard. He testified that he agreed to remain and make the statements, because he had been informed that the law required him to do so. This, in connection with his age, his suffering, and his helpless condition, and all the circumstances in evidence, would warrant a jury in finding that he was restrained by words and acts which he feared to disregard.

The defendant contends further that, if the acts of the conductor amounted to an unlawful restraint of the plaintiff, they were not within the scope of his authority. The evidence shows that the printed instructions of the conductor were to obtain a statement from the injured passengers; the instructions reading: "All conductors of trains carrying passengers must have a supply of this form on hand at all times when on duty, and as soon as possible after the occurrence of an accident, the conductor will obtain from each passenger, * * * whether injured or not, a statement hereon and forward by the first train to the superintendent." The defendant having instructed its servant and employé to obtain the statement from any injured passenger must be held to have authorized him to use what he considered necessary means to obtain it. Defendant relies upon the recent case of Crelly v. Telephone Co., 84 Kan. 19, 113 Pac. 386, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328, where the local manager of a telephone company was held not to have been acting in the scope of his employment when he violently assaulted and beat an operator who was about to quit the service, because she refused to sign a voucher for the compensation due her. The opinion in that case quotes Collette v. Rebori, 107 Mo. App. 711, 82 S. W. 552, holding that the master is liable for the tortious acts of his servant when it is shown that the act complained of was done as a means or for the purpose of doing the work assigned by the master. The conductor was authorized to obtain from the passenger the statement, and, for the purpose of obtaining it, he represented to him that the law required the statement to be made. This is far different in principle from the act of a servant in committing an assault which would be unlikely to bring about the accomplishment of the purpose. The representation that the law required the report to be signed by the passenger was something quite likely to induce compliance with the request, and which the company might well have anticipated its servant would do. The tendency of modern decisions is to a wider interpretation of the implied authority of the servant in cases of this kind (19 Cyc. 329), especially where the relation of carrier and passenger exists. A., T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Henry, 55 Kan. 715, 723, 41 Pac. 952, 29 L. R. A. 465. Unquestionably the plaintiff was a passenger at the time the conductor detained him. He was injured in alighting from the train at his destination. Before he had been removed from the company's right of way, the conductor took control over him for the purpose of obtaining a statement from him as an injured passenger, and we think the relation of carrier and passenger continued during the time the conductor detained him. We think the acts of the conductor were fairly and reasonably within the scope of his employment.[48]

BENNETT v. AUSTRO AMERICANA S. S. CO.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1914. 147 N. Y. Supp. 193.)

Bennett brought an action in New York for an alleged false imprisonment. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, the plaintiff appeals.

CARR, J. On the trial of this action, the complaint was dismissed by the trial court at the close of the defendant's evidence, and judgment was entered accordingly, from which the plaintiff appeals. The only question involved in the case before us is whether, considering the plaintiff's proofs in their most favorable aspect, he has made out a cause of action. He is a nonresident of the state, the defendant is a foreign corporation, and the facts set forth in the complaint happened and the action was brought before the recent amendment to section 1780 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Hence this court had no jurisdiction of the plaintiff's cause of action unless it arose within this state. Payne v. N. Y., S. & W. R. R. Co., 157 App. Div. 302, 142 N. Y. Supp. 241.

The facts appearing in the plaintiff's proofs show that in August, 1908, he was a second cabin passenger on one of the defendant's steamships journeying from a port in Greece to the port of New York. The vessel was crowded with emigrants and a large number of second cabin passengers. The latter, or a large number of them, became dissatisfied with the food furnished to them, and with other matters, and claimed improper attention to their needs and comfort on the part of the ship's officers. A letter was framed for the purpose of complaint and publication on the arrival of the ship at the port of New York, and the plaintiff undertook to get signatures to it, even from first-class passengers. He was told that a Mr. Allen, a first-class passenger, would sign this letter. The ship was then on the high seas, nearing the port of New York. The plaintiff went to the first cabin music room, where he found Mr. Allen and tendered him the letter for signature. The latter took the letter and began to read it before signing it. Thereupon the ship's captain entered the music room and took the letter from Mr. Allen and ordered the plaintiff from the room, on the ground that he, as a second-class passenger, had no right to be in the first cabin quarters. The plaintiff answered that he would not leave the room until he got back his letter. The captain refused to return it, and again ordered the plaintiff to leave the room, and on his refusal to go the captain struck him and ordered his removal forcibly by members of the crew. He was then confined in a stateroom, and the imprisonment continued while the vessel entered the port and for several hours after it had docked in New York City. The respondent contends that if the plaintiff has any cause of action it "arose" upon the high seas and this court had no jurisdiction of it. The appellant contends that he has a cause of action for false imprisonment to the extent of such imprisonment while within the jurisdiction of this state, even though such imprisonment began outside the jurisdiction, for its continuance made a fresh cause of action in his favor as long as it lasted, and, if it continued within this jurisdiction, a fresh cause of action arose within this jurisdiction to the extent of the continued imprisonment. In this contention we think the appellant is correct. Hardy v. Ryle, 9 B. & C. 608; Huggins v. Toler, 64 Ky. (1 Bush) 192; Dusenbury v. Keiley, 8 Daly, 537; s. c., 85 N. Y. 383; Van Ingen v. Snyder, 24 Hun, 81. * * *[49]

[48] The statement of facts is abridged. A portion of the opinion is omitted. The first cause was held open to a demurrer to the evidence. As the verdict was general with nothing to indicate how much of the damages allowed was apportioned to the first cause, the judgment was reversed, and remanded for further proceedings on the cause for false imprisonment.

There was a dissent in part from Burch and Porter, JJ.

Judgment reversed and new trial granted.[50]

[49] Compare Regina v. Lesley (1860) Bell, 220, 8 Cox, C. C. 269: P. and others, being in Chili and subjects of that state, were banished by the government of Chili to England. D., the master of an English merchant vessel lying in the territorial waters of Chili, contracted with that government to take P. and his companions from Valparaiso to Liverpool and they were accordingly brought on board D.'s vessel by the officers of the government and carried by D. to Liverpool under his contract. Assuming that D.'s act within Chilian waters was justified the question was whether D. was liable, in an English court, on a charge of false imprisonment for what was done on the high seas?

HARNESS v. STEELE.

The action was by Steele. There was a judgment for the plaintiff and the defendant appealed.

JORDAN, J. Appellee, a minor, by his next friend, sued appellant, the sheriff of Howard county, together with one Strubbs, to recover damages for false imprisonment. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict against appellant for $400, and a finding in favor of the defendant Strubbs. Over appellant's motion for a new trial, wherein he assigns various reasons, the court rendered judgment on the verdict, from which appellant appealed to the appellate court. The appeal was transferred to this court under the act of March 13, 1901.

The first error argued by counsel for appellant is the overruling of the demurrer to the first paragraph of the amended complaint. This complaint consists of two paragraphs. The first, omitting the caption, is as follows: "Plaintiff, for his amended complaint, complains of the defendant, and says that on the 15th day of May, 1900, the defendant unlawfully imprisoned the plaintiff and deprived him of his liberty for the space of one hour, to his damage in the sum of $2,000, for which he demands judgment." It is contended that this paragraph contains no facts to show that appellee was falsely imprisoned and deprived of his liberty, but consists merely of conclusions. While the paragraph is somewhat terse, it is an exact copy of the form given in 3 Works, Prac. p. 152. It may also be said that it substantially follows the averments in a form given in 1 Estes, Pl. & Forms, p. 561, with the exception that the latter form does not contain the word "unlawfully," and states that the imprisonment was "without probable cause," and also gives the place at which the plaintiff was imprisoned. The charge that "the defendants * * * imprisoned the plaintiff and deprived him of his liberty for the space of one hour" is certainly not a mere conclusion of the pleader, but is a composite statement of an ultimate fact, the imprisonment of the plaintiff. The word "unlawful" is not essential, and may be omitted from the pleading, for the rule is settled in this state that a complaint for false imprisonment is sufficient without alleging that the act complained of was illegal, or wrongful, or that the arrest or imprisonment was without competent authority, or malicious, or without probable cause. Colter v. Lower, 35 Ind. 285, 9 Am. Rep. 735; Gallimore v. Ammerman, 39 Ind. 323; Boaz v. Tate, 43 Ind. 60. The paragraph in controversy is at least sufficient on demurrer. It might possibly have been open to the objection, upon a motion to make it more specific, that it did not state the venue where the alleged wrong was perpetrated by the defendants; but in respect to this question we do not decide. * * *[51]

(b) IN ARREST

GENNER v. SPARKES.

(Court of King's Bench, 1704. 1 Salk. 79, 91 Reprint, 74.)

Genner, a bailiff having a warrant against Sparkes, went to him in his yard, and being at some distance told him, he had a warrant, and said he arrested him. Sparkes having a fork in his hand, keeps off the bailiff from touching him, and retreats into his house. And this was moved as a contempt. Et per Cur. The bailiff cannot have an attachment, for here was no arrest nor rescous. Bare words will not make an arrest; but if the bailiff had touched him, that had been an arrest, and the retreat a rescous, and the bailiff might have pursued and broken open the house; or might have had an attachment or rescous against him; but as this case is, the bailiff has no remedy but an action for assault; for the holding up of the fork against him when he was within reach, is good evidence of that.

HUNTINGTON v. SHULTZ.

(Constitutional Court of South Carolina, 1824. Harp. 452, 18 Am. Dec. 660.)

The defendant was served with a capias ad respondendum when he was attending on court, as a party to a suit. He moved to set aside the service of the writ, on the ground that he was privileged from the service of this writ during his attendance on the court. The court granted the motion, and the plaintiff appealed.

RICHARDSON, J. The question in this case depends upon the act of 1791: 1 Faust, 44; 1 Brevard, 223; which enacts that "all persons necessarily going to, attending on, or returning from the same" (referring to the superior courts), "shall be freed from arrest in any civil action." Now, what does the term "arrest" mean? Wood (see Institutes, 595) defines it: "A detention of the person." And Blackstone, vol. 3, p. 288, says: "An arrest must be by corporal seizing the defendant's body; after which the sheriff may justify breaking open the house, in order to take him;" and in page 289, he says: "When the defendant is arrested, he must either go to prison, or put in special bail to the sheriff." These authorities show that an arrest is synonymous with actual detention of the person of the party arrested; and does not mean merely a summons, or citation.

The scope and object of the act of 1791, too, evidently require no more than that the person of the party attending court shall be free from detention; and he may be cited or summoned without any detention of his person. * * *

The motion is granted.

RUSSEN v. LUCAS.

(At Nisi Prius, Sittings after Hilary Term, 1824. 1 Car. & P. 153, 12 E. C. L. 98.)

Action against a sheriff for an escape. The only point in dispute was, whether a person named Hamer was arrested by the sheriff's officer, and escaped.

The officer having the warrant went to the One Tun tavern in Jermyn street, where Hamer was sitting. He said, "Mr. Hamer, I want you." Hamer replied, "Wait for me outside the door, and I will come to you." The officer went out to wait, and Hamer went out at another door, and got away.

ABBOTT, C. J. Mere words will not constitute an arrest; and if the officer says, "I arrest you," and the party runs away, it is no escape; but if the party acquiesces in the arrest, and goes with the officer, it will be a good arrest. If Hamer had gone even into the passage, the arrest would have been complete: but, on these facts, if I had been applied to for an escape-warrant I would not have granted it.

Nonsuit.

WHITHEAD v. KEYES.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1862. 3 Allen, 495, 81 Am. Dec. 672.)

Tort against a sheriff for an escape suffered by his deputy. * * *

The defendant also requested the court to instruct the jury that if the hold taken by Stoddard by the officer was only for an instant, and Stoddard broke away from that hold by superior force, or was rescued therefrom by the interference of others, this would be a sufficient retaking by the officer to allow him to return a rescue. The judge declined so to rule, and instructed the jury that to enable the defendant to set up a rearrest of Stoddard by the officer, the hold by the officer would not be sufficient unless Stoddard was held and stopped, or the officer had such a hold on him that it was in his power to stop him.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

METCALF, J. * * * We are also of the opinion that the jury were wrongly instructed that to enable the defendant to set up a rearrest of the debtor (Stoddard) by the officer (Thomas) the hold of the debtor by the officer would not be sufficient, unless the debtor was held and stopped, or the officer had such a hold on him, that it was in his power to stop him.

There cannot be either an escape or a rescue of a person unless he is first arrested. If an arrest is prevented by a party's avoidance or resistance of an officer, or by the interference of others, the party does not escape, and the officer is not liable in an action for an escape, but is liable, if at all, in an action for negligence in not making an arrest when he might and ought. And the law is the same in regard to a rescue. An officer cannot legally return a rescue of a party whom he had not arrested. Such a return would be false. We have therefore, in deciding on this last instruction given to the jury, to consider the question—what constitutes an arrest? And our opinion is, that an officer effects an arrest of a person whom he has authority to arrest, by laying his hand on him for the purpose of arresting him, though he may not succeed in stopping and holding him. 1 Hale P. C. 459. Genner v. Sparkes, 1 Salk. 79, and 6 Mod. 173. Sheriff of Hampshire v. Godfrey, 7 Mod. (Leach's Ed.) 289. Williams v. Jones, Rep. Temp. Hardw. 301. Bul. N. P. 62. Watson's Sheriff, 90. United States v. Benner, Bald. 239, Fed. Cas. No. 14,568. And we need not express an opinion as to what else will or will not amount to an arrest. We think that the instruction, prayed for on this point by the defendant, should have been granted, and that the exception taken to the instruction that was given must be sustained.

New trial granted.[52]

GOODELL v. TOWER.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1904. 77 Vt. 61, 58 Atl. 790, 107 Am. St. Rep. 745.)

Goodell brought trespass for a false imprisonment against Tower, Hastings and another. There was a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants bring exceptions.

TYLER, J. * * * It is contended in defendant Hastings' behalf that he did not restrain the plaintiff of his liberty. The trial court found that, having the complaint and warrant signed respectively by the other two defendants, he met the plaintiff and stopped him by speaking to him, as he was driving along on a business errand, read the paper to him, and told him he would have to go with him, Hastings; that the plaintiff told the officer that he would have to get someone to take his team; that the officer permitted him to do his errand, but directed him to return as soon as he could; that the plaintiff then drove along; that Hastings became impatient, and went to meet him, turned in behind the plaintiff's team and followed him to the village; that he went to the place of trial with the plaintiff, delivered the paper to the justice and informed him that the plaintiff was present; that this was all that Hastings did besides making his return upon the warrant; that he understood that the plaintiff was in his custody.

The action of the officer constituted a false imprisonment of the plaintiff. It was not necessary that he should lay his hands upon him. It was sufficient that the plaintiff was within his power and submitted to the arrest: Mowry v. Chase, 100 Mass. 79. Every restraint upon a man's liberty is, in the eye of law, an imprisonment, wherever may be the place or whatever may be the manner in which the restraint is effected: 2 Kent's Commentaries, 26. And see Pike v. Hanson, 9 N. H. 491, cited in the notes, where it was held that the words may constitute an imprisonment, if they impose a restraint upon the person, and he is accordingly restrained and submits. The law is so well settled upon this point that it is hardly necessary to cite authorities, but the notes in Bissell v. Gold, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 210, 19 Am. Dec. 480, are interesting and clearly elucidate the rule that to constitute an arrest there must be some real or pretended legal authority for taking the party into custody; that he must be restrained of his liberty; that if he submits and is within the power of the officer it is sufficient without an actual touching of his person. This is the rule laid down by Savage, C. J., in the main case, and it has not been departed from in recent authorities. * * *

(c) IMPRISONMENT—DISTINGUISHED FROM MALICIOUS PROSECUTION

LOCK v. ASHTON.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1848. 12 Q. B. 871, 116 Reprint, 1097, 76 R. R. 434.)

Trespass for an alleged imprisonment. Plea, not guilty. On the trial it appeared that the plaintiff, being servant to the defendant, who was a corn dealer, was sent by him with a cart to the premises of Messrs. Rosling and Watson, also corn dealers, for twenty sacks of oats. The whole quantity was not delivered; and the plaintiff signed a receipt note for eighteen. On his return to the defendant's it was found that only seventeen sacks were in the cart. Messrs. Rosling and Watson, on enquiry by the defendant, insisted that they had delivered eighteen sacks. The plaintiff, being further questioned, made unsatisfactory answers: and the defendant then gave him into custody, and had him conveyed to a station house, and from thence to a police office. The magistrate, after hearing witnesses, remanded the plaintiff for further examination. He was again brought up for examination, and a second time remanded. Before the third hearing, Messrs. Rosling and Watson, discovered that the missing sack had remained on their premises undelivered; they communicated this to the defendant; and he stated it to the magistrate on the third examination: and the plaintiff was thereupon discharged. There was no evidence to show that the defendant had induced the magistrate to remand the plaintiff on the first or second examination, or that he had unduly delayed making the statement on which the plaintiff was liberated. It was urged, on the defendant's behalf, that in this action he could be liable only for the first imprisonment and taking before the magistrate, not for the remand or the subsequent detention, these being the acts of the justice. Lord Denman, Ch. J., asked if there was any authority for this position; and, none being cited, he left the case to the jury on the whole matter of complaint. Verdict for the plaintiff, damages £10.

Whitehurst, in support of a rule for a new trial: It is true that the defendant may be liable for all that happened till the parties appeared before the magistrate. After that, the justice acted in the discharge of his official duty; and the acts done were his. He was bound to retain the plaintiff, even if the defendant had pressed for his release. A mistake was discovered; but before that time the case was out of the defendant's control. The argument for the plaintiff would make a prosecutor in such a case answerable for the detention even to the time of trial. The remands, then, not being his acts, could not be the subject of an action of trespass; case might have lain; but then malice and want of probable cause must have been alleged and shown. This appears by the well known series of cases in which persons having wrongfully, as was alleged, put a Court in motion, have been sued in case or trespass, and trespass has been held not to lie. * * * (Coleridge, J.: Suppose the defendant takes the plaintiff to a police office on a day when he knows that, as a matter of course, there will be a remand.) That would be evidence of malice in an action for malicious prosecution. (Erle, J.: If the arresting were a trespass, and the remand were ground only for an action on the case, the same course of prosecution would be trespass on Saturday and case on Monday.) It would. (Coleridge, J.: Is not the remand a matter by which to measure the damages?) It was so treated, but mistakenly. The defendant was not liable, as to the remand, in trespass, or in any form, if he arrested bona fide in the first instance. (Erle, J.: A turning point here may be, whether or not the remand was at defendant's instance.)

Lord Denman, Ch. J. Much may depend on that. * * * If the remand here is considered as the independent judicial act of the magistrate, it will be difficult to say that the defendant is liable in this form of action. We will look at the declaration and the Judge's notes.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord Denman, Ch. J. (on the last day of the Term). The verdict in this case cannot be sustained, the action being trespass, and the jury having given damages not only for the trespass in arresting, but for the remand, which was the act of the magistrate.

II. In Trespass to Property

(A) In Trespass to Real Property

WINCKWORTH v. MAN.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1608. 1 Brownl. & G. 210, 123 Reprint, 759.)

The plaintiff declares for a trespass in one acre of land in D. and abuts that, east, west, north and south; and upon not guilty pleaded, the jury found the defendant guilty in half an acre within written, and moved in arrest of judgment, because upon the matter no trespass had been found, for there is no moiety bounded as the plaintiff had declared, for the whole acre is only bounded by the plaintiff containing his trespass within those bounds, and the defendant ought to be found a trespasser within those bounds, for otherwise it is not good; and it is impossible for the moiety of one acre to be within

"The distinction between false imprisonment and malicious prosecution is well illustrated by the case where, parties being before a magistrate, one makes a charge against another, whereupon the magistrate orders the person charged to be taken into custody and detained until the matter can be investigated. The party making the charge is not liable to an action for false imprisonment, because he does not set a ministerial officer in motion, but a judicial officer. The opinion and judgment of a judicial officer are interposed between the charge and the imprisonment." Per Willes, J., in Austin v. Dowling (1870) L. R. 5 C. P. 534, 540.

"If an individual prefers a complaint to a magistrate, and procures a warrant to be granted, upon which the accused is taken into custody, the complainant, in such a case, is not liable in trespass for the imprisonment; and that, even although the magistrate had no jurisdiction. According to the case of West v. Smallwood ([1838] 3 M. & W. 418, 49 R. R. 666), a party who shall make a direct application to a magistrate for a warrant, that another may be taken into custody, is deemed thereby only to make an appeal to the magistrate to exercise his jurisdiction: and the imprisonment is referred to the magistrate's authority, so as to exempt the complainant from all liability in trespass: and what takes place in the presence of the magistrate, ought to be referred to the exercise of his authority, as in Barber v. Rollinson ([1833] 1 Cr. & M. 330). In that case, the plaintiff having been discharged from criminal custody by a magistrate, was leaving the post-office, when the defendant said, "I have another charge against him, for forgery;" upon which the plaintiff was again taken and placed at the Bar, and upon the trial before Lord Lyndhurst, in an action of trespass in respect of this second imprisonment, the plaintiff was nonsuited; and, upon motion to set aside the nonsuit, it was held that the acts of the defendant were part of the proceedings before the magistrate, for which the defendant could not be held liable in trespass; that the taking could not be considered as the act of the defendant, who had only put the law in motion, for which he might be liable in case." Per Coltman, J., in Brown v. Chapman (1848) 6 C. B. 365, 376, 77 R. R. 347, 355.

those bounds: but the whole Court except Fenner, were of opinion that the plaintiff should have his judgment: for if the plaintiff layeth his action for a trespass committed in one acre, and the jury find that only to be in one foot of it, it is good; and here they have found the trespass in the moiety of the acre bounded, which is sufficient in this action, where damages only are to be recovered, but if it had been in ejectment, the verdict had been naught, for it is uncertain in what part he should have his writ of habere facias possessionem.

GRAHAM v. PEAT.

(Court of King's Bench, 1801. 1 East, 244, 102 Reprint, 95.)

Trespass quare clausum fregit. Plea the general issue, and certain special pleas not material to the question. At the trial before Graham, B., the trespass was proved in fact; but it also appeared that the locus in quo was part of the glebe of the rector of the parish of Workington in Cumberland, which had been demised by the rector to the plaintiff, and that the rector had not been resident within the parish for five years last past, and no sufficient excuse was shewn for his absence. Whereupon it was objected that the action could not be maintained, the lease being absolutely void by the Act of 13 Eliz. c. 20, which enacts, "That no lease of any benefice or ecclesiastical promotion with cure or any part thereof shall endure any longer than while the lessor shall be ordinarily resident and serving the cure of such benefice without absence above fourscore days in any one year; but that every lease immediately upon such absence shall cease and be void." And thereupon the plaintiff was nonsuited.

A rule was obtained in Michaelmas term last to shew cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, upon the ground that the action was maintainable against a wrong-doer upon the plaintiff's possession alone, without shewing any title.

Cockell Serjt., Park, and Wood, now shewed cause, and insisted that possession was no further sufficient to ground the action even against strangers than as it was prima facie evidence to title, and sufficient to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff, if nothing appeared to the contrary. But here it did expressly appear by the plaintiff's own case that his possession was wrongful, for it was a possession in fact against the positive provisions of an act of Parliament, without any colour of title even against strangers. [Carter & Claycoles Case] 1 Leon. 307. He was not even so much as tenant at sufferance; though it is not certain that this latter can maintain a trespass. It is settled that the plaintiff could not have maintained an ejectment against a stranger who had evicted him.

Lord Kenyon, C. J. There is no doubt that the plaintiff's possession in this case was sufficient to maintain trespass against a wrong-doer; and if he could not have maintained an ejectment upon such a demise, it is because that is a fictitious remedy founded upon title. Any possession is a legal possession against a wrong-doer. Suppose a burglary committed in the dwelling house of such a one, must it not be laid to be his dwelling house notwithstanding the defect of his title under that statute.

PER CURIAM. Rule absolute.[55]

LANE v. DIXON.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1847. 3 C. B. 776, 71 R. R. 484, 136 Reprint, 311.)

Trespass. The declaration stated that the defendant with force and arms broke and entered certain rooms of the plaintiff, in a parcel of a certain dwelling house, and then ejected the plaintiff and his family from the possession of the said rooms and kept them so ejected and expelled. Pleas, not guilty and five special pleas. The facts shewn upon the trial were as follows: In August, 1845, the plaintiff, a medical practitioner, hired from one Johnson certain rooms in Bury Street, St. James's, at a rent of £50. a year, with the privilege of putting a brass plate with his name engraved thereon, upon the front door, there to remain so long as he should continue to occupy the apartments. In September, Johnson demised the whole house to the defendant, for twenty-one years. On the 15th of January, 1846, the rent being unpaid, the defendant removed the plaintiff's brass plate from the door, and refused to allow the plaintiff to have access to his apartments. It appeared that the defendant let the whole of the house in separate apartments: but there was no direct evidence that the defendant had actually entered the plaintiff's rooms.

This action was commenced early in February, 1846. On the part of the defendant, it was insisted that the charge of breaking and entering the plaintiff's rooms was not proved. * * * Verdict for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him, or a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that there was no evidence of a breaking and entering.

Byles, Serjt., in Trinity Term, obtained a rule nisi accordingly, and also for a new trial, on the ground there was no evidence to justify the verdict.

[55] Compare:

Cary v. Holt (1746) 2 Str. 1238: P. declared in trespass upon his possession. D. made title and gave colour to P., who, in a replication de injuria, denied the title set out by D. Held, a good replication "for it lays the defendant's title out of the case, and then it stands upon the plaintiff's possession, which is good enough against a wrongdoer."

Harker v. Birbeck (1764) 3 Burr. 1556: P. has a liberty of digging in a lead mine but has no property in the soil above the mine. For an encroachment on the mine P. sues in trespass on the case. Lord Mansfield: "We are all clear that the action ought to have been trespass."

WILDE, C. J. One ground upon which this rule was moved, is, that there was no evidence to go to the jury, in support of so much of the declaration as alleges a trespass to the plaintiff's rooms, and ejecting him therefrom, and seizing his goods. The evidence offered was that the plaintiff had taken apartments in the house in question, for a certain term; and that, before that term had expired, the defendant refused to permit the plaintiff to have access to them. It appears to me that that was competent evidence to submit to the jury, and that it afforded a reasonable foundation for a verdict for the plaintiff. The period of time during which the plaintiff was excluded, the nature of the property and other surrounding circumstances, were all proper to be taken into account in determining whether or not it was to be presumed that the defendant broke and entered the rooms. It appeared that the apartments in question were open, and that the defendant took advantage of the temporary absence of the plaintiff, to fasten the outer door and so exclude the plaintiff from his lodgings. Considering that the whole house was let out in separate suits of apartments, and that the defendant refused to permit the plaintiff to return to the rooms, what is the reasonable intendment of the use to which the plaintiff would put them? Out of Court, no one would for a moment doubt that he would at once enter them for his own occupation or for the purpose of letting. All the circumstances were proper to be submitted to the jury, and could not properly be withheld from them: and I see no ground for saying that the inference they have drawn was incorrect. The first ground of the motion, therefore, fails. * * *

Rule discharged.[56]

WELLS v. HOWELL.

(Supreme Court of Judicature, New York, 1822. 19 Johns. 385.)

Howell sued Wells before a justice, because the defendant's horse had entered the plaintiff's field and destroyed the grass. Wells pleaded that there was no fence around the field when the damage was done, and admitted the trespass and the damage. Howell demurred to the plea. It was admitted that there was no fence, as stated, and that there was no town by-law about fences, or cattle running at large. The justice gave judgment for the plaintiff below for $10 and costs.

PER CURIAM. Every unwarrantable entry on another's land is a trespass, whether the land be inclosed or not. 3 Bl. Com. 209; 3 Selw. N. P. 1101. A person is equally answerable for the trespass of his cattle, as of himself. 3 Bl. Com. 211. The defendant below was bound to show a right to permit his cattle to go at large; and it is conceded that there was no town regulation on the subject. The judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.[57]

PATRICK v. GREENWAY.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1796. 1 Wms. Saund. 343, 344 note, 85 Reprint, 495, 498.)

This was an action of trespass for fishing in the plaintiff's several fishery. It appeared in evidence that the defendant fished there but did not take any fish; neither was it alleged in the declaration that the defendant caught any fish. The plaintiff obtained a verdict, which, in the following term, the defendant moved to set aside. But the Court of Common Pleas refused even a rule to shew cause, upon the ground that the act of fishing was not only an infringement of the plaintiff's right, but would hereafter be evidence of an using and exercising of the right of the defendant if such an act were overlooked.[58]

[57] Accord: Y. B. 20 Edw. IV. (1481) f. 11, pl. 10: Trespass with cattle. Plea, that the plaintiff's land adjoined a place where defendant had common, that the cattle strayed from the common and defendant drove them back as soon as he could. Brian, C. J.: "If the land in which he has common be not inclosed, it behooves him to keep the beasts in the common and out of the land of any other."

Star v. Rookesby (1711) 1 Salk. 336, 91 Reprint, 295 ("for the law bounds every man's property and is his fence").

Compare Ellis v. Loftus Iron Co. (1874) L. R. 10 C. P. 10: P. sued to recover damages because his mare had been kicked and bitten by D.'s horse. It appeared that D. was accustomed to graze his horse in a plot of ground which was separated from the plaintiff's pasture by a wire fence, and that the horse, without going into P.'s ground, had caused the injury complained of by biting and kicking the mare through the fence. No negligence on the part of D. was established. Brett, J.: "* * * I had no doubt that if there was evidence of negligence and as a result of such negligence an animal of the defendant's passed wholly or in part onto the plaintiff's land, such a circumstance would constitute a trespass; but what I did doubt for some time was whether, when there was no negligence at all on the part of the defendant, the same consequence would follow. Having looked into the authorities, it appears to me that the result of them is that in the case of animals trespassing on land the mere act of the animal belonging to a man, which he could not foresee, or which he took all reasonable means of preventing, may be a trespass, inasmuch as the same act, if done by himself, would have been a trespass. Blackstone (16th Ed.) vol. iii, c. 12, p. 211; Chitty on Pleading (7th Ed.) vol. i, p. 98; and Comyns' Digest, title 'Trespass C,' are all authorities to this effect."

PFEIFFER v. GROSSMAN.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1853. 15 Ill. 53.)

This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The plea was, not guilty. On the trial the court refused to give these instructions:

"That the putting of a fence or letting it stay on the land of another is a trespass in the eye of the law, for which the aggrieved person is entitled to at least nominal damages; that the plowing up of another man's land and cultivating it, although the land may thereby be improved, is still a trespass in the law, for which the person aggrieved is entitled to at least nominal damages."

The jury found for the defendant, and the court rendered judgment on the verdict. The plaintiff went up on error.

TREAT, C. J. The instructions not only asserted correct legal principles, but they were strictly applicable to the case. If a party puts a fence on another's land or plows up the soil, he is liable as a trespasser. Such acts are a violation of the owner's right of possession, to redress which the law gives him an action. And the action is maintainable, although the owner is not substantially injured. He is entitled to nominal damages for the intrusion upon his possession. The defendant cannot defeat the action by showing that the plaintiff is not materially prejudiced, or even that he is actually benefited. A right is invaded and a wrong committed, and that is a sufficient basis for an action. Every unauthorized entrance on the land of another is a trespass, for which an action will lie. The law implies damage to the owner, and in the absence of proof as to the extent of the injury, he is entitled to recover nominal damages. Especially is this the case where the suit is brought for the purpose of settling a question of right. Dixon v. Clow, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 188; Pastorius v. Fisher, 1 Rawle (Pa.) 27; Bagby v. Harris, 9 Ala. 173; Plumleigh v. Dawson, 1 Gilman, 544, 41 Am. Dec. 199; Bolivar Manuf. Co. v. Neponset Manuf. Co., 16 Pick. (Mass.) 241; Whipple v. The Cumberland Manuf. Co., 2 Story's R. 561.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.[59]

[59] "And although a thing appear for the profit of a man, and not to his damage, yet it is not lawful for a man to commit a tort. As if a man saw the beasts of his neighbour in another land damage feasants, it is not lawful for him to drive them off, and if he do, the owner shall have trespass; and yet he did a good act, and saved the owner from damages for the depasturing of his beasts. Also it is ruled in 21 H. 7. (27. b.) that a person brings trespass for corn carried away, the defendant pleads that the corn was severed from the nine parts and was in danger of being destroyed by cattle, wherefore the defendant carried it to the plaintiff's own barn, and laid it there, and judgment, etc. And this was adjudged no plea, and yet he received no damage. So here, although the termor has repaired the house of the lessor with the trees, which sounds to his advantage; yet, inasmuch as he hath exceeded his duty, and taken upon him the authority of the lessor, without any request, it is a reason why he should be punished. As if the commoner make

PICKERING v. RUDD.

(At Nisi Prius, 1815. 4 Camp. 219, 16 R. R. 777.)

Trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close, and placing a board over it, and cutting a tree, etc. Plea, not guilty as to the clausum fregit; and as to cutting the tree, a justification that it was wrongfully growing against the wall of the defendant, and that he therefore removed it, as he lawfully might. New assignment of excess, and issue thereupon.

The defendant's house adjoins to the plaintiff's garden, the locus in quo; and to prove the breaking and entering of this the evidence was, that the defendant had nailed upon his house a board, which projected several inches from the wall, and so far overhung the garden.

Garrow, A. G. and Richardson for the plaintiff contended that this was a trespass for which he had a right to maintain the present action. Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad coelum. The space over the soil of the garden is the plaintiffs, like the minerals below, and an invasion of either is, in contemplation of law, a breaking of his close. A mere temporary projection of a body through the air across the garden may not be actionable; but where a board is caused permanently to overhang the garden, this is a clear invasion of the plaintiff's possession. If this be not a trespass, it is easy to conceive that the whole garden may be overshadowed and excluded from the sun and air without a trespass being committed.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, Ch. J. I do not think it is a trespass to interfere with the column of air superincumbent on the close. I once had occasion to rule upon the circuit, that a man who, from the outside of a field, discharged a gun into it, so that the shot must have struck the soil, was guilty of breaking and entering it. A very learned Judge, who went the circuit with me, at first doubted the decision, but I believe he afterwards approved of it, and that it met with the general concurrence of those to whom it was mentioned. I am by no means prepared to say, that firing across a field in vacuo, no part of the contents touching it, amounts to a clausum fregit. Nay, if this board overhanging the plaintiff's garden be a trespass, it would follow that an aeronaut is liable to an action of trespass quare clausum fregit at the suit of the occupier of every field over which his balloon passes in the course of his voyage. Whether the action may be maintained cannot depend upon the length of time for which the superincumbent air is invaded. If any damage arises from the object which overhangs the close, the remedy is by an action on the case. Here the verdict depends upon the new assignment of excess in cutting down the tree.

The jury found for the defendant.

a trench in the soil, whereby the soil is made better, yet he shall be punishable, because he has transgressed." Maleverer v. Spinke (1538) 1 Dyer, 35b, 36b, 73 Reprint, 79, 81.

SMITH v. SMITH.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1872. 110 Mass. 302.)

Tort. The declaration alleged that the defendant built a part of a barn upon the plaintiff's close, and thereby expelled and put out the plaintiff from possession and occupation of a part of the close, and kept and continued him so kept out and expelled from said part of the close. Verdict for the defendant. The following bill of exceptions was allowed: The plaintiff offered to prove that the eaves of the barn, alleged to have been built and erected upon the plaintiff's close by the defendant, extended over on to the close from fifteen to eighteen inches, but the judge excluded the evidence.

MORTON, J. * * * We think it was competent for the plaintiff to prove that the eaves of the defendant's barn projected over the plaintiff's close. Projecting his eaves over the plaintiff's land is a wrongful act on the part of the defendant which, if continued for twenty years, might give him a title to the land by adverse occupation. It is a wrongful occupation of the plaintiff's land, for which he may maintain an action of trespass. Codman v. Evans, 7 Allen, 431. Carbrey v. Willis, 7 Allen, 364, 83 Am. Dec. 688.

Exceptions sustained.[60]

As to trespass on superjacent space, see Butler v. Frontier Telephone Co. (1906) 186 N. Y. 486, 491, 79 N. E. 716, 116 Am. St. Rep. 563, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 920, 9 Ann. Cas. 858: D. had strung a telephone wire across P.'s lot, about 30 feet above the surface. The wire reaches the entire width of the lot, but does not touch the soil or any building on the lot. P. brings ejectment. In this case Vann, J., remarks: "What is 'real property'? What does the term include so far as the action of ejectment is concerned? The answer to these questions is found in the ancient principle of law: Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum et ad inferos. The surface of the ground is a guide, but not the full measure, for within reasonable limitations land includes not only the surface but also the space above and the part beneath. Co. Litt. 4a; 2 Blackstone's Comm. 18; 3 Kent's Com. (14th Ed.) 401. 'Usque ad coelum' is the upper boundary, and while this may not be taken too literally, there is no limitation within the bounds of any structure yet erected by man. So far as the case before us is concerned, the plaintiff as the owner of the soil owned upward to an indefinite extent. He owned the space occupied by the wire and had the right to the exclusive possession of that space which was not personal property, but a part of his land. According to fundamental principles and within the limitation mentioned space above land is real estate the same as the land itself. The law regards the empty space as if it were a solid, inseparable from the soil, and protects it from hostile occupation accordingly."

Compare:

Hannabalson v. Sessions (1902) 116 Iowa, 457, 90 N. W. 93, 93 Am. St. Rep. 250: H. and S. lived upon adjoining lots. Upon the boundary between the lots there was a tight board fence. Between the families there was a frequent war of words. H. was leaning against the fence, on her own side, with her arm extended over the top, on the other side. S. claims that this is a trespass upon his real estate. See infra, under "Defenses."

Whittaker v. Stangvick (1907) 100 Minn. 386, 111 N. W. 295, 117 Am. St. Rep. 703, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 921, 10 Ann. Cas. 528: P. owned a narrow duck pass between two navigable lakes; D. was about to erect blinds in front of

COSTIGAN v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1892. 54 N. J. Law, 233, 23 Atl. 810.)

Action by Costigan against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to recover damages for an injury to the plaintiff's premises. Case certified to the Supreme Court for advice.

DEPUE, J. The plaintiffs are owners of a lot of land on which were erected two dwelling-houses. The premises are situated near to a strip of land on which the defendants are engaged in constructing a railroad. The declaration charges that:

"The defendants, wrongfully and injuriously intending, etc., on divers days and times, etc., dumped and filled into and upon the natural surface of certain lands near to plaintiff's said lot and dwelling-houses a vast quantity, to wit, two hundred thousand tons of earth, gravel, stones and other filling, and raised and banked upon said lands embankments of great height, to wit, of the height of thirty feet, and thereby forced and pressed large quantities of the said earth, gravel, stones and other filling into and upon the said lot of plaintiffs' beneath the surface of the same, and thereby upheaved and greatly disturbed the surface and soil of said lot, and forced and carried the said dwelling-houses to the northward and eastward of their proper position upon said lot, and to and upon the lands of others, and thereby caused the foundation of said dwelling-houses to fall away, crack and crumble, and the walls of said houses to become broken, shattered and defaced, and to topple and lean over," etc.

The defendants, by a special plea, justify as lessees of the New Jersey Junction Railroad Company, a corporation of this state organized under the General Railroad law, and authorized to lay out, construct, maintain and operate a railroad between certain designated points. * * *

The cause of action set out in the declaration is a trespass upon the plaintiffs' lands. The allegation that the acts of the defendants were wrongfully and injuriously done is a sufficient averment to sustain the pass, and about 300 feet away, with the intention of shooting ducks flying over the pass. In so doing D. would shoot across P.'s land.

See, also, the provision of the German Civil Code (taking effect in 1900) § 905: "The right of the owner of a piece of land extends to the space above the surface and to the substance of the earth beneath the surface. The owner may not, however, forbid interference which takes place at such a height or depth that he has no interest in its prevention." (Wang's trans.)

And compare 25 Harv. Law Rev. 486 (1912): "The landowner cannot safely rely on the old maxim, 'Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad coelum,' as furnishing a satisfactory ratio decidendi. That maxim, taken in its literal and unqualified sense, is not likely to be recognized at the present time as a complete statement of the law. Two theories are prominent: One, that the air space above the earth belongs to the public; the other, that it belongs to the landowner. But each theory is subject to provisos and limitations which, in the great majority of cases, would bring the same result, whichever theory is adopted. The public right, under the first theory, is subject to be exercised with due regard to the interests of the landowner. On the other hand, the ownership of the landowner under the second theory, is burdened by a right of passage for the public." And see 38 Cyc. 498, note 83.

the declaration. The merits of this controversy arise upon the consideration of the pleas filed by way of justification. * * *

On both pleas the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The Circuit Court is advised accordingly.[61]

(B) In Trespass to Personal Property

MARENTILLE v. OLIVER.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1808. 1 Penn. [2 N. J. Law] 379.)

Trespass. The charge was that the defendant unlawfully, forcibly, and with great violence, with a large stick, struck the horse of the plaintiff, on a public highway, which said horse was then before a carriage, in which the plaintiff was riding, on the said public highway, to the damage of the plaintiff, $50. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff with $15 damages.

PENNINGTON, J. * * * To attack and strike with a club, with violence, the horse before a carriage, in which a person is riding, strikes me as an assault on the person; and if so, the justice had no jurisdiction of the action. But if this is to be considered as trespass on property, unconnected with an assault on the person, I think it was incumbent on the plaintiff below, to state an injury done to the horse, whereby the plaintiff suffered damage; that he was, in consequence of the blow, bruised or wounded, and unable to perform service; or that the plaintiff had been put to expense in curing him, or the like. All the precedents of declarations for injuries done to domestic animals, as far as my recollection goes, are in that way; and I think with good reason. Suppose a man, seeing a stranger's horse in the street, was to strike him with a whip, or large stick, if you

For instances of trespass on subjacent space, see Comyn v. Kyneto (1604) Cro. Jac. 150, 79 Reprint, 131, where it was objected in vain that "an ejectment lies not of a coal mine because it is quoadam proficuum subtus solum, and an habere facias possessionem cannot be thereof."

See, also, Golden Reward Mining Co. v. Buxton Mining Co. (1899) 97 Fed. 413, 38 C. C. A. 228 (P. and D. were owners of adjoining mining claims in South Dakota. D. ran tunnels from his property into P.'s property, and extracted a large amount of ore. This was discovered four years later, when D.'s excavations caused the superimposed earth to settle, making depressions on the surface. P. thereupon sued for trespass upon his real property); Chartiers Block Coal Co. v. Mellon (1893) 152 Pa. 286, 25 Atl. 597, 598, 18 L. R. A. 702, 34 Am. St. Rep. 645; and the remarks of Paxson, C. J., ibid.

As to the time when the cause of action for such hidden trespasses accrues, see Lewey v. Frick Coke Co. (1895) 166 Pa. 536, 31 Atl. 261, 28 L. R. A. 283, 45 Am. St. Rep. 684 (the statute of limitations against the owner in favor of taking coal from beneath the surface begins to run from the time of the actual discovery of the trespass, or the time when the discovery was reasonably possible); and 9 Harv. Law Rev. 147.

please, and no injury was to ensue, could the owner of the horse maintain an action for this act? I apprehend not. For these reasons, I incline to think that this judgment ought to be reversed.[62]

KIRKPATRICK, C. J., concurred in the reversal.

Judgment reversed.

[62] Part of the opinion is omitted.

Compare Slater v. Swann (1729) Stra. 872: Action upon the case, for that the plaintiff was possessed of a horse and cart, and the defendant so violently beat the horse, that the plaintiff was deprived of the use of his horse and cart for several days. The Chief Justice (Lord Raymond) said: "This differed from trespass vi et armis for assaulting a man, where the assault is a cause of action; but here the assault on the horse is no cause of action, unless accompanied with a special damage."

In Marlow v. Weekes (1744) Barnes' Notes, 452, which was an action of trespass for beating the plaintiff's mare, the court remarked: "Assault upon a ship (a dead thing) bad; but for an injury to a beast a writ in trespass vi et armis appears in the Register." But see Professor Ames' comment on this: "There seems to be no such writ in the Register. Trespass for the asportation or the destruction of a chattel are the only writs for trespass affecting personal property. Other injuries to chattels were doubtless deemed of too trivial a nature to warrant a proceeding in the King's Court, and were redressed in the inferior Courts." Ames' Cases on Torts, vol. 1, p. 61, 3d Ed. And see Pollock on Torts (7th Ed.) 342: "Authority, so far as known to the present writer, does not clearly show whether it is in strictness a trespass merely to lay hands on another's chattel without either dispossession or actual damage. By the analogy of trespass to land it seems that it must be so. There is no doubt that the least actual damage would be enough."

Salmond, Law of Torts (2d Ed.) 340: "It is probable that a trespass to chattels is actionable per se without any proof of actionable damage. This, indeed, seems never to have been decided, but it is clearly so in the case of trespass to land and to the person, and there is no reason why it should be otherwise in the case of goods. If this is so, any unauthorized touching or moving of a chattel is actionable at the suit of the possessor of it, even though no harm ensues. It may be necessary for the protection of certain kinds of property that this should be the law."

In Paul v. Slason (1850) 22 Vt. 231, 54 Am. Dec. 75, D., a sheriff, who had attached hay belonging to P., used P.'s pitchfork, without his consent, in removing the hay. P. sued in trespass. The court charged the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the defendant took and carried away the pitchfork, they should give the plaintiff its value; that if it was used and left on the premises, so that the defendant received it again, and it was damaged by this use, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the amount of such damage; but that if the pitchfork was merely used in removing the plaintiff's property there attached, and was left where it was found, so that the plaintiff had it again, and the pitchfork was not damaged by this use, they were not bound to give the plaintiff damages. A judgment on a verdict for the defendant was sustained by the Supreme Court, but on the principle of de minimis non curat lex. But see Fullam v. Stearns (1897) 30 Vt. 443, 456.

See the remarks of Wilson, J., in Graves v. Severens (1868) 40 Vt. 636, 640: "It is true that for an unlawful entry upon the real property, or disturbance of incorporeal rights, when the unlawful act might have an effect upon the rights of the party and be evidence in favor of the wrong doer, if his right ever came in question, an action may be supported, though there be no actual damage done. And where anyone wantonly invades another's rights for the purpose of injury, an action will lie, though no actual damage be done. But it would seem to be settled that an action for a trespass to personal property will not lie, when no unlawful intent, or disturbance of a right or possession, is shown, and when no actual damage has been done, but all damage is expressly disproved, unless there be some right in question, which it is important to the plaintiff to establish. Paul v. Slason (1850) 22 Vt. 231, 54 Am. Dec. 75; Fairbanks v. Kittredge, 24 Vt. 9; Sedgwick on Dam. 62."

WINTRINGHAM v. LAFOY.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1827. 7 Cow. 735.)

On error from the C. P. of the City and County of N. Y. The action in the court below was trespass de bonis asportatis by Lafoy against Wintringham. It appeared on the trial that Wintringham was a constable, who held a fi. fa. issued by the Marine Court of the city, against the goods and chattels of one Gallis; and that, Jan. 19, 1826, he levied on the articles in question, consisting of jewelry in the store occupied by Gallis, who was present at the levy. That Gallis informed the defendant below that the goods had been assigned by him (Gallis), and the defendant below said he was indemnified. That Gallis placed the articles on the glass case, so that the defendant below might look at them to ascertain their value. That the defendant below made an inventory, and said he would remove the goods, unless security was given that they would be forthcoming, to answer the execution. That security was, therefore, given, and the articles were left in the store. It further appeared that, Dec. 21, 1825, Gallis had executed an assignment of all his property to the plaintiff below, Lafoy, for the purpose, first, of paying law expenses, then the debt of the plaintiff below, then certain other creditors named, and then the rest of his creditors. * * *

SAVAGE, C. J. It is not denied that a debtor in failing circumstances may prefer one of his creditors, or one set of creditors to another; nor is it pretended that any fraud in fact was proved in the court below. Indeed this was negatived by the proof and verdict of the jury. * * *

Was there any evidence of a trespass? If a sheriff takes the goods of a stranger, he is liable in this action. It is contended, however, that admitting the goods to belong to the plaintiff, the defendant did no tortious act. Every unlawful interference, by one person with the property or person of another, is a trespass. The defendant in the court below undertook to control the property levied on. He took it into his possession, though there was no manual seizing of it. He was about to take it away, and would have done so, but for the security given him that it should be forthcoming upon the execution. He exercised dominion over it. This was enough to constitute him a trespasser, he having no authority. Trover lies against a defendant who undertakes to control property in defiance or exclusion of the owner. Reynolds v. Shuler, 5 Cow. 325, 326, and cases cited. The same doctrine is applicable in trespass, as in trover, where the conversion is the tortious intermeddling with the goods of another.[63]

The judgment must be affirmed.

[63] The statement of facts is abridged and part of the opinion is omitted. See remarks of Dewey, J., in Miller v. Baker (1840) 1 Mete. (Mass.) 27, 30: "A forcible taking of goods is not necessary to enable the owner to maintain

HARTLEY v. MOXHAM.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1842. 3 Q. B. 701, 114 Reprint, 675, 61 R. R. 359.)

Trespass for seizing, taking, carrying away and converting articles, goods and chattels of the plaintiff. Plea, not guilty. On the trial, before Cresswell, J., the following facts appeared: The plaintiff had lodged in the house of the defendant. In September, 1841, plaintiff was packing up some goods for the purpose of taking them to Gloucester for sale, when defendant said that nothing should be removed till plaintiff had paid defendant his bill. A dispute arose; and the bill was not paid. Plaintiff put the goods under the charge of his own servant, in his bedroom: and defendant then locked them up in that room, kept the key, and detained the goods till plaintiff was prevented from going on his intended journey. It was objected that trespass would not lie, inasmuch as no act of taking appeared, but, at most, only a wrongful detention, the defendant never having touched the goods; and Cresswell, J., being of opinion that no taking was proved which would support an action of trespass, directed a nonsuit.

Erle now moved for a new trial, contending, that if the goods were not in a literal sense taken away, they were separated from the owner by locking the door upon them.[64]

LORD DENMAN, C. J. There is no ground for this motion. Cases like the present must often have occurred; yet there is no authority for an action of trespass under the circumstances. The case differs from that of a distress, where the landlord asserts that he takes the goods, and thereby acquires an authority and power and control over them. And, even in such a case of taking, it has never been held that trespass would lie if the act was wrongful.

Rule refused.

trespass. On a similar question, in Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 128, Sewall, J., says: 'No actual force is necessary to be proved. He who interferes with my goods, and without delivery by me, and without my consent, undertakes to dispose of them as having the property, general or special, does it at his peril to answer me the value in trespass or trover.' It is sufficient to maintain trespass, if the party exercises an authority over the goods against the will and to the exclusion of the owner by an unlawful intermeddling, though there be no manual taking or removal. Wintringham v. Lafoy, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 735; Phillips v. Hall, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 610, 24 Am. Dec. 108. In the present case there was not only an attachment of the property, but the placing of a keeper over it with directions to permit no one to remove the same, and an entry and exclusive possession by the keeper. It seems, therefore, that as to so much of the property in controversy as is conceded to be personal chattels, the case is clearly with the plaintiff."

[64] The statement of the case is slightly abridged, and a plea in justification, on which, as it turned out, nothing depended, that the defendant was an innkeeper, is omitted. Williams, Coleridge, and Wright, JJ., concurred with the Chief Justice.

BROOKS v. OLMSTEAD.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1851. 17 Pa. 24.)

This was an action of trespass brought by Henry Olmstead against Brooks and Tozer, before a justice of the peace, and brought into court by an appeal from the judgment of the justice. The plaintiff filed a special declaration in the court below for taking and driving away a heifer, the property of the plaintiff, to which the defendants pleaded not guilty. On the trial, the defendants admitted that the heifer was found in their possession, but denied their liability as trespassers, alleging that the heifer was put into their possession without their knowledge or assent, and so continued in their possession, without their knowledge, till found by the defendants in error, when they purchased the heifer and paid for her, which was the material question in the cause.

COULTER, J. It is, no doubt, true that one who comes to the possession of goods by delivery, and who has been guilty of no fault on his part, although it may turn out that the person who made the delivery to him had no title himself and was a wrongdoer, yet the receiver, guilty of no fault, cannot be treated as a trespasser. For, in such case, he has done no act which aided in depriving the true owner of his property. He, nevertheless, holds the property for the true owner, who may recover in trover, if the recipient of the property has converted it to his own use; or he is liable in replevin. So it may be stated, safely, that he who buys property from a trespasser, without any knowledge whatever of the original trespass, cannot be treated as a trespasser himself; because he has been guilty of no fault, or assisted in any way in depriving the true owner of his property. And this is the general import of the cases cited from the New York books of reports. The law is correctly enough expounded in these books, and accurately stated. Indeed, the court below, in this case, seems fully to acknowledge this principle.

But, before testing the accuracy of the opinion of the court below, we must look at the exact case which was before them. Two drovers, Brooks and Tozer, purchased a drove in Bradford county, and had them collected, as is customary, by their agents, at the field of one Watkins. Among the cattle driven into that field was the heifer or cow about which this dispute originated, which heifer the defendants never did purchase, nor had they paid anything for it, either by themselves or their agents. Before they drove off the cattle from Watkins' field, it appears distinctly from the testimony of one of their agents, that they knew there was one beast more than their number, or than they had purchased. One of the witnesses, however, Benjamin Sawyer, testifies, that four days before the cattle were driven off, Brooks and Tozer called on him, and he stated to them that he knew Olmstead's heifer, and pointed her out; they then asked him if he thought Olmstead would sell her.

The counsel for the defendant requested the court to charge the jury, that "if the heifer in question came into possession of the defendants by the act of their servant, without their knowledge or assent, and continued in their drove without their knowing that the heifer was among their cattle, trespass would not lie." The court answers that:

"Although the taking of the heifer by Charles Brooks, their agent, and his driving her to Watkins', and there putting her into their drove of cattle, if without their knowledge, would not make them trespassers; yet if they took possession of the heifer with their other cattle, and drove her away from Watkins' in Athens, to Sullivan county, where they were overtaken by plaintiff, they might be treated as trespassers, and their want of knowledge that the heifer was brought into their drove would not bar the plaintiff's right to recover in this case."

This answer is a little indistinct; but substantially, it answers the point of the defendants quite as favorably as the law allowed. For it was the duty of the defendants, before they became the actors in depriving the plaintiff of his property, by driving it far away, to take the usual and proper precautions to ascertain whether they had more than their own. I believe it is the universal custom of drovers before they start off with the drove, to count their cattle—a custom dictated by their own interest, in order that they may know whether they have all they purchased; as well as by a due regard to the interest of others, in order that they may know that they do not take away the property of other people.

Were the defendants then not in fault? Surely they were. For it will not do to allow any person the privilege of alleging his own recklessness, carelessness, or negligence, as an excuse for depriving another man of his property or rights. A man may be guilty of a high crime, if he rashly and recklessly, without proper precaution, does an act which injures another, although he does not intend to commit the crime or actually knows that he is doing so. Com. v. Cornish, 6 Bin. 249. A fortiori he may be guilty of a trespass. If the law were held otherwise, farmers and people in villages where cattle are allowed to run at large, would be exposed to great trouble and expense in regaining their cattle, driven off by the agents or servants of drovers. Because in the action of trover, if they were driven to that, the measure of damages would be the value of the goods and chattels at the time of the demand with interest, which would be no compensation for the loss of time, the expense and trouble in pursuing cattle to a great distance. When the plaintiff followed the defendants, in pursuit of his property, into Sullivan county, the defendants, when overtaken, admitted the right of property in the heifer to be in plaintiff, and offered to buy her. The plaintiff finally agreed to take $15 for the heifer, but they could not agree as to the amount of damages for expenses and trouble in following after the heifer, and at last it was agreed that that sum should be settled when the drovers returned from the sale of their drove. It does not appear that the defendants, after their return, made any attempt to settle or pay the damages, and the plaintiff brought this action of trespass.

The counsel for the defendants submitted a second point to the court as follows: "That Olmstead, having sold the heifer to the defendants, and assented to settle the damages with the defendants after their return home, could not maintain this action of trespass." The counsel for plaintiffs in error contends that the court did not answer this point. It is true they did not answer it separately and distinctly; but it was substantially answered by the instruction to the jury, that the defendants below might be treated as trespassers, and that the action would lie. The point, however, wants substance, and if answered directly against the plaintiff there would not have been error. Taking pay for the heifer and expressly reserving the question of damages, left the matter open, and did not purge or wipe away the action of trespass. The wrong was not atoned for or satisfied; and the original action remained as well by the understanding of the parties, as by operation of law.

I do not well see what other action would lie for the enforcement of these damages under the circumstances.

We are of the opinion that the action of trespass was maintainable.

Judgment affirmed.

WEBBE v. LEEK.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1388. Y. B. 12 Rich. II., Trinity Term.)

Trespass brought by one man against another, and counted by Rikhill that by force and arms he broke the house of the plaintiff in a certain vill and took and carried away a servant of his found there ready, etc.

Wadham. As to all but the servant, not guilty; and as to the servant we say that on the same day of the trespass that he has complained of, we came to the said vill and we say that this which he has said was his servant was only an infant of the age of four years and we found the infant wandering in the same vill, wherefore we took the said infant for charity and to satisfy his needs and we demand judgment if wrong (were done). * * *

THIRNING, J. This action is not taken upon the statute of laborers, "Quod potens in corpore, etc.," but it is an action which was at the common law, for at the common law a man shall have an action for his infant or his servant taken out of his keeping, and it can be understood that although he was only of such an age, still he could confer ease and advantage on his master, as by taking care of a house and other things, and it is reason that he have his action which is given to him at the common law.

Markham. A man shall have a good writ of trespass "quare quondam puerum suum in custodia sua existente" whether it be his servant or his infant of whatever age he may be, but not "quare servientem" and particularly in this case, because it cannot be understood that an infant of four years could render service to any one, etc.

And by the opinion of CHARLTON and THIRNING his action might be maintained at the common law, whatever his age.[65]

HYDE v. SCYSSOR.

(In the Exchequer Chamber, 1620. Cro. Jac. 538, 79 Reprint, 462.)

Trespass; for that the defendant, 21 May, 6 Jac. 1, made an assault upon Elizabeth the plaintiff's wife, et illam verberavit, et malè tractavit, necnon the said Elizabeth simul cum one gown, one petticoat, etc., of the goods of the plaintiff, simul cum the said Elizabeth, at D. tunc et ibidem cepit, abduxit, et abcariavit, necnon eandem Elizabetham per 5 annos ab eodem le plaintiff detinuit et custodivit, per quod le plaintiff solamen et consortium, necnon consilium et auxilium in rebus domesticis quæ idem le plaintiff habere debuisset et potuisset cum uxore suâ per totam tempus præd. perdidit et amisit, et alia enormia, etc.

The defendant pleaded not guilty; and it was found against him, and damages assessed to £300., and judgment found for the plaintiff: and now a writ of error thereof was brought in the Exchequer Chamber.

The first error assigned was, because the action was by the husband solely for the battery of his wife, which ought not to be; for the tort and damages are properly done to the wife, and therefore the husband sole without the wife could not maintain the action; and then the damages being entirely given, the judgment is erroneous. Vide 9 Edw. 4, pl. 52; 46 Edw. 3, pl. 3; 22 Ass. pl. 16.

But all the Justices and Barons held, that true it is the husband, for the battery of his wife, ought to join his wife with him in the action, if this had been brought for that cause: but here the action is not brought for the battery of his wife, but for the loss and damage of

It was objected that the action should have been debt, under the 15th section of the 'Act Concerning Slaves and Servants' (2 Rev. Laws 1813, p. 206); but the exception was overruled, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. SECTION 3.—JUSTIFICATION OR EXCUSE OF A PRIMA FACIE TRESPASS

I. Showing the Justification

[Note on the Prima Facie Cause and the Absolute Cause. The question, What are the essentials of a cause in trespass?—or of any cause in tort or contract—is apt to arise, in a given case, not as a question of the essentials of an absolute cause, but as a question of the prima facie cause. To a great extent, the real difficulty in the law of torts is "to define the substantial principles of justification and excuse." But of the defendant's justification or excuse, although resting on facts which are cotemporaneous with the facts set up by the plaintiff in his first pleading, and well within his knowledge, the plaintiff's first pleading makes no mention. He pleads only the facts of a prima facie cause. And unless the defendant pleads his justification or excuse, the court, answering the question whether the facts in the case make a valid cause, will, as a rule, pay no heed to this outlying fact; yet its possible existence often colors the general notion of this tort.

The defendant can meet the prima facie cause presented in the plaintiff's first pleading—his declaration at common law, his complaint or petition under the code, in one or the other of three ways: (1) The defendant may demur, and thus raise the question whether the facts which appear in the plaintiff's pleading are sufficient in law to constitute a good prima facie cause existing in his right against the defendant. (2) The defendant may traverse, or deny, one or more of the facts alleged in the plaintiff's pleading, and thus put the plaintiff to the proof of the material facts denied. The facts not denied are admitted. (3) The defendant may plead, or answer, by confession and avoidance.

The effect of a confession and avoidance is to admit the plaintiff's case as pleaded, but to offer to avoid its prima facie effect through the proof by the defendant of the "new matter" which he has pleaded. If the defendant does not succeed in this, and the burden of proof as to the new facts is on him, the plaintiff succeeds once more on his prima facie case.

It is to be remembered that the office of a traverse, or denial, is not to excuse but to contradict, and thus define what the plaintiff must prove. It cannot "be made to do the work of a plea in confession and avoidance." Regularly "all matters in confession and avoidance shall be pleaded specially." (Rules of Hilary Term, 1853, rr. 12, 17.) It should be remembered also that matter in confession and avoidance is of two kinds. Admitting that the facts alleged by the plaintiff make a good prima facie case, the defendant may destroy their effect by showing that the plaintiff never, at any time, had an absolute cause of action, because the defendant's act, when committed, was justifiable or excusable. Or the defendant may admit that the plaintiff had for a time an absolute cause of action against him, but may show that it has been discharged or released by something occurring subsequently. In the cases given in the text, only the defence of justification or excuse is considered.—Ed.]

(Court of King's Bench, 1776. Cowp. 476, 98 Reprint, 1195.)

Upon shewing cause why a verdict should not be entered in this case for the defendant Chancellor; the case upon the report of Lord Mansfield, before whom the cause was tried, appeared to be as follows:

The plaintiff was a running dustman, and the defendant Powell, a publick scavenger. Powell and King detained the plaintiff's cart and horses as they were standing in the street, under pretence of their being an estray, and within the City of London; and carried them to the Green Yard, of which the defendant Chancellor was the pound-keeper; who afterwards insisted upon being paid the following sums before he would deliver them up. For bringing them in, 2s., for crying them, 2s., for keeping the horses, £2, 6s. 8d., and for the care of the cart £1. 3s., which the plaintiff accordingly was obliged to pay: upon not guilty pleaded, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff against all the three defendants.

The only question at the trial was, whether this action of trespass could be maintained against the defendant Chancellor the pound-keeper, who did no other act than barely receiving the horses and cart into the pound when they were brought there and keeping them several days till redeemed. I thought he ought to be found not guilty; but it was contended he was a trespasser by continuing them in the pound, being wrongfully impounded, and the jury found him, as well as the other defendants, guilty.

Mr. Wallace and Mr. Buller shewed cause, and argued, 1st. That in trespass all are principals: and here the original taking being tortious, the pound-keeper, by refusing to release the cattle, till the plaintiff had discharged the fees and all expences, had adopted the original taking.[66]

Lord Mansfield. This is an action of trespass against three defendants for seizing and detaining the plaintiff's cart and horses; and they have all pleaded not guilty. The question reserved is, whether the defendant Chancellor ought to be found guilty or not?

[66] The arguments and Aston, J.'s, concurring opinion are omitted.

It has been argued two ways; 1st, whether on the merits of the case he was a trespasser? 2dly, supposing on the merits of the case he was no trespasser, whether by pleading the general issue he has not mispleaded, and ought to have justified?

1st, upon the merits of the case: it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove him guilty of the trespass; otherwise the case stands, that two persons seized the cart and horses and brought them to the pound, of which Chancellor was the keeper. Chancellor has no concern in the taking or bringing them there. How then is he guilty of trespass? The pound is the custody of the law: and the pound-keeper is bound to take and keep whatever is brought to him, at the peril of the person who brings it. There is no judgment, no direction, no written warrant or examination to be had by him. When is the trespass committed by him? He does nothing to ratify it: but only takes the cattle as he is obliged to do, at the peril of the person who brings them. If wrongfully taken, they are answerable, not he. It would be terrible if a pound-keeper were liable to an action for refusing to take cattle in, and were also liable in another action for not letting them go. If he goes one jot beyond the duty and assents to the trespass, that may be a different case. But here he has done nothing beyond his duty: when the cattle are once impounded, he cannot let them go without a replevin, or without the consent of the party. Upon their being released he is entitled to legal fees. If he is guilty of extortion there is another remedy.

What I have said is a clear answer to the 2d objection, that he has not pleaded specially, as it has been contended he ought to have done. No man is bound to justify who is not prima facie a trespasser. A gaoler if he has a prisoner in custody is prima facie guilty of an imprisonment, and therefore must justify. But here it comes out on the plaintiff's own shewing, that the pound-keeper had nothing to do with the taking. The law thinks him so indifferent a person, that if the pound is broken, the pound-keeper cannot bring an action, but it must be brought by the party interested. It would be attended with terrible inconveniences, if he were answerable for a wrongful taking by the persons who bring the cattle to him; and, therefore, I am clearly of opinion there ought to be judgment for the defendant Chancellor in this case.

BENNETT v. ALLCOTT.

(Court of King's Bench, 1787. 2 Term R. 166, 100 Reprint, 90, 31 R. R. 667, note.)

Trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house, debauching his daughter (describing her as a menial servant), and getting her with child, per quod servitium amisit. Plea, not guilty. At the trial it appeared, that the defendant, who was a collector of the land-tax, visited the plaintiff's daughter in the character of a suitor, but at the time when his entering the house was proved in order to support the trespass, he went to demand payment of the land-tax, when, the plaintiff being from home, his wife invited the defendant to go into the daughter's bed-chamber, where she was lying upon the bed, and left them together for several hours. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with £200. damages; which the learned judge thought were not excessive. A motion was made to set aside the verdict.

Lane. This is not an action on the case for the consequential damages, where the per quod is the gist of the action, but trespass for the immediate injury. Now if the trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house fall to the ground, that which is a consequence must necessarily fall with it. It was proved that the defendant entered the plaintiff's house as a collector of the land-tax, therefore his entry was lawful, and his continuing there was at the request of the plaintiff's wife; this would have supported a plea of licence, and evidence of it is good under the general issue.

BULLER, J. An action merely for debauching a man's daughter, by which he loses her service, is an action on the case. But according to Lord Holt's opinion, [Russell v. Corne] 2 Lord Raymond, 1032, where the offence is accompanied with an illegal entry of the father's house, he has his election either to bring trespass for the breaking and entering, and lay the debauching of the daughter and loss of her service as consequential; or he may bring the action on the case merely for debauching his daughter, per quod servitium amisit. In the present case the plaintiff has made his election, and has brought an action of trespass for breaking and entering his house, and all the rest is merely consequential. And therefore it is true, as was said, that if the trespass had not been proved, the defendant would have been entitled to a verdict. But it is now perfectly clear that a licence to enter cannot be given in evidence under the general issue. The plea of "not guilty" only goes to deny the fact of the trespass: now as that was proved in fact, the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict; and the only consideration for the jury was as to the quantum of damages. * * *

Rule discharged.[67]

WATSON v. CHRISTIE.

(Court of Common Pleas. 1800. 2 Bos. & P. 224, 126 Reprint. 1248, 5 R. R. 579.)

Trespass for assaulting and beating the plaintiff. Plea not guilty. At the trial it appeared that the defendant was the captain of a ship, and the plaintiff one of his crew; that the plaintiff while under the defendant's command had been so severely beaten by order of the defendant, that he had ever since that time been in a state of extreme ill health, and was likely to continue so during the rest of his life, which he was in some danger of ultimately losing in consequence of the assault. On the other hand, it was offered to be shewn that the beating in question was given by way of punishment for misbehaviour on board the ship, and it was insisted that the conduct of the defendant at the time of the assault being necessarily in evidence proved that misbehaviour.

Lord Eldon, Ch. J., before whom the cause was tried, directed the jury that the only questions for their consideration were, Whether the defendant was guilty of the beating? and what damages the plaintiff had sustained in consequence of it? that although the beating in question, however severe, might possibly be justified on the ground of the necessity of maintaining dicipline on board the ship, yet that such a defence could not be resorted to unless put upon the record, in the shape of a special justification; that the defendant had not said on the record that this was discipline, or justified it on any ground; that much evil beyond the mere act of wrong had been actually suffered; which evil had been occasioned by a cause which the defendant admitted he could not justify; that in his Lordship's judgment therefore the evil actually suffered in consequence of what was not justified ought to be compensated for in damages; that the jury should give damages to the extent of the evil suffered, without lessening them on account of the circumstances under which it was inflicted; that if they gave damages beyond a compensation for the injury actually sustained they would give too much, but that if they gave less they would not give enough.

The jury found a verdict for £500, being all the damages laid in the declaration.

Shepherd, Serjt., now moved for a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why this verdict should not be set aside and a new trial be had, on the ground of the damages being excessive, and because the jury ought not to have been directed to exclude from their consideration those circumstances which tended to shew the necessity of that punishment being inflicted which was the cause of the action; for that although the plaintiff might perhaps be entitled to some damages, since the circumstances alluded to did not amount to a legal defence, yet the defendant had a right to the benefit of those circumstances by way of mitigation.

But the Court were of opinion that his Lordship's direction was perfectly right in point of law, and that it did not appear from the report that the damages given by the jury were excessive.

Shepherd took nothing by his motion.[68]

MILMAN v. DOLWELL.

(At Nisi Prius, 1810. 2 Campb. 378.)

Trespass for cutting the plaintiff's barges from their moorings in the river Thames; whereby they had been set adrift and been injured. It appeared at a time when there was a great quantity of ice in the Thames, the defendant took two barges of the plaintiff from the middle of the river, where they were moored, to the opposite shore, and that one of them was immediately after discovered to have a hole in its bottom, but there was no evidence to show how this had been occasioned.

Garrow, for the defendant, offered to prove, that at the time of the supposed trespass these barges were in the greatest danger of being carried away by ice; that if he had not interfered, they most probably would have been destroyed; that he did what was prudent and most for the plaintiff's advantage to be done under the circumstances; and that he had been employed by the plaintiff generally to take charge of the barges, and must be presumed to have had his authority to remove them from a place of danger to a place of safety.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. These facts should have been specially pleaded. I cannot admit evidence of them under the plea of not guilty;—the issue joined upon which is, whether the defendant removed the barges belonging to the plaintiff from their moorings, not whether he was justified in doing so.

Garrow argued that the plea of not guilty merely denied the committing of any trespass, and it was impossible to say that any trespass was committed, if the barges were removed by the plaintiff's own orders either express or implied. The case was the same as if the plaintiff had stood by and directed how the thing was to be done, and the unmooring of the barges must be considered the act of the plaintiff rather than of the defendant.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. The defendant allows that he intermeddled with goods which were the property and in the possession of the plaintiff. By so doing he is presumed to be a trespasser; and if he has any matter of justification, he must put it upon the record. The plea of not guilty only denies the act done, and the plaintiff's title to the subject of the trespass. If the defendant has any authority, general or particular, express or implied from the plaintiff, this must be specially pleaded, by way of excuse.

Garrow then offered to prove that these barges were frozen to some others belonging to J. S., by whom the defendant was employed to get the latter ashore, and that it was utterly impossible to do this without bringing the former along with them.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. If the necessity was inevitable, and the barges of the third person by whose express orders the defendant acted, must otherwise have been destroyed, this might have amounted to a justification; but like the first set up, it must have been put upon the record.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with one farthing damages.

Garrow afterwards moved for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence had been improperly rejected; and further contended, that the action should have been case and not trespass; but the court were against him on both points, and refused a rule to show cause.[69]

BRIDGETT v. COYNEY.

Trespass against a magistrate for an assault and false imprisonment. Verdict for the plaintiff. Motion for a new trial.

LORD TENTERDEN, C. J. * * * What are the circumstances of the case? The plaintiff appears before the defendant, who is a magistrate, to answer the complaint of Dawson, of having unlawfully killed his dog. The defendant proposes to the parties to arrange the matter upon amicable terms. The plaintiff rejects the proposal, upon which the defendant tells him, that unless he pays a certain sum of money, he shall convict him in a penalty of that amount, under an act of parliament, in which case he will be committed to prison. The plaintiff still rejects the proposal and declares that he will carry the case elsewhere; that is, that he will appeal from the defendant's jurisdiction to a higher tribunal. Upon that the defendant calls in a constable, whom he orders to take the plaintiff out, and if the parties cannot settle the matter, to bring him in again, as he must proceed to commit him under the act. The plaintiff accordingly goes out with the constable, and while they are absent the affair is settled, by the plaintiff's paying a sum of money. It seems to me impossible to doubt that the plaintiff went out on that occasion in custody, having been ordered into that custody by the defendant; and if so, there is, in the eye of the law, an assault and false imprisonment by the defendant upon the person of the plaintiff. Then what is the justification? It is said that the plaintiff was convicted, and therefore that his detention was legal. What evidence is there of his conviction? No conviction was produced at the trial, or is laid before us now; indeed, it is admitted that none has ever been drawn up: then how can we possibly say that the party was convicted? The final arrangement of the matter by the parties in an amicable way, might properly prevent the defendant from acting upon the conviction, if there had been one; but it did not prevent his drawing it up as a justification for his own conduct in the transaction; and not having done so, he is without justification, and must abide the consequences.

The other judges concurred.

Rule refused.[70]

CARSON v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1829. 11 N. J. Law [6 Halst.] 43, 19 Am. Dec. 368.)

EWING, C. J. The declaration is in trespass for breaking and entering the house of the plaintiff and taking and carrying away his goods and chattels. The plea is, Not guilty. On the trial the defendants offered evidence to justify the breaking and entry and the taking of the property, under an execution from a court for the trial of small causes, in debt, at the suit of one of them, placed in the hands of another of them who was a constable; and to shew that the goods and chattels mentioned in the declaration were the property of one Buckalew the defendant in the execution, and fraudulently secreted in the house of the plaintiff, and as such were levied on and taken by virtue of the execution. The Court of Common Pleas rejected the evidence and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiff.

Under the plea of not guilty the evidence offered by the defendants was inadmissible. The charge set forth in the declaration and proved on the trial by the witness of the plaintiff appeared prima facie to be at common law a trespass. In such case the rule of pleading requires matter of justification or excuse, to be specially pleaded; and this rule has been expressly applied to an entry by virtue of process of fieri facias, Co. Lit. 282, b; 283, a; Com. Dig. tit. "Pleader," E. 15, 17; 3 Bos. & Puller, 223; 1 Saund. 298, n. 1; 1 Chit. Plead. 492, 495; 2 Chit. Pl. 587, and note g.

The evidence offered by the defendants was therefore properly overruled and the judgment shall be affirmed.

Trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close. Pleas, the general issue and a special plea that the defendant was the owner of certain goods and chattels, to wit, 10,000 bricks, etc., then in and upon the close of the plaintiff, and that defendant entered to remove them, doing no unnecessary damage. Demurrer and joinder.

BOSANQUET, J. I am of opinion that this plea is no answer to the trespass with which the defendant is charged. It is put broadly and nakedly that the defendant has a right to enter the soil of another to take his own property without shewing the circumstances under which it came there. The case has been argued on the ground of necessity: but on that ground at least the necessity should be shewn. There are, no doubt, various cases in which it has been held that the party is entitled to enter, but in all of them the peculiar circumstances have been stated on which the party rested his claim to enter. It would be too much to infer that the party may enter in all cases where his goods are on the soil of another, because he may enter in some where he shows sufficient grounds for so doing.

HALL v. FEARNLEY.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1842. 3 Q. B. 919, 114 Reprint, 761.)

Trespass for driving defendant's cart and horse against plaintiff, and thereby knocking him down, bruising and wounding him. Plea, not guilty.

On the trial, it was proved that the plaintiff was walking on a narrow part of the pavement in a public street, where there was a considerable curvature in it. The defendant was driving a cart in the road near the pavement at the edge of which the plaintiff was walking. The case for the plaintiff was that there was want of due care on the part of the defendant, who had driven so close to the pavement as to knock the plaintiff down, and run over and break his leg. The defendant endeavoured to shew that the plaintiff had slipped from the curb-stone at the moment when the cart was passing, and had so got his leg under the wheel. The defendant called no witnesses. WIGHTMAN, J., told the jury that the question for them was, whether the injury was occasioned by unavoidable accident or by the defendant's default; and that, if they thought the plaintiff had accidentally slipped off the pavement as the defendant's cart was passing, and had been run over in consequence of such accident, they ought to find for the defendant. Verdict for the defendant.

In the same term Crowder obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury, by telling them that, on the issue, if the injury was accidental, the defendant was entitled to a verdict.

LORD DENMAN, C. J. The authorities shew that if the accident had resulted entirely from a superior agency, that would have been a defence, and might have been proved under the general issue; but a defence admitting that the accident resulted from an act of the defendant would not have been so proveable.

COLERIDGE, J. Any defence, which admits the trespass complained of to be the act of the defendant, must be pleaded specially.

WIGHTMAN, J. The act of the defendant was prima facie unjustifiable, and required an excuse to be shown. When the motion in this case was first made, I had in my recollection the case of Wakeman v. Robinson, 1 Bing. 213. It was there agreed that an involuntary act might be a defence on the general issue. The decision indeed turned on a different point; but the general proposition is laid down. I think the omission to plead the defence here deprived the defendant of the benefit of it, and entitled the plaintiff to recover.

YASKA v. SWENDRZYNSKI et al.

Action for an assault and battery alleged to have been committed by the three defendants jointly. They answered separately by mere general denial. The evidence disclosed, substantially without dispute, a severe beating of plaintiff by defendant Swendrzynski, and there was some evidence of an attack by each of the other defendants. There was also some attempt to prove a previous agreement amongst the three defendants to assault plaintiff. Evidence was admitted tending to show a first assault by plaintiff, and the court submitted the case upon the theory that such first assault might constitute a defence, and the jury might consider whether the defendants acted in self-defence. A general verdict for the defendants was found, and judgment in their favor rendered, from which the plaintiff appealed.

DODGE, J. Obvious error was committed in charging the jury that the assault conceded to have been made by one of the defendants, and of which there was some evidence as to the others, might be justified, and a verdict for the defendants found, in case the plaintiff committed the first assault and the defendants acted in self-defence. Respondents' counsel substantially concede that such justification and defence was not admissible under mere general denial, and such is the law as settled by authorities. Levi v. Brooks, 121 Mass. 501; Cooper v. McKenna, 124 Mass. 284, 26 Am. Rep. 667; Barr v. Post, 56 Neb. 698, 77 N. W. 123; Atkinson v. Harran, 68 Wis. 405, 407, 32 N. W. 756; 3 Cyc. p. 1084; 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. p. 862. We cannot doubt that the verdict in favor of all of the defendants may well have been due to this error. Hence no course is open to us but to reverse the judgment and order a new trial. * * *

[73] On accident as a defense, if pleaded, see infra, "The Different Kinds of Justification or Excuse in Trespass: Accident."

II. The Different Forms of Justification or Excuse

(A) Consent

(a) Leave and License

Harm suffered by consent is, within limits to be mentioned, not a cause of civil action. The same is true where it is met with under conditions manifesting acceptance, on the part of the person suffering it, of the risk of that kind of harm. The maxim by which the rule is commonly brought to mind is "Volenti non fit injuria." "Leave and licence" is the current English phrase for the defence raised in this class of cases. On the one hand, however, "volenti non fit injuria" is not universally true. On the other hand, neither the Latin nor the English formula provides in terms for the state of things in which there is not specific will or assent to suffer something which, if inflicted against the party's will, would be a wrong, but only conduct showing that, for one reason or another, he is content to abide the chance of it.[75]

Pollock, Law of Torts (8th Ed.) 159.

[74] A part of the opinion, on other points, is omitted.

So, in Common Law States, see Lutlopp v. Heckmann (1904) 70 N. J. Law, 272, 57 Atl. 1046: "In order to set up in such a case [assault and battery] the defense of son assault demesne, it must be pleaded specially."

On son assault demesne as a sufficient defense, see infra, "The Different Kinds of Justification or Excuse in Trespass: Defense of the Person."

[75] The standard common law form of the plea of leave and license had this as its cardinal averment: "Because he says that he, the said defendant, at the said several times when, etc., by the leave and license of the said plaintiff, to him for that purpose first given and granted, to wit, at, etc., aforesaid, committed the said several supposed trespasses in the said declaration mentioned:

PATRICK v. COLERICK.

Trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close with horses and waggons. Third plea, that the defendant being possessed of ten cart loads of straw, the plaintiff without the defendant's leave and against his will, took the said straw and wrongfully carried it away and placed it on plaintiff's said close, and that defendant made fresh pursuit after his said straw, and then quietly and peaceably entered the said close,

"and with said horses, mares, geldings and waggons in the introductory part of this plea mentioned (the same then being necessary and proper for that purpose) in order to retake his said straw and did then and there quietly and peaceably retake his said straw, and load the same upon the last mentioned waggons, and carry the same away from and out of the said close in the said first count mentioned, in which, etc., as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid, doing no unnecessary damage to the plaintiff."

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer.[76]

PARKE, B. The passage in Blackstone, as to the right of reception, applies to the case where the goods are placed on the ground of a third party. All the old authorities say, that where a party places the goods upon his own close, he gives to the owner of them an implied license to enter for the purpose of reception. There are many authorities to that effect in Viner's Abridgement. Thus, in title "Trespass," (1)a, it is said, "If a man takes my goods and carries them into his own land, I may justify my entry into the said land to take my goods again; for they came there by his own act." The reason of the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas[77] is, that it was not shewn who placed the goods there; and that the mere fact of the defendant's goods being on the plaintiff's land is no justification of the entry, unless it be shewn that they came there by the plaintiff's act.

as he lawfully might for the cause aforesaid." 2 Chitty, Pl. (2d Ed. 1811) 608, 609.

By the common law procedure act of 1852, the averment was reduced to this: "That he did what is complained of by the plaintiff's leave." 2 Chitty, Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) p. 658. See Common Law Procedure Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, Sch. B., 44.

ARROWSMITH v. LE MESURIER.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1806. 2 B. & P. N. R. 211, 127 Reprint, 605, 9 R. R. 642.)

Trespass for assault and false imprisonment. At the trial it appeared that a warrant having been granted by a magistrate, for apprehending the plaintiff upon a charge of conspiracy to sue out a fraudulent commission of bankrupt, a constable went with the warrant to the plaintiff's house, and shewed it to him; that after conversing some time with the constable, the plaintiff desired to have a copy of the warrant, which the constable permitted him to take; after which the plaintiff attended the constable to the magistrate, and after being examined upon the subject of the charge, was dismissed, about six hours after the time when the warrant was first shewn to him; that the constable never touched the plaintiff, and that due notice of the action had been given. Verdict for the defendant.

A rule having been obtained, calling on defendant to shew cause why this verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial be had, Sellon, Serjt., in support of the rule, contended, that it was not necessary that the plaintiff should be touched in order to constitute an arrest; that the plaintiff having gone before the magistrate in obedience to the warrant, must be considered to have been arrested, and consequently the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict.

Sir James Mansfield, Ch. J. I can suppose that an arrest may take place without an actual touch, as if a man be locked in a room: but here the plaintiff went voluntarily before a magistrate. The warrant was made no other use of than as a summons. The constable brought a warrant, but did not arrest the plaintiff. How can a man's walking freely to a magistrate prove him to be arrested? I think that the jury have done justice.

The other judges concurring, rule discharged.[78]

[78] Compare Wood v. Lane (1834) 6 C. & P. 774, at Nisi Prius before Tindal, C. J.:

The action was against Lane and Cleaton for false imprisonment, with pleas of not guilty and leave and license. It appeared that the plaintiff was at the house of one Saunders, bargaining with him for the sale of some goods, and had just made out an invoice, when the defendant Cleaton came in alone, and asked the plaintiff to pay him the amount he owed him, or some money on account. The plaintiff said he would not; upon which Cleaton went just outside the door, and returned immediately, followed by the defendant Lane, and pointing to the plaintiff, said, "This is the gentleman." The plaintiff tore up the CADWELL v. FARRELL.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1862. 28 Ill. 438.)

This is an action entitled, "of a plea of trespass on the case," wherein Julia Farrell is plaintiff, and Frederick A. Cadwell is defendant, commenced and tried in the Superior Court of Chicago. Plea, general issue. There was a verdict for the plaintiff for $10,000. The defendant moved in arrest of judgment, assigning a misjoinder of causes of action. This motion was denied, and the court rendered judgment on the verdict. The defendant went up on error.[79]

WALKER, J. It is insisted that there is a misjoinder of counts in this declaration; that the sixth count is in trespass, whilst the others are in case. This is the only question raised upon this record. If this objection is well taken, the court below erred in refusing to arrest the judgment.

The sixth count avers that appellee had a spot on her left eye, which injured her personal appearance, and that appellant falsely, fraudulently and deceitfully represented and pretended to appellee, that by invoice and threw it on the fire and said, "I suppose I am to go with you." The answer was, "Yes." The plaintiff and the two defendants went away together, to the plaintiff's house. There was no bailable process against the plaintiff. The defendant Lane was merely a clerk to Cleaton's attorney, but had represented himself as having authority to arrest.

Talfourd, Serjt., for the defendant. No arrest has been proved. Saunders, who was present, says nothing of the laying hold of the plaintiff.

(Tindal, C. J. The question is whether the plaintiff went voluntarily from Mr. Saunders' to his own house, or whether he went in consequence of the act of the defendants. If you put your hand upon a man, or tell him he must go with you, and he goes, supposing you to have the power to enforce him, is not that an arrest? May you not arrest without touching a man?)

White referred to the case of Arrowsmith v. Le Mesurier (1806) 2 B. & P. N. R. 211.

(Tindal, C. J. That is a case which has often been spoken of as going to the very extreme point; but in that case the jury found that the plaintiff went voluntarily with the officer. And in this case, if you can persuade the jury that the plaintiff went voluntarily, you may succeed.)

Talfourd, Serjt., then addressed the jury for the defendants. There was no real compulsion. No writ was produced. It was only an endeavour by a manoeuver to make the plaintiff do what he ought, but would not, viz., pay the money which he owed. It was a sudden thought which struck the attorney's clerk, and it is not a case for damages.

Tindal, C. J., in summing up, told the jury, that, if the plaintiff acted as an unwilling agent at the time and against his own will, when he went to his house from that of Saunders, it was just as much an arrest as if the defendants had forced him along.

The jury found for the plaintiff. Damage, £10.

means of his skill and knowledge as an oculist, he could remove the blemish from her eye, and render its appearance equal to that of her right eye, without any injury to the right eye; and that he would not take out or destroy her left eye, and that she would be well and free from the effects of the treatment in six or seven days; that appellee, confiding in the truth of the representations thus made by appellant, and believing them to be true, was deceived, and thereby induced, at his special instance and request, to treat her left eye, to make it look as well as the right eye, for the sum of thirty dollars, which she paid to him. But that appellant, well knowing as aforesaid, falsely and maliciously pretended to operate on appellee's left eye, for the pretended purpose of causing it to look as well as her right eye, and to remove the spot therefrom, and did cut and lacerate the left eye, by means of which cutting and lacerating and tearing of the left eye, she suffered great pain; and that in consequence thereof, her right eye became greatly inflamed, and she suffered great pain, and was obliged to lay out and expend large sums of money for medical attendance for her cure, and was unable to perform labor for a long space of time.

It is urged that this count charges the operation to have been performed with malice, and that a direct injury to the person, prompted by malice, constitutes a trespass, for which case cannot be sustained. Direct and immediate force employed by one person against another, without his consent, with malice, constitutes trespass, however slight the injury produced; but it is otherwise when the force used is with the consent or at the request of the person against whom employed. If a dentist extract a tooth for a person at his request, whether necessary or not, it is no wrong; but if unskillfully performed, he would become liable in case for the injury resulting from a want of proper skill. If the same act were performed with malice, and without consent, it would be an aggravated trespass, if not a crime. In this case, the operation was performed at the request of appellee. This prevents her from recovering in trespass, and had the operation been skillfully performed, she could have no right of recovery in any form of action; but if the representations which induced the retainer were false and fraudulent, or if the proper skill was not employed, then case is properly the remedy. * * *[80] [80] The court saved the case upon the theory that the sixth count was not for the direct and immediate force, but for falsely pretending to perform the operation for the purpose of improving the appearance of the eye.

MARKLEY v. WHITMAN.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1893. 95 Mich. 236, 54 N. W. 763, 20 L. R. A. 55, 35 Am. St. Rep. 558.)

Action for assault and battery. There was a judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings error.

LONG, J. Plaintiff and defendant were both students at the Buchanan high school. On February 7, 1890, while the plaintiff was on his way home from school, the defendant and others of the scholars were engaged in what is called a "rush" or "horse game." The practice of the game is to find some one in advance, when the others form in a line, each one in the rear pushing the one in advance of him, and so on through the line until the one to be "rushed," who knows nothing of what is coming, is rushed upon by the one in his rear, and pushed or rushed. On the day in question the plaintiff, while going towards home on the sidewalk, was to be rushed. The defendant was in his immediate rear, and engaged in the game. When pushed, he rushed upon the plaintiff, striking him with his hands between the shoulders with such violence that the plaintiff was thrown nearly to the ground. Immediately thereafter he lost his voice above a whisper, and has never recovered its use. His neck was nearly fractured, and for several months he was compelled to take medical treatment in Chicago. It is claimed that he suffered great pain, and has not fully recovered. This action was brought to recover for the injuries thus occasioned. On the trial in the court below, the plaintiff had verdict and judgment for $2,500. Defendant brings error.

The errors relied upon relate principally to the charge of the court. It was claimed on the trial in the court below (1) that the push against the plaintiff was not an assault, and therefore not actionable; (2) that it was a pure accident; (3) that it was not a dangerous game, and the results which followed from the push could not have been anticipated; (4) that the defendant only put himself in a position ready to be pushed if the spirit of frolic should be entered into by those behind him, and his rush upon the plaintiff was neither invited nor approved; (5) that there was no unlawful intent to injure the plaintiff. It is insisted that the court below, in its charge, entirely ignored the claim of the defendant made on the trial; and also that the plaintiff was one of the school fellows, and stood in a different position to the defendant than would a stranger. The court instructed the jury substantially that, if the plaintiff was participating in the play, or in any way contributed to the injury, he could not recover; that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he must show by a preponderance of evidence that the game was a dangerous one, and that the injury was occasioned by the push given by the defendant; and that the defendant willfully pushed the plaintiff, or was voluntarily engaged in the game, which must be found to be dangerous, and one reasonably calculated to be dangerous to innocent persons lawfully traveling along the sidewalk upon which the play was conducted. The court below further instructed the jury as follows:

"If the game in question was a dangerous one to indulge in on the street and at the time in question, and if the defendant was voluntarily engaged in such play at the time of the accident, and if the plaintiff was not participating in such sport, and was not guilty of conduct which in any way contributed to the injury, but, on the contrary, was lawfully traveling on the sidewalk, and in the exercise of reasonable care, and if the defendant, while so playing, pushed the plaintiff and injured him, he is liable; and in such case it is no excuse for him to say that he himself was pushed against the plaintiff by some other boy."

This charge fully protected the rights of the defendant, and was as favorable to him as the facts of the case warranted. In fact, on the trial it was little in dispute that the injury occurred exactly as the plaintiff claimed. He was peaceably walking along the street, and had no intimation that he was to be "rushed." He was not participating in the game, and, if his testimony is true, never had taken part in it, and on that occasion was not anticipating that he was the victim selected to be rushed. It was an assault upon him, and the court correctly stated the rules of law applicable to the case; at least the defendant had no reason to complain. It is evident that the defendant was one of those engaged in the game, which, upon a bare statement of the manner in which it is to be played, must be regarded as dangerous. He voluntarily engaged in it, and his conduct occasioned the injury. It was unlawful to "rush" the plaintiff under the circumstances shown, and the defendant must be held responsible for the consequences which followed. It may be, and probably is, true that those taking part in it did not anticipate the injurious effects upon the plaintiff; but that does not lessen the plaintiff's pain and suffering, or make the act less unlawful. The plaintiff, while passing along the street, and not engaged in the sport, had the same right to be protected from such an assault as a stranger would have had, and the assault upon him was as unlawful as it would have been upon a stranger.

We find no error in the case, and the judgment must be affirmed, with costs.

MOHR v. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1905. 95 Minn. 261, 104 N. W. 12, 1 L. R. A. [N. S.] 439, 111 Am. St. Rep. 462, 5 Ann. Cas. 303.)

BROWN, J. We come then to a consideration of the questions presented by defendant's appeal from the order denying his motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

It is contended that final judgment should be ordered in his favor for the following reasons: (a) That it appears from the evidence received on the trial that plaintiff consented to the operation on her left ear. (b) If the court shall find that no such consent was given, that, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, no consent was necessary. * * *

We shall consider first the question whether, under the circumstances shown in the record, the consent of plaintiff to the operation was necessary. If, under the particular facts of this case, such consent was unnecessary, no recovery can be had, for the evidence fairly shows that the operation complained of was skillfully performed and of a generally beneficial nature. But if the consent of plaintiff was necessary, then the further questions presented become important. This particular question is new in this state. At least, no case has been called to our attention wherein it has been discussed or decided, and very few cases are cited from other courts. We have given it very deliberate consideration, and are unable to concur with counsel for defendant in their contention that the consent of plaintiff was unnecessary.

The evidence tends to show that, upon the first examination of plaintiff, defendant pronounced the left ear in good condition, and that, at the time plaintiff repaired to the hospital to submit to the operation on her right ear, she was under the impression that no difficulty existed as to the left. In fact, she testified that she had not previously experienced any trouble with that organ. It cannot be doubted that ordinarily the patient must be consulted, and his consent given, before a physician may operate upon him. * * *

Kinkead on Torts, vol. 1, § 375, states the general rule on this subject as follows:

"The patient must be the final arbiter as to whether he will take his chances with the operation, or take his chances of living without it. Such is the natural right of the individual, which the law recognizes as a legal one. Consent, therefore, of an individual, must be either expressly or impliedly given before a surgeon may have the right to operate."

There is logic in the principle thus stated, for, in all other trades, professions, or occupations, contracts are entered into by the mutual agreement of the interested parties, and are required to be performed in accordance with their letter and spirit. No reason occurs to us why the same rule should not apply between physician and patient. If the physician advises his patient to submit to a particular operation, and the patient weighs the dangers and risks incident to its performance, and finally consents, he thereby, in effect, enters into a contract authorizing his physician to operate to the extent of the consent given, but no further.

It is not, however, contended by defendant that under ordinary circumstances consent is unnecessary, but that, under the particular circumstances of this case, consent was implied; that it was an emergency case, such as to authorize the operation without express consent or permission. The medical profession has made signal progress in solving the problems of health and disease, and they may justly point with pride to the advancements made in supplementing nature and correcting deformities, and relieving pain and suffering. The physician impliedly contracts that he possesses, and will exercise in the treatment of patients, skill and learning, and that he will exercise reasonable care and exert his best judgment to bring about favorable results. The methods of treatment are committed almost exclusively to his judgment, but we are aware of no rule or principle of law which would extend to him free license respecting surgical operations. Reasonable latitude must, however, be allowed the physician in a particular case; and we would not lay down any rule which would unreasonably interfere with the exercise of his discretion, or prevent him from taking such measures as his judgment dictated for the welfare of the patient in a case of emergency. If a person should be injured to the extent of rendering him unconscious, and his injuries were of such a nature as to require prompt surgical attention, a physician called to attend him would be justified in applying such medical or surgical treatment as might reasonably be necessary for the preservation of his life or limb, and consent on the part of the injured person would be implied. And again, if, in the course of an operation to which the patient consented, the physician should discover conditions not anticipated before the operation was commenced, and which, if not removed, would endanger the life or health of the patient, he would, though no express consent was obtained or given, be justified in extending the operation to remove and overcome them.

But such is not the case at bar. The diseased condition of plaintiff's left ear was not discovered in the course of an operation on the right, which was authorized, but upon an independent examination of that organ, made after the authorized operation was found unnecessary. Nor is the evidence such as to justify the court in holding, as a matter of law, that it was such an affection as would result immediately in the serious injury of plaintiff, or such an emergency as to justify proceeding without her consent. She had experienced no particular difficulty with that ear, and the questions as to when its diseased condition would become alarming or fatal, and whether there was an immediate necessity for an operation, were, under the evidence, questions of fact for the jury.

The contention of defendant that the operation was consented to by plaintiff is not sustained by the evidence. At least, the evidence was such as to take the question to the jury. This contention is based upon the fact that she was represented on the occasion in question by her family physician; that the condition of her left ear was made known to him, and the propriety of an operation thereon suggested, to which he made no objection. It is urged that by his conduct he assented to it, and that plaintiff was bound thereby. It is not claimed that he gave his express consent. It is not disputed but that the family physician of plaintiff was present on the occasion of the operation, and at her request. But the purpose of his presence was not that he might participate in the operation, nor does it appear that he was authorized to consent to any change in the one originally proposed to be made. Plaintiff was naturally nervous and fearful of the consequences of being placed under the influence of anæsthetics, and the presence of her family physician was requested under the impression that it would allay and calm her fears. The evidence made the question one of fact for the jury to determine. * * *

Compare Bennan v. Parsonnet (1912) 83 N. J. Law, 20, 83 Atl. 948: P. applied to D., a surgeon, to operate upon a rupture in P.'s left groin. After P. had been placed under the anæsthetic, D. discovered in P.'s right groin a rupture of more serious menace, and likely to cause P.'s death if strangulation occurred. This danger was not to be apprehended from the other rupture, which had been operated upon before, although without entire success. D. operated upon the more serious rupture without waiting for P. to regain consciousness. In an action by P. for assault and battery, the jury, under the charge of the court, found that D. had performed an operation upon P. without his consent, and rendered a verdict of $1,000. The Supreme Court set aside the verdict, upon the theory of an implied assent. "The conclusion to which we are led," said Garrison, J., delivering the opinion, "is that when a person has selected a surgeon to operate upon him, and has appointed no other person to represent him during the period of unconsciousness that constitutes a part of such operation, the law will by implication constitute such surgeon the representative pro hac vice of his patient, and will, within the scope to which such implication applies, cast upon him the responsibility of so acting in the interest of his patient that the latter shall receive the full benefit of that professional judgment and skill to which he is legally entitled. Such implication affords no license to the surgeon to operate upon a patient against his will or by subterfuge, or to perform upon him any operation of a sort different from that to which he had consented or that involved risks and results of a kind not contemplated. As to such matters, the rule in question submits nothing to the judgment of the surgeon, who as the implied representative of his patient can under such implication truly represent him only in so far as he gives to him the benefit of his professional wisdom within the general lines of the curative treatment agreed upon between them, unless, of course, a wider discretion has been accorded to him. Within such general lines, however, much is necessarily left to the good judgment of the operating surgeon, just how much will depend upon the circumstances of the individual case. If the surgeon transcends his implied authority as thus defined, the question of his skill and wisdom is irrelevant, since no amount of professional skill can justify the substitution of the will of the surgeon for that of his patient."

Compare, further, Rishworth v. Moss (1913, Tex. Civ. App.) 159 S. W. 122: A child 11 years of age was taken by her adult sister to a surgeon, who, without the knowledge of the child's parents, but at the instance and request of the adult sister, placed the child under an anæsthetic with a view to an operation for the removal of adenoids. The child died in the operation. The life of the child was not dependent upon an operation, nor was there any emergency. The parents could have been communicated with before the operation. Held, that the child had no authority to consent to the operation, and that, in the absence of evidence of delegated authority in the sister, the surgeon was liable although using due skill.

The physician in charge, D., told H. that a proposed operation would be a trifling one, but said also that two operations might be necessary. Thereafter D. performed one operation, and P. returned home. There being no improvement, H. brought P. back to the sanitarium, and D. the next day performed a second operation, but without asking the consent of either H. or P. There was no lack of skill in performing the second operation. Held, that D. was

STOUT v. WREN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1821. 8 N. C. 420, 9 Am. Dec. 653.)

Action for damages for a battery. The facts were that the plaintiff and defendant quarreled and agreed to fight, and that after they had gone out for that purpose the defendant asked the plaintiff if he would "clear him of the law," and the latter said, "Yes," whereupon the defendant beat him, he making no resistance. There was some evidence, contradicted however by other witnesses, that the plaintiff was so drunk as not to know what he was doing. The court instructed the jury that if the plaintiff was so intoxicated as not to know what he was about, he should have a verdict, otherwise not, for his assent to the injury barred his right of recovery. There was a verdict for the defendant and judgment thereon, a new trial having been refused, and the plaintiff appealed to this court.

TAYLOR, C. J. It is equally reasonable and correct, that a man shall not recover a recompense for an injury received by his own consent, but the rule must necessarily be received with this qualification, that the act from whence the injury proceeded be lawful. Hence in those manly sports and exercises which are thought to qualify men for the use of arms, and to give them strength and activity, if two played by consent at cudgels, and one hurt the other, no action would lie. But where in an action for assault and battery, the defendant offered to give in evidence that the plaintiff and he boxed by consent, from whence the injury proceeded, it was held to be no bar to the action, for as the act of boxing is unlawful, the consent of the parties to fight could not excuse the injury: Boulter v. Clark, Buil. N. P. 16. The consequence of this distinction is apparent also in the law of homicide; for if death ensue from innocent and allowable recreations, the case will fall within the rule of excusable homicide, but if the sport be unlawful and endanger the peace, and death ensue, the party killing is guilty of manslaughter: Fost. 259. It is laid down in Matthew v. Ollerton, Comb. 218,[82] that if one license another to beat him, such license is void, because it is against the peace, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment.

liable. Scott, C. J., delivering the opinion, remarks: "Where the narr. shows the act to have been a trespass to the person, or avers it to have been without the consent of the patient, it would seem to be unnecessary to go farther and negative the fact that some other person lawfully authorized to act for the patient consented. The question of the consent of such other person, if in the case, might well be left to be presented by a plea in bar."

[82] This case, Matthew v. Ollerton (1693), was in debt upon an award; the remark quoted was a dictum. It is apparently, however, the beginning of the doctrine upon this point. See Bell v. Hansley (1855) 48 N. C. 131; Adams v. Waggoner (1870) 33 Ind. 531, 5 Am. Rep. 230; Shay v. Thompson (1884) 59 Wis. 540, 18 N. W. 473, 18 Am. Rep. 538; Willey v. Carpenter (1892) 64 Vt. 212, 23 Atl. 630, 15 L. R. A. 855; Lund v. Tyler (1901) 115 Iowa, 236, 88 N. W. 333; Morris v. Miller (1909) 83 Neb. 218, 119 N. W. 458, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 907, 131 Am. St. Rep. 636, 17 Ann. Cas. 1047.

The case was very fairly put to the jury, as to the evidence of the plaintiff's intoxication, but I think the law was misconceived in stating to them, that if the plaintiff was sober and assented, he was not entitled to recover. There must be a new trial.[83]

EVANS v. WAITE.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted by defendant upon plaintiff. It is charged in the complaint that:

"On July 4, 1891, while the plaintiff was lawfully riding on horseback on the public highway, in company with defendant, the defendant, being then and there armed with a revolver loaded with powder and leaden ball, negligently and carelessly discharged the said revolver so that the ball therefrom struck the plaintiff in the hip, and passed on through the flesh into his thigh, where it became lodged and imbedded so that it was impracticable to remove the same; and that the said ball so fired from the revolver in the hands of the defendant caused a deep, painful, and dangerous wound."

It is further alleged that the defendant is a minor of about the age of eighteen years.

The defendant answered by his guardian: (1) A general denial; and (2) that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, in that he enticed the defendant to go with him for the purpose of shooting, and that while the parties were shooting the plaintiff was accidentally injured, and not through any negligence of the defendant.

[83] In Morris v. Miller (1909) 83 Neb. 218, 119 N. W. 460, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 907, 131 Am. St. Rep. 636, 17 Ann. Cas. 1047, the following instruction had been given: "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff and defendant voluntarily and by agreement entered into a fight, still I charge you that such agreement, if made, was unlawful, for the reason that such agreement, if made, would be in violation of the laws of the state and void, and such agreement, if made, would not be any defense to this action." Referring to it, Reese, C. J., remarked: "This instruction was given as applicable to the contention that the fight or combat was entered into voluntarily and by mutual agreement, and that the unsuccessful party to the strife could not transfer his cause from the street to the courts and recover damages for whatever injury he might sustain by reason of the prowess or activity of his adversary. At the time of the argument of the case at the bar of this court, the writer was of the opinion that the giving of the instruction might have been erroneous, but more mature reflection and an examination of the authorities have led to a different conclusion. It is true that an instruction of this kind would be condemned by some reputable authorities, among which are Galbraith v. Fleming (1886) 60 Mich. 403, 27 N. W. 581, and Smith v. Simon (1888) 69 Mich. 481, 37 N. W. 548; but it is quite clear that the great weight of authority is the other way, and that the recognized rule is that where two parties fight voluntarily, either party may recover from the other the actual damages suffered, and the consent of the plaintiff to engage in the combat will not bar his suit to recover."

Compare Barholt v. Wright (1887) 45 Ohio St. 177, 12 N. E. 185, 4 Am. St. Rep. 535, where, under a general denial, the agreement to fight was shown in mitigation of damages, but was no bar to the action.

On the trial it was proved that the defendant was a minor; that on the occasion mentioned in the pleadings he was armed with a revolver; and that the plaintiff was wounded, as charged in the complaint, by a bullet discharged from the revolver by accident, when in the hands of the defendant. The circuit judge held that, because the defendant was a minor and was armed with a revolver in violation of chapter 329, Laws of 1883 (S. & B. Ann. St. § 4397b), he was liable to the plaintiff for the injury, without regard to the question of negligence. Thereupon the jury were instructed to find for the plaintiff and to assess damages for the injury. The court confined the recovery to compensatory damages. The jury assessed plaintiff's damages at $375, nearly $150 of which was for actual necessary expenses incurred by the plaintiff, and for loss of time by reason of the injury. A motion for a new trial was denied, and judgment entered for the plaintiff pursuant to the verdict. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

LYON, C. J. In Shay v. Thompson, 59 Wis. 540, 18 N. W. 473, 48 Am. Rep. 538, it was held that if two persons, by mutual consent, in anger fight together, each is liable to the other for actual damages. The fighting being unlawful, the consent of either party is no bar to the action. The authorities upon which the decision is based are cited in the opinion. The rule of that case applies here. It was unlawful for the defendant to be armed with a revolver when the plaintiff was injured, and hence he is liable for any injury inflicted by him with such weapon. It is immaterial that the plaintiff was consenting to the defendant being so armed and to his use of the revolver. Such is the rule of Shay v. Thompson, 59 Wis. 540, 18 N. W. 473, 48 Am. Rep. 538. The only effect of such consent was to confine the recovery to compensatory damages, and it was so restricted.

The question of negligence is also immaterial. True, the complaint charges that the defendant was negligent, but it also contains a sufficient statement of a cause of action based upon the fact that the defendant was unlawfully armed with the revolver with which he wounded the plaintiff. Were there any defect in the complaint in that view of the case, it was amendable, for the whole transaction was fully proved on the trial without objection. This brings the case within the rule which allows the pleading to be amended to correspond with the proofs, or permits a variance between the pleadings and proofs to be disregarded. We fail to find any error disclosed in the record.

WELSUND v. SCHUELLER

This was an action to recover damages for seduction. The plaintiff was an uneducated and inexperienced girl of 16, without relatives in this country. She could not speak English, and was dependent upon her own labor for support. While employed as a servant in the family of defendant's father, she was seduced by defendant, who obtained her consent by assurances of love and caressing, and by inducing her to believe she would lose her place of employment if she did not submit. The relation continued about two months, when the defendant absconded, and did not return to the state until five years after her child was born. A demurrer was sustained by the trial court, upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

LEWIS, J. (after stating the facts). No right of action existed at common law in favor of a woman against her seducer. The right to recover damages for seduction is at common law limited to the father or any one standing in loco parentis. Although damages were not limited to the loss of services, yet the action was based upon the relation of master and servant. Some states, including our own, have modified the common law permitting the action to be maintained by the parent or guardian, even though the daughter or ward is not living with or in the service of the plaintiff, and although there is no loss of service. And in a few states the right of action is conferred upon the female seduced, notably Indiana, Iowa, and Oregon. Even in those states the courts have sharply drawn the distinction between real seduction and acquiescence, holding that no cause of action existed if it was shown to be a voluntary act. Consent must be procured by some trick or artifice other than mere solicitation. Brown v. Kingsley, 38 Iowa, 220. The statute only applies where the defendant has been mainly instrumental in occasioning the wrong. Breon v. Henkle, 14 Or. 494, 13 Pac. 289. However, in the absence of any modification of the common law, the action will lie where the defendant fraudulently acquired possession of his victim by taking her into his family as a ward. Smith v. Richards, 29 Conn. 232.

The people of this state have seen fit to acquiesce in the common law, except as stated. It would be debatable whether the facts alleged in the complaint now before us are sufficient, even with the statutory modification above noted, and certainly they do not constitute such exsession of a revolver by a minor and the pointing of it were both forbidden by statute.

Compare Gilmore v. Fuller (1902) 198 Ill. 130, 65 N. E. 84, 60 L. R. A. 286: P., a member of a charivari party serenading a bridal couple with firearms, was accidentally shot by D., another member of the party. Held, that there could be no recovery.

ceptional circumstances as to bring the case within Smith v. Richards. As the law is, no cause of action is stated, and whether it is wise to change it calls for no opinion on our part. That is a question concerning which there is a diversity of opinion and can only be determined by the legislative power.

(b) Assumption of Risk in Trespass[86]

MIDDLETON v. BRIDELYNGTON.

(De Banco Roll, Hilary 12 Rich. II. [1388] rot. 124, York.)

William the son of Richard of Middleton, of Beverly, draper, was attached to reply to Gregory of Bridelyngton, of a plea that with force and arms he assaulted the said Gregory at Beverly, and beat, and wounded and ill treated him, to the great damage of the said Gregory, and contra pacem. And further that the said Gregory complains by Musser (1883) 78 Mo. 153 (In a civil action for an alleged rape, the plaintiff's testimony showed consent. A judgment for plaintiff was reversed, the Supreme Court remarking, "We feel constrained to say, 'Volenti non fit injuria' ").

On the statutory change, permitting the woman to sue her seducer, see Bradshaw v. Jones (1899) 103 Tenn. 331, 52 S. W. 1072, with an elaborate note in 76 Am. St. Rep. 655, 659; Wilson v. Mangold (1912) 154 Iowa, 352, 134 N. W. 1072 ("If without being deceived, and without any false promises, deceit, or artifice, the plaintiff voluntarily submitted, the defendant would not be liable").

See, also, for a summary of the varied character of this statutory modification of the common-law principle, 35 Cyc. 1294, 1295, and cases cited in note 3; and the cases under Dec. Dig., Key-No., "Seduction," § 11.

[86] The doctrine of assumption of risk appears more often in negligence cases, and especially in cases which involve the relation of master and servant. It is sometimes treated as resting on an implied contract. See Dowd v. New York, etc., Ry. (1902) 170 N. Y. 459, 471, 63 N. E. 541, and cases there cited. One of its earliest appearances in prominent form is in Ilott v. Wilkes (1820) 3 B. & Ald. 304, 22 R. R. 400. The facts here were as follows: The defendant was the owner of Chrishall Wood, consisting of fifty or sixty acres; and by his order, nine or ten spring-guns were set there. Several boards were affixed, containing notice to the public that such instruments were so placed. There formerly had been a path on the outside of the wood, but it had not been used for some years. The plaintiff, on the occasion in question, accompanied by another person, went out in the day time for the purpose of gathering nuts, and proposed to his companion to enter Chrishall Wood. The latter, however, refused, unless the plaintiff would go first; and he then told plaintiff that spring-guns were set there. They both, however, entered the wood, and the plaintiff received the injury which was the subject of the action, in consequence of treading on the wire communicating with the spring-gun. Upon these facts, the learned judge considering that this involved the same question which was under the consideration of the Common Pleas, in Deane v. Clayton (1816) 2 Marsh. 577, directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, and reserved to the defendant liberty to move to enter a nonsuit. The jury assessed the damages at £50.; and found, that at the time of the injury, there was not any footpath near the place in question; that the plain-

John of Wilton, his attorney, that the said William, on the Monday next after the feast of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, 8 Richard II., vi et armis, to wit, with swords, bows and arrows, assaulted, wounded etc. the said Gregory at Beverly, contra pacem etc., and he claimed damages of twenty pounds.

The defendant by Thomas of Lynton, his attorney, defended the force and arms and pleaded not guilty, and placed himself upon the country, upon which issue was joined.

And as to the beating and wounding of the said Gregory, he said that he and the said Gregory, being between the ages of nine and ten years, were playing together at Beverly at a place called the Feegang, and there of their common accord sported and played together, and the harm suffered by the said Gregory was done in play, unintentionally and without malice on the part of the said William.

In his replication Gregory asserts that the injury was done intentionally and prays that this may be inquired of by the country, and William joins issue.

tiff was not in the exercise of any right of path, but was gathering nuts; and that he had knowledge and notice that spring-guns were placed in the wood. On the question whether a nonsuit should be entered, all the judges concurred that the action could not be maintained. Said Bayley, J.: "This is a case in which the plaintiff had notice that there were spring-guns in the wood. The declaration states that the plaintiff had no notice of the places or of the direction in which the guns themselves were placed, or where the wires communicating with the guns were placed; but it is not necessary to give notice to the public that guns are placed in such particular spots in such particular fields; for that would deprive the property of the intended protection. It is sufficient for a party generally to say, 'There are spring-guns in this wood'; and if another then takes upon himself to go into the wood, knowing that he is in the hazard of meeting with the injury which the guns are calculated to produce, it seems to me that he does it at his own peril, and must take the consequences of his own act. The maxim of law, 'Volenti non fit injuria,' applies; for he voluntarily exposes himself to the mischief which has happened. He is told that if he goes into the wood he will run a particular risk, for that in those grounds there are spring-guns. Notwithstanding that caution, he says, 'I will go into the wood, and I will run the risk of all consequences.'"

Compare the remark of Blackburn, J., delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Fletcher v. Rylands (1866) L. R. 1 Ex. 265, 286: "Traffic on the highways, whether by land or sea, cannot be conducted without exposing those whose persons or property are near it to some inevitable risk; and that being so, those who go on the highway, or have their property adjacent to it, may well be held to do so subject to their taking upon themselves the risk of injury from that inevitable danger; and persons who by the license of the owner pass near to warehouses where goods are being raised or lowered, certainly do so subject to the inevitable risk of accident. In neither case, therefore, can they recover without proof of want of care or skill occasioning the accident; and it is believed that all the cases in which inevitable accident has been held an excuse for what prima facie was a trespass, can be explained on the same principle, viz., that the circumstances were such as to show that the plaintiff had taken that risk upon himself."

COLE v. TURNER.

(At Nisi Prius, 1704. Holt, K. B. 108, 90 Reprint, 958.)

At Nisi Pruis, upon evidence in trespass for assault and battery, Holt, C. J., declared, 1. That the least touching of another in anger is a battery.[87] 2. If two or more meet in a narrow passage, and without any violence or design of harm, the one touches the other gently, it is no battery.[88] 3. If any of them use violence against the other, to force his way in a rude inordinate manner, it is a battery; or any struggle about the passage, to that degree as may do hurt, is a battery. Vid. Bro. Tresp. 236. 7 E. 4, 26. 22 Ass. 60. 3 H. 4, 9.

NOTE: It was in action of battery by husband and wife, for a battery upon the husband and wife, ad dampnum ipsorum; and though the plaintiff had a verdict, yet the Chief Justice said he should never have judgment. And judgment was after arrested above upon that exception.

RUTER v. FOY.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1877. 46 Iowa, 132.)

The plaintiff avers in her petition that the defendant assaulted and beat her with a pitchfork, whereby she sustained great injuries. Trial by jury. Verdict for plaintiff for $200. Defendant appeals.

ADAMS, J. * * * I. The defendant asked an instruction which is in the following words: "If you find from the evidence that plaintiff was injured, or contributed to her injury, by her own act or negligence, defendant would not be liable for assault and battery upon her, and plaintiff cannot recover." The court refused to give the instruction and the refusal is assigned as error.

of about the same age, attended the same school and at recess were both playing in the school yard. As P. was kneeling to shoot a marble, D. came running around the school house, being chased by another boy, and accidentally ran into P., knocking him over and so injuring his eye that P.'s sight was destroyed. A judgment for the defendant was affirmed.

[87] Accord: Kerriford's Case (1630) Clayton 22, pl. 38: "Kerifford, an attorny, was plaintiffe in battery, and the case was thus: He was walking in the market (as attornies do too much), and the defendant and he had some angry words there, upon which the defendant did presse to go by him, and in going, by reason of the throng of people there, he justled the plaintiffe, and for this he brought this action, in which if an assault onely be proved, it is sufficient, and holden it was no assault, for the touching him or justle was to another end, namely, to get by him in the throng and not to beat him, etc."

[88] Compare Reynolds v. Pierson (1902) 29 Ind. App. 273, 64 N. E. 484: P., a man 68 years old, was standing in a public place talking to S., when D., a man of 35 years, weighing 225 pounds, came walking briskly towards S. As he passed, D. seized and jerked the arm of S. The force of D.'s act was such that P., whose arm S. was then holding, was thrown to the ground. D.'s act was friendly and a customary form of greeting between him and S. D. passed on, without knowledge that P. was thrown down or hurt.

The doctrine of contributory negligence has no application in an action for assault and battery. There can be no contributory negligence except where the defendant has been guilty of negligence to which the plaintiff's negligence could contribute. An assault and battery is not negligence. The former is intentional; the latter is unintentional.[89]

SCANLON v. WEDGER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1892. 156 Mass. 462, 31 N. E. 642, 16 L. R. A. 393.)

Tort, for personal injuries. Verdict for the defendant, and Hammond, J., reported the case for the determination of this court.

ALLEN, J. The several plaintiffs were injured by the explosion of a bomb or shell during a display of fireworks in Broadway Square, which was a public highway in Chelsea. This display was made by the defendant Wedger, who acted under a license from the mayor and aldermen of Chelsea for a display of fireworks in Broadway Square on that evening, under Pub. St. 1882, c. 102, § 55. A verdict was returned for the defendant, and the jury made a special finding that the defendant in firing the bomb exercised reasonable care. The [89] Only so much of the case is given as relates to this one point.

Accord: Steinmetz v. Kelly (1880) 72 Ind. 442, 445 (37 Am. Rep. 170): "The doctrine, that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff will defeat his action, has been generally applied in actions based on the negligence of the defendant; in short, in cases involving mutual negligence. But it has also been applied in some cases where the matter complained of was not negligence merely, but the commission of some act in itself unlawful, without reference to the manner of committing it, as the willful and unauthorized obstruction of a highway, whereby a person is injured. Butterfield v. Forrester (1809) 11 East, 60; Dygert v. Schenck (1840) 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 446, 35 Am. Dec. 575. The doctrine, however, can have no application to the case of an intentional and unlawful assault and battery, for the reason that the person thus assaulted is under no obligation to exercise any care to avoid the same by retreating or otherwise, and for the further reason that his want of care can, in no just sense, be said to contribute to the injury inflicted upon him by such assault and battery. An intentional and unlawful assault and battery, inflicted upon a person, is an invasion of his right of personal security, for which the law gives him redress, and of this redress he cannot be deprived on the ground that he was negligent and took no care to avoid such invasion of his right." Per Worden, J.

And see Kain v. Larkin (1890) 56 Hun, 79, 9 N. Y. Supp. 89: Action to recover for the death of Kain, caused by the wrongful act of the defendant. "In this case the defendant, who was acting as an officer, told Kain, the deceased, to go about his business, and shoved him off the sidewalk. Kain came back, and defendant again told him to go home. He said defendant could not make him. Then defendant shot him." In his charge to the jury, the trial judge applied to the case the principle of contributory negligence, and instructed that there could be no recovery if the decedent in any degree contributed to the injury. On this there was a verdict with judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

case comes to us on a report which states that if, on the facts contained therein, and on said finding, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, the case is to be remitted to the Superior Court for the assessment of damages; otherwise, judgments are to be entered for the defendant. It is therefore to be considered whether it appears affirmatively that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The plaintiffs apparently were present at the display of fireworks as voluntary spectators, and were of ordinary intelligence. No fact is stated in the report to show the contrary, nor has any suggestion to that effect been made in the argument. The plaintiffs have not rested their claims at all upon the ground that they were merely travellers upon the highway, or that they were unaware of the nature and risk of the display. The report says: "A considerable number of persons were attracted to said square by said meeting, and said bombs and other fireworks which were being exploded there. A portion of the center of said square, about forty by sixty feet, was roped off by the police of said Chelsea, and said bombs or shells were fired off within the space so enclosed and no spectators were allowed to be within said enclosure. * * * The plaintiffs were lawfully in said highway at the time of the explosion of said mortar, and near said ropes, and were in the exercise of due care."

The bombs or shells are described in the report, and they were to be thrown from mortars into the air, it being intended that they should explode in the air and display colored lights. They were apparently a common form of fireworks, such as has long been in use.

The ground on which the plaintiffs place their several cases is, that the Pub. St. 1882, c. 102, § 55, did not authorize the mayor and aldermen of Chelsea to license the firing of anything but rockets, crackers, squibs, or serpents, and that therefore the act of the defendant in firing bombs or shells was unauthorized and unlawful. It is not contended that it was at the time supposed, either by the defendant or by anybody else, that the license was insufficient to warrant the display which was actually made. The licensee was the chairman of a committee which had a political meeting in charge, and the defendant acted at the request of the committee, and was directed by them as to when and where to fire off the fireworks.

Under this state of things it must be considered that the plaintiffs were content to abide the chance of personal injury not caused by negligence, and that it is immaterial whether there was or was not a valid license for the display. If an ordinary traveller upon the highway had been injured, different reasons would be applicable. Vosburgh v. Moak, 1 Cush. 453, 48 Am. Dec. 613; Jenne v. Sutton, 43 N. J. Law, 257, 39 Am. Rep. 578; Conradt v. Clauve, 93 Ind. 476, 47 Am. Rep. 388. But a voluntary spectator, who is present merely for the purpose of witnessing the display, must be held to consent to it, and he suffers no legal wrong if accidentally injured without negligence on the part of any one, although the show was unauthorized. He takes the risk. See Pollock on Torts, 138–144.[90]

In the opinion of a majority of the court, the entry must be, judgment for the defendant.[91]

[90] The reference is to the first edition of Pollock on Torts. But see the remark of the same author, in his seventh edition, page 505: "Liability under the rule in Indermaur v. Dames may be avoided not only by showing contributory negligence in the plaintiff, but by showing that the risk was as well known to him as to the defendant, and that with such knowledge he voluntarily exposed himself to it; but this will not excuse the breach of a positive statutory duty."

[91] Morton and Knowlton, JJ., dissented. In his dissenting opinion Morton, J., remarks: "It is carrying the doctrine of assumption of the risk further than I think it has ever been carried, to say that one who, being lawfully on the highway and in the exercise of due care, observes as a spectator an unlawful and dangerous exhibition in it, assumes the risk of injury from it. The exhibitor is bound at his peril to see that he has a valid license. If he selects the highway for an unlawful and dangerous display designed or calculated to attract the public, he, and not the spectators, assumes the risk of injury. * * * Further, the question of assumption of the risk is ordinarily one of fact for the jury. The plaintiffs are not bound to show that they did not assume the risk. Unless it appears that they did, they are entitled to recover. This court cannot say, as matter of law, upon the facts stated, that the plaintiffs assumed the risk. Nothing is disclosed as to the circumstances under which the plaintiffs were present. For aught that appears, they might have been travellers, stopping for a moment on their way through the square, or detained by the crowd."

That it is no part of the plaintiff's case to show that he did not assume the risk, see Dowd v. New York, etc., Ry. (1902) 170 N. Y. 459, 472, 63 N. E. 541.

The majority opinion in Scanlon v. Wedger was followed in Frost v. Josselyn (1902) 180 Mass. 392, 62 N. E. 469. Its doctrine was approved in Johnson v. City of New York (1906) 186 N. Y. 139, 149, 78 N. E. 715, 116 Am. St. Rep. 545, 9 Ann. Cas. 824: P. sought to recover for personal injuries caused by being struck by a speeding automobile in an unlawful speed test on a public highway. The plaintiff was present not as a casual spectator traveling on the highway, but for the express purpose of seeing a test in which automobiles would be driven at the greatest possible speed. So, in Bogart v. City of New York (1911) 200 N. Y. 379, 93 N. E. 937, 21 Ann. Cas. 466.

But see Moore v. City of Bloomington (1912) 51 Ind. App. 145, 95 N. E. 374: A city, without authority to do so, granted the free use of certain streets for a fireworks display. P., a child of tender years, standing in the street near the platform from which the fireworks were being discharged, was struck in the face by a skyrocket. Said Lairy, C. J., delivering the opinion: "It appears from the evidence in this case that appellant [P.] was not using the street for travel at the time of her injury, but that she had come to the place solely for the purpose of watching the fireworks. Under such circumstances it is insisted that she assumed the risk of injury and cannot recover for that reason. * * * It appears that she was a girl of tender years, and she may not have known or fully appreciated the danger she was encountering. She may have had no knowledge of the dangerous character of the fireworks which were being used or of the inexperience of the person in charge." A judgment for the defendant was accordingly reversed.

SULLIVAN v. DUNHAM.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1896. 10 App. Div. 438, 41 N. Y. Supp. 1083.)

Action by Mary Sullivan, as administratrix of the estate of Annie E. Harten, deceased, to recover for the death of her intestate. From a judgment entered on a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

WILLARD BARTLETT, J. * * * The complaint charged that the defendants "wrongfully and unlawfully, and in reckless disregard of human life, did carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully blast and blow out" the tree; but the learned judge who presided at the trial held that the action was based, not at all upon negligence, but upon a wrong consisting of the improper use of real estate. The jury were told, in substance, that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict if they were satisfied that the young girl was struck and killed in the highway by a portion of the tree blasted out on Dr. Dunham's land by Messrs. Dinkel & Jewell, employed by him to do the work under the direction of his foreman, Ward. The court also instructed the jury that the caution which the young lady exercised in respect to taking care of herself was not to be considered having previously, in the course of the trial, excluded evidence offered by the defendant for the purpose of showing that, after she was warned of the danger, she voluntarily remained in the vicinity.

In the instruction and ruling upon the degree of care required of the injured person in such a case, it is clear that an error was committed. Even where the cause of action is not founded upon negligence, but rests upon the commission of a trespass by the defendant, the party suffering injury therefrom is not wholly relieved of the obligation to exercise some degree of caution. If he is on his own land, or in the public highway, he has a right to assume, in the absence of knowledge or fair warning to the contrary, that others will not endanger his safety by trespass or other wrong. St. Peter v. Denison, 58 N. Y. 416, 17 Am. Rep. 258; Ochsenbein v. Shapley, 85 N. Y. 214. But, where there is personal notice of the existence of danger, or fair warning, the law imposes upon the person whose safety is imperiled the duty of using such reasonable means as are at hand to protect himself, and he cannot voluntarily and knowingly remain in a place of risk without losing his right of action for the injury which it was thus in his power to avoid. While I am far from saying that, upon the proof actually before the court in the case before us, the young woman who lost her life neglected any precaution which the law demanded, I think there was error in the exclusion of evidence which was offered on that subject. * * *

I think the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.[92]

[92] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point. See ante, p. 68.

For the subsequent history of this case, see (1898) 35 App. Div. 633, 54 N.

WELLS v. KNIGHT.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island, 1911. 32 R. I. 432, 80 Atl. 16.)

Action by the widow and minor children of Llewellyn Wells, for damages, under a Rhode Island statute, on account of his death by the alleged wrongful act of the defendant. There was a verdict for defendant, and plaintiffs bring exceptions.[93]

PARKHURST, J. * * * In the writ and declaration in the case at bar the action is styled "an action of the case." The amended declaration says that it was the duty of the defendant "to exercise due, proper, and reasonable care in the control, management, and operation" of his premises, and in the blasting or quarrying of rock or stone as aforesaid, and to give to travelers due, proper, and sufficient notice of such blasting, so that they would not be injured. The declaration alleges, as to the wrongful act complained of:

"And said plaintiffs aver that said Llewellyn Wells, on, to wit, said 21st day of May, A. D. 1907, at said Cranston, was in the exercise of due care, and was driving in, to wit, a southerly direction, a horse and wagon or vehicle over, across, and upon said Scituate avenue, in said town of Cranston, and while driving or traveling as aforesaid, and while in the exercise of due care, said Llewellyn Wells was struck in the right side, chest, arm, and body with a certain stone or rock, which was thrown or blown by blasting or quarrying as aforesaid, from said ledge or quarry over, across, and upon said highway, which said blasting or quarrying was done by said defendant, his agents and servants."

This, then, is the statement of the case upon which the plaintiffs must recover. The declaration states just how the accident happened. It does not state whether or not it was due to negligence.

It is plainly a declaration in trespass, alleging a direct and forcible trespass to the person, without any allegation of negligence on the part of the defendant. Such a declaration in trespass, founded on a writ, sounding in case, is permitted by statute (section 246, Court and Practice Act 1905), as construed in Adams v. Lorraine Mfg. Co., 29 R. I. 333, 71 Atl. 180; and we regard the action in form as an action of trespass, and not as an action of trespass on the case for negligence. It follows, therefore, that as there is no allegation of negligence, and the action is founded on a direct trespass to the person, the evidence offered in regard to the negligence of the defendant in the matter of the use of explosives and of the covering of the blast was, under strict rules, inadmissible. Furthermore, this court has recently approved the rule set forth in Hickey v. McCabe & Bihler, 30 R. I. 346, 348, 75 Atl. 404, 405, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 425, 19 Ann. Cas. 783, that "it is well settled that negligence need not be shown in order to recover for damage done by matter thrown by blasting upon the adjoining land.

Y. Supp. 962, and (1900) 161 N. Y. 290, 55 N. E. 923, 47 L. R. A. 715, 76 Am. St. Rep. 274, given ante, p. 68.

[93] The statement of facts is abridged, and only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point.

The rule is stated in 19 Cyc. 7, as follows: 'It may be said to be the rule that one who, in blasting upon his premises, casts rocks or other débris upon the land of another, is liable for such invasion, regardless of the degree of care or skill used in doing the work' "—citing numerous cases. The case proceeds to discuss the application of the same rule to cases where the damage was caused by concussions and vibrations due to blasting, noting the conflict of authority, and concludes that the same rule should apply in both classes of cases, and that proof of negligence on the part of the defendant is not necessary in cases where the damage caused by blasting results from concussions and vibrations, any more than in cases where damage results from rocks or other débris cast upon the land. * * *

And the rule of law is the same in cases of injury to the person as in case of damage to property. Hoffman v. Walsh, 117 Mo. App. 278, 93 S. W. 853; St. Peter v. Denison, 58 N. Y. 416, 17 Am. Rep. 258; Munro v. Dredging, etc., Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248, and cases infra. So the same rules are applied in case of injury or death caused to a person traveling in a highway. 2 Shearm. & Red. on Neg. § 688a; Sullivan v. Dunham, 161 N. Y. 290, 294, 295, 299, 55 N. E. 923, 47 L. R. A. 715, 76 Am. St. Rep. 274; Wright v. Compton, 53 Ind. 337, 341. * * *[94]

We come, then, to the question of contributory negligence. A careful consideration of the testimony convinces us that upon this ground the jury was justified in finding a verdict for the defendant. It is undisputed that the defendant sent his employé, Mr. Gardner, expressly for the purpose of warning travelers upon the highway to a point sufficiently far from the blast to be a safe place to wait till after the blasting was over, and that Gardner did warn the deceased and his companion, Ryan, at that point, to stop because of the danger. And although there is some conflict as to whether Mr. Gardner told the deceased and Ryan that there was to be more than one blast, there was ample evidence to corroborate Mr. Gardner's statement that he expressly said to them that three blasts were to be fired, and there is ample evidence that there were warnings given by the men on the ledge and others in the hearing of the deceased and Ryan, and heard by others much farther away than the deceased, that there were other blasts to follow the one already fired, while the deceased was waiting in his buggy at the place where he was first stopped by Gardner. A number of witnesses, eight or more, testify in various ways and to various facts and circumstances regarding the warnings—some directly corroborating Gardner's statement as to his direct warning of three blasts to be fired, others, as to the warnings given by the men at the ledge.

As there was ample evidence to warrant the jury in believing that full and explicit warning of the danger was given to the deceased, and it is undisputed that he was in a safe place when the warning was given, and voluntarily disregarded the warning and moved forward into a place of danger, when he met his death, and as the judge who has tried the case has approved the verdict of the jury, we find no ground for setting the verdict aside. Wilcox v. R. I. Co., 29 R. I. 292, 70 Atl. 913. It is not disputed, in this case, as we understand, that contributory negligence, if proved, is as much a bar to recovery in cases of this character, as in other cases of personal injury or death. Wright v. Compton, 53 Ind. 337; Sullivan v. Dunham, 10 App. Div. 438, 41 N. Y. Supp. 1083; 19 Cyc. p. 10; Shearm. & Red. vol. 2, pp. 1188–1190; Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) vol. 12, p. 510; Smith v. Day (C. C.) 86 Fed. 62; Wadsworth v. Marshall, 88 Me. 263, 34 Atl. 30, 32 L. R. A. 588; Cary Bros. & Hannon v. Morrison, 129 Fed. 177, 63 C. C. A. 267, 65 L. R. A. 659. * * *

The case is remitted to the superior court, with direction to enter its judgment for the defendant upon the verdict as rendered by the jury.

(B) Accident; Mistake; Necessity

(a) Accident

There is a case put in the Year Book 21 Hen. VII., 28, a (1506), that where one shot an arrow at a mark, which glanced from it and struck another, it was holden to be trespass.[95]

Grose, J., in Leame v. Bray (1803) 3 East, 593, 596.

[95] So it was argued, forty years earlier, in the Thorn-Cutting Case (1466) Y. B. 6 Edw. IV., f. 7, pl. 18: "Sir, if one is shooting at butts, and his bow shakes in his hands, and kills a man, ipso invito, it is no felony, as has been said, etc.; but if he wounds one by shooting, he shall have a good action of trespass against him, and yet the shooting was lawful, etc., and the wrong which the other received was against his will."

Referring to the case in the Year Book of 1506, Denman, J., remarks, in Stanley v. Powell (1891) 1 Q. B. 86, 89: "It appears that the passage in question was a mere dictum of Rede, who (see 5 Foss' Lives of the Judges, p. 230) was at the time (1506) either a judge of the King's Bench or C. J. of the Common Pleas, which he became in October in that year, in a case of a very different kind from that in question, and it only amounts to a statement that an action of trespass may lie even where the act done by the defendant is unintentional. The words relied on are, 'Mes ou on tire a les buts et blesse un home, coment que est incontre sa volonte, il sera dit un trespassor incontre son entent.' But in that passage Rede makes observations which shew that he has in his mind cases in which that which would be prima facie a trespass may be excused."

And see Pollock on Torts (8th Ed.) 137, 142: "If we go far back enough, indeed, we shall find a time and an order of ideas in which the thing itself that does damage is primarily liable, so to speak, and through the thing its owner is made answerable. That order of ideas was preserved in the noxal actions of Roman law, and in our own criminal law by the forfeiture of the

(Court of King's Bench, 1616. Hobart, 134, 80 Reprint, 284.)

Weaver brought an action of trespass of assault and battery against Ward. The defendant pleaded, that he was among others by the commandment of the Lords of the Council a trained soldier in London, of the band of one Andrews, captain, and so was the plaintiff; and that they were skirmishing with their muskets charged with powder for their exercise in re militari, against another captain and his band; and as they were so skirmishing, the defendant casualiter et per infortunium et contra voluntatem suam, in discharging of his piece, did hurt and wound the plaintiff, which is the same, etc., absque hoc, that he was guilty aliter sive alio modo. And upon demurrer by the plaintiff, judgment was given for him; for though it were agreed that if men tilt or turney in the presence of the king, or if two masters of defence playing their prizes kill one another, that this shall be no felony; or if a lunatick kill a man or the like, because felony must be done animo felonico: yet in trespass, which tends only to give damages according to hurt or loss, it is not so; and therefore if a lunatick hurt offending object which had moved, as it was said, to a man's death, under the name of deodand. But this is a matter of history, not of modern legal policy. So much we may concede, that when a man's act is the apparent cause of mischief, the burden of proof is on him to show that the consequence was not one which by due diligence he could have prevented. But so does (and must) the burden of proving matter of justification or excuse fall in every case on the person taking advantage of it. If he were not, on the first impression of the facts, a wrong-doer, the justification or excuse would not be needed. * * * There is a good deal of appearance of authority in the older books for the contrary proposition that a man must answer for all direct consequences of his voluntary acts at any rate, or as Justice O. W. Holmes has put it 'acts at his peril.' Such seems to have been the early Germanic law, and such was the current opinion of English lawyers till about the end of the eighteenth century. * * * They [the English authorities] have certainly been supposed to show that inevitable accident is no excuse when the immediate result of an act is complained of. Erskine said more than a century ago in his argument in the celebrated Case of the Dean of St. Asaph (1783) 21 St. Tr. 1022 (and he said it by way of a familiar illustration of the difference between criminal and civil liability), that 'if a man rising in his sleep walks into a china shop and breaks everything about him, his being asleep is a complete answer to an indictment for trespass, but he must answer in an action for everything he has broken.' And Bacon had said earlier to the same purpose, that 'if a man be killed by misadventure, as by an arrow at butts, this hath a pardon of course; but if a man be hurt or maimed only, an action of trespass lieth, though it be done against the party's mind and will.' Maxims of the Law, Reg. 7 [1596]. Stronger examples could not well be propounded. For walking in one's sleep is not a voluntary act at all, though possibly an act that might have been prevented; and the practice of archery was, when Bacon wrote, a positive legal duty under statutes as recent as Henry VIII.'s time, though on the other hand shooting is an extra hazardous act."

See, also, the chapter on "Trespass and Negligence" in Holmes' Common Law; Professor Wigmore's articles in 7 Harv. Law Rev. 315, 383, 441, reprinted in 3 Anglo-American Legal Essays, 474; and "Negligence in the Field of Trespass," Street's Foundations of Legal Liability, vol. 1, pp. 73–85.

a man, he shall be answerable in trespass: and therefore no man shall be excused of a trespass (for this is the nature of an excuse, and not of a justification, prout ei bene licuit) except it may be judged utterly without his fault.[96]

As if a man by force take my hand and strike you, or if here the defendant had said that the plaintiff ran across his piece when it was discharging, or had set forth the case with the circumstances so as it had appeared to the court that it had been inevitable, and that the defendant had committed no negligence to give occasion to the hurt.[97]

[96] "It has been generally supposed that until the present century (earlier in this country, later in England) the old notion continued, i. e., that the rationalization never proceeded any further than to posit a voluntary act by the defendant: that if from a voluntary act a trespass—that is, a direct and immediate injury—followed, nothing could save the defendant from civil responsibility. And no doubt this came to be at least the preliminary test, the sine qua non, showing itself most prominently in the rule of pleading that if there had been no such voluntary act, then there was not even a prima facie trespass. But more than this the whole course of precedents and of contemporary legal opinion does not allow us to believe. The evidence seems plain that the rationalization towards the present standards began at a much earlier period than has been supposed. In other words, there has never been a time, in English law, since (say) the early 1500's, when the defendant in an action for trespass was not allowed to appeal to some test or standard of moral blame or fault in addition to and beyond the mere question of his act having been voluntary: i. e., conceding a voluntary act, he might still exonerate himself (apart from excuses of self-defence, consent, and the like). At first this test, naturally, was vague enough. 'Inevitable necessity,' 'unavoidable accident,' 'could not do otherwise,' served indiscriminately to express, in judicial language, the reasons of fairness on which they equally exempted him who had intentionally struck in self-defense, and him who unintentionally injured without what we now call 'negligence,' and him who intentionally trespassed on the plaintiff's land to avoid a highway attack. The phrases, 'non potuit aliter facere' and 'inevitable necessity,' served as leading catchwords for many centuries; and even up to the 1800's we find court and counsel constantly interchanging 'inevitable accident' and 'absence of negligence or blame.' The precedents show us, then, that somewhere about 1500 a decided sloughing-off of the last stage of the primitive notion took place, and a defendant could exempt himself in this sort of an action if his act, though voluntary, had been without blame: the standard being more indefinite, and perhaps not as liberal, as to-day, but not different in kind. But it would seem that towards the latter half of the 1800's the opinion at the bar in England misconceived the language of some of the earlier cases, and it became necessary to review them in two cases (Holmes v. Mather, 1875; Stanley v. Powell, 1891), in which the doctrine was finally settled, for England, that the defendant's attention to the requirements of due care may be (not necessarily always is) a defence, even where a trespass has been done. The same doctrine ('there must be some blame or want of care and prudence to make a man answerable in trespass') had long been laid down in this country, and that, too, purely as a matter of the right reading of the precedents." JAMES v. CAMPBELL.

Assault and battery. In a quarrel between the defendant, Campbell, and a Mr. Paxton, the plaintiff, James, was struck by the defendant. It was claimed that the blow was intended for Mr. Paxton, not for the plaintiff, although the plaintiff and the defendant had not been on good terms.[99]

Bodkin, for the defendant, in his address to the jury, contended, that if the defendant did not intentionally strike the plaintiff, they ought to find their verdict for him.

plaintiff casualiter viam illam præterivit, et si aliquod malum ei inde accideret hoc fuit contra voluntat. of the defendant; quæ est eadem transgressio. To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

Bullock v. Babcock (1829) 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 391: In 1816, P., then a schoolboy 10 years of age, was hit in the eye with an arrow shot by D., a schoolmate about 12 years old. P. and D. had been shooting at a mark, when D. said to P., "I will shoot you." P. ran into the schoolroom and hid behind a fire board. D. followed to the door of the schoolroom and saying "See me shoot that basket," discharged the arrow. At that moment P. raised his head above the fire board, and the arrow struck him. In 1827, P. sued D. in trespass for the assault and battery.

Castle v. Duryea (1860) 32 Barb. 480; Id., 2 Keyes (*41 N. Y.) 169: D., commanding a regiment in public military exercises, ordered his men to fire. It was intended that only blank cartridges should be used, and elaborate precautions had been taken to secure this. In the belief that there was no ball cartridge in any of the guns, the regiment fired towards the spectators. P., one of the spectators, was hit by a ball which had accidentally been left in a gun used.

[98] Compare Cole v. Fisher (1814) 11 Mass. 137: Trespass vi et armis for firing a gun, by which the plaintiff's horse was frightened and ran away with his chaise and broke it. Sewall, C. J., remarked: "The well-known distinction of immediate injury and consequential injury is the rule upon which our doubts have arisen: in all other respects, the action is clearly maintained for the plaintiff upon the facts agreed. It is immaterial, as respects the right of action, or the form, whether the act of the defendant was by his intention and purpose injurious to the plaintiff, or the mischief which ensued was accidental, and besides his intention, or contrary to it. The decision in the case of Underwood v. Hewson has never been questioned. There the defendant was uncocking his gun, when it went off and accidentally wounded a bystander. The defendant was charged, and holden liable in trespass. Other cases before and since, might be cited, in which the same doctrine, which governed in that decision, has been recognized as the law."

And see 1 Beven on Negligence (3d Ed.) 565: "If, then, blame is at the root of liability, the doer of an unlawful act [i. e., not an act done without justification but an act which, apart from the question of justification, is primarily against law] is a fortiori liable for the consequences of it." Compare: 38 Cyc. 424, note 22.

[99] The statement of facts is abridged.

Mr. Justice BOSANQUET (to the jury): If you think, as I apprehend there can be no doubt, that the defendant struck the plaintiff, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict, whether it was done intentionally or not. But the intention is material in considering the amount of damages.[100]

NEWSOM v. ANDERSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1841. 2 Ired. [24 N. C.] 42, 37 Am. Dec. 406.)

Trespass quare clausum fregit. The defendant was cutting trees on his own land, when one of them accidentally fell on the land of the plaintiff. The defendant did not act designedly or negligently, and it did not appear that there was any actual injury to the land. The plaintiff's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury that this constituted a trespass on the part of the defendant. The court refused. The instruction given sufficiently appears from the opinion. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

D. accordingly armed himself with brass knuckles and went to the railway station, intending to attack S. immediately upon his arrival. When S. got off the train, he stopped to speak to P., a young lady. D., attempting to strike S., accidentally hit P.); Peterson v. Haffner (1877) 59 Ind. 130, 26 Am. Rep. 81. (The plaintiff, Fred Haffner, 5 years old, and his brother William, 7 years old, were sitting on a sand pile, beside a box of mortar, in the public street before their home, when the defendant, 14 years old, with four other boys, came down the street. Some of the boys began throwing pebbles and mortar, in sport. The defendant picking up a piece of mortar, said to William Haffner, "Run or I will hit you." William started to run, and the plaintiff with him. The defendant threw the mortar at William and hit him on the back of the head. At that instant the plaintiff looked back, and a piece of the mortar which had struck William flew off and hit the plaintiff in the eye. The result was the loss of sight in this eye).

by the defendant, and the plaintiff be injured thereby, it is the subject of an action of trespass vi et armis, by all the cases, both ancient and modern, and it is immaterial whether the injury be willful or not: Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 599; 2 Leigh's N. P. 1402. We think that the charge of the judge was incorrect, when he said, "that the plaintiff could not recover, unless the tree was designedly or carelessly felled by the defendant, so as to fall on the plaintiff's land, or that, by falling on the plaintiff's land, it had fallen on his grass or vegetable growth of some kind." The ground of the action, quare clausum fregit, is the injury to the possession: 3 Bl. Com. 210; [Smith v. Milles] 1 T. R. 480; and that whether the injury extends to the plaintiff's land in the mineral or vegetable kingdom. Is not the felling of trees on a person's land, and incumbering it with rubbish, an injury to the possession? We think it is. * * *[2]

BROWN v. KENDALL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1850. 6 Cush. 292.)

This was an action of trespass for assault and battery. It appeared in the evidence that two dogs, belonging to the plaintiff and the defendant, respectively, were fighting in the presence of their masters; that the defendant took a stick about four feet long, and commenced beating the dogs in order to separate them; that the plaintiff was looking on, at a distance of about a rod, and that he advanced a step or two towards the dogs. In their struggle, the dogs approached the place where the plaintiff was standing. The defendant retreated backwards from before the dogs, striking them as he retreated; and as

Accord: Gates v. Miles (1819) 3 Conn. 61: The plaintiffs were the owners of the sloop Mary; the defendant was the owner of the sloop Susan. The defendant was proceeding with the Susan, under his personal direction and management, through Long Island Sound, to New Haven. One of the plaintiffs was navigating the Mary, in the opposite direction, to New York. When the two sloops were distant from each other about 30 rods, the defendant commanded the person at the helm of the Susan to luff; "in obedience to which, the helmsman suddenly luffed, and turned said sloop Susan to windward, and in pursuance of the direction thus given, she directly struck the larboard quarter of the Mary, with great violence."

he approached the plaintiff, with his back towards him, in raising his stick over his shoulder, in order to strike the dogs, he accidentally hit the plaintiff in the eye, inflicting upon him a severe injury. * * * The judge declined to give certain instructions requested by the defendant but left the case to the jury under the following instructions:

"If the defendant, in beating the dogs, was doing a necessary act, or one which it was his duty under the circumstances of the case to do, and was doing it in a proper way; then he was not responsible in this action, provided he was using ordinary care at the time of the blow. If it was not a necessary act; if he was not in duty bound to attempt to part the dogs, but might with propriety interfere or not as he chose; the defendant was responsible for the consequences of the blow, unless it appeared that he was in the exercise of extraordinary care, so that the accident was inevitable, using the word inevitable not in a strict but a popular sense.

"If, however, the plaintiff, when he met with the injury, was not in the exercise of ordinary care, he cannot recover, and this rule applies, whether the interference of the defendant in the fight of the dogs was necessary or not. If the jury believe, that it was the duty of the defendant to interfere, then the burden of proving negligence on the part of the defendant, and ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, is on the plaintiff. If the jury believe, that the act of interference in the fight was unnecessary, then the burden of proving extraordinary care on the part of the defendant, or want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, is on the defendant."

The jury under these instructions returned a verdict for the plaintiff; whereupon the defendant alleged exceptions.

SHAW, C. J. * * * The facts set forth in the bill of exceptions preclude the supposition, that the blow, inflicted by the hand of the defendant upon the person of the plaintiff, was intentional. The whole case proceeds on the assumption, that the damage sustained by the plaintiff, from the stick held by the defendant, was inadvertent and unintentional; and the case involves the question how far, and under what qualifications, the party by whose unconscious act the damage was done is responsible for it. We use the term "unintentional" rather than involuntary, because in some of the cases, it is stated, that the act of holding and using a weapon or instrument, the movement of which is the immediate cause of hurt to another, is a voluntary act, although its particular effect in hitting and hurting another is not within the purpose or intention of the party doing the act.

It appears to us, that some of the confusion in the cases on this subject has grown out of the long-vexed question, under the rule of the common law, whether a party's remedy, where he has one, should be sought in an action of the case, or of trespass. This is very distinguishable from the question, whether in a given case, any action will lie. The result of these cases is, that if the damage complained of is the immediate effect of the act of the defendant, trespass vi et armis lies; if consequential only, and not immediate, case is the proper remedy. Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593; Hugget v. Montgomery, 2 N. R. 446, Day's Ed. and notes.

In these discussions, it is frequently stated by judges, that when one receives injury from the direct act of another, trespass will lie. But we think this is said in reference to the question, whether trespass and not case will lie, assuming that the facts are such, that some action will lie. These dicta are no authority, we think, for holding, that damage received by a direct act of force from another will be sufficient to maintain an action of trespass, whether the act was lawful or unlawful, and neither wilful, intentional, or careless. * * *

We think, as a result of all the authorities, the rule is correctly stated by Mr. Greenleaf, that the plaintiff must come prepared with evidence to show either that the intention was unlawful, or that the defendant was in fault; for if the injury was unavoidable, and the conduct of the defendant was free from blame, he will not be liable. 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 85 to 92; Wakeman v. Robinson, 1 Bing. 213. If, in the prosecution of a lawful act, a casualty purely accidental arises, no action can be supported for an injury arising therefrom. Davis v. Saunders, 2 Chit. R. 639; Com. Dig. Battery, A. (Day's Ed.) and notes; Vincent v. Stinehour, 7 Vt. 69, 29 Am. Dec. 145.

In applying these rules to the present case, we can perceive no reason why the instructions asked for by the defendant ought not to have been given; to this effect, that if both plaintiff and defendant at the time of the blow were using ordinary care, or if at the time the defendant was using ordinary care, and the plaintiff was not, or if at that time both plaintiff and defendant were not using ordinary care, then the plaintiff could not recover.

In using this term, ordinary care, it may be proper to state, that what constitutes ordinary care will vary with the circumstances of the cases. In general, it means that kind and degree of care, which prudent and cautious men would use, such as is required by the exigency of the case, and such as is necessary to guard against probable danger. A man, who should have occasion to discharge a gun, on an open and extensive marsh, or in a forest, would be required to use less circumspection and care, than if he were to do the same thing in an inhabited town, village, or city. To make an accident, or casualty, or as the law sometimes states it, inevitable accident, it must be such an accident as the defendant could not have avoided by the use of the kind and degree of care necessary to the exigency, and in the circumstances in which he was placed.

We are not aware of any circumstances in this case, requiring a distinction between acts which it was lawful and proper to do, and acts of legal duty. There are cases, undoubtedly, in which officers are bound to act under process, for the legality of which they are not responsible, and perhaps some others in which this distinction would be important. We can have no doubt that the act of the defendant in attempting to part the fighting dogs, one of which was his own, and for the injurious acts of which he might be responsible, was a lawful and proper act, which he might do by proper and safe means. If, then, in doing this act, using due care and all proper precautions necessary to the exigency of the case, to avoid hurt to others, in raising his stick for that purpose, he accidentally hit the plaintiff in his eye and wounded him, this was the result of pure accident, or was involuntary and unavoidable, and therefore the action would not lie. * * *

The court instructed the jury, that if it was not a necessary act, and the defendant was not in duty bound to part the dogs, but might with propriety interfere or not as he chose, the defendant was responsible for the consequences of the blow, unless it appeared that he was in the exercise of extraordinary care, so that the accident was inevitable, using the word not in a strict but a popular sense. This is to be taken in connection with the charge afterwards given, that if the jury believed, that the act of interference in the fight was unnecessary (that is, as before explained, not a duty incumbent on the defendant), then the burden of proving extraordinary care on the part of the defendant, or want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, was on the defendant.

The court are of opinion that these directions were not conformable to law. If the act of hitting the plaintiff was unintentional, on the part of the defendant, and done in the doing of a lawful act, then the defendant was not liable, unless it was done in the want of exercise of due care, adapted to the exigency of the case, and therefore such want of due care became part of the plaintiff's case, and the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to establish it. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 85; Powers v. Russell, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 69, 76; Tourtellot v. Rosebrook, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 460.

Perhaps the learned judge, by the use of the term "extraordinary care," in the above charge, explained as it is by the context, may have intended nothing more than that increased degree of care and diligence, which the exigency of particular circumstances might require, and which men of ordinary care and prudence would use under like circumstances, to guard against danger. If such was the meaning of this part of the charge, then it does not differ from our views, as above explained. But we are of opinion, that the other part of the charge, that the burden of proof was on the defendant, was incorrect. Those facts which are essential to enable the plaintiff to recover, he takes the burden of proving. The evidence may be offered by the plaintiff or by the defendant; the question of due care, or want of care, may be essentially connected with the main facts, and arise from the same proof; but the effect of the rule, as to the burden of proof, is this, that when the proof is all in, and before the jury, from whatever side it comes, and whether directly proved or inferred from circumstances, if it appears that the defendant was doing a lawful act, and unintentionally hit and hurt the plaintiff, then unless it also appears to the satisfaction of the jury, that the defendant is chargeable with some fault, negligence, carelessness, or want of prudence, the plaintiff fails to sustain the burden of proof and is not entitled to recover.[3]

New trial ordered.

[3] The statement of facts is abbreviated and part of the opinion is omitted.

"If the accident had happened while chastising the dog, would the injured person be precluded from recovery because the act out of which the injury arose was a lawful one? If he could recover, the test of whether beating a dog in the street is a lawful act or not is not the correct test. If he could not, the maxim of law, 'Sic uti tuo ut alienum non lædas,' is reversed or limited, with some reference, perhaps, to real rights alone. The quiet citizen must keep out of the way of the exuberantly active one. The duty is to avoid being injured, not to avoid injuring. Test the matter by pleading. A trespass is only actionable when it results from other than a lawful act; consequently, a declaration setting out the facts would often be insufficient as being consistent with a lawful as well as an unlawful act; for illegality is never to be presumed." 1 Beven on Negligence (3d Ed.) 565.

Accord: Stanley v. Powell [1891] 1 Q. B. 86: The defendant and several others were pheasant shooting in a party, some being inside and some outside of a wood which the beaters were beating. The right of shooting was in one Greenwood, who was of the party. The plaintiff was employed by Greenwood to carry cartridges and the game which might be shot. Several beaters were driving the game along a plantation of saplings toward an open drive. The plaintiff stood just outside a gate which led into a field outside the plantation, at the end of the drive. The defendant was walking along in that field a few yards from the hedge which bounded the plantation. As he was walking along a pheasant rose inside the plantation; the defendant fired one barrel at this bird, and struck it with his first shot. The bird, when struck by the first shot, began to lower and turn back toward the beaters, whereupon the defendant fired his second barrel and killed the bird, but a shot, glancing from the bough of an oak which was in or close to the hedge and striking the plaintiff in the eye, caused the injury complained of. The oak was partly between the defendant and the bird when the second barrel was fired, but it was not in a line with the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, so much out of that line, that the shot must have been diverted to a considerable extent from the direction in which the gun must have been pointed in order to hit the plaintiff. The distance between the plaintiff and the defendant, in a direct line, when the second barrel was fired was about thirty yards. The plaintiff sued to recover his damages arising from the loss of his eye. The jury found that the plaintiff's hurt had been caused by a shot from the defendant's gun but that the shot had been fired by the defendant without any negligence. It was contended for the plaintiff that there could be a recovery on the ground of trespass, on the doctrine that even in the absence of negligence, an action of trespass might lie. Held that "if the case is regarded as an action on the case for an injury by negligence the plaintiff has failed to establish that which is the very gist of such an action, if on the other hand it is turned into an action for trespass, and the defendant is (as he must be) supposed to have pleaded a plea denying negligence and establishing that the injury was accidental in the sense above explained, the verdict of the jury is equally fatal to the action." Judgment was accordingly given for the defendant.

Compare Osborne v. Van Dyke (1901) 113 Iowa, 557, 85 N. W. 784, 54 L. R. A. 367: P. was holding a horse while D. applied medicine to its neck. The horse jumped, and D. began beating it with a heavy stick, with a nail in the end. While he was thus engaged, D.'s foot slipped, and in consequence he unintentionally hit P. in the face, breaking the bones of his nose. The trial judge charged the jury that D. would not be liable if in beating the horse he exercised reasonable care to avoid striking P., and the blow which inflicted P.'s injury was caused by an accidental slip, for which D. was not to blame; and that this was the law even if D. in beating the horse was guilty of an unlawful act. Held, erroneous.

BRADLEY v. LAKE SHORE & M. S. RY. CO.

Action of trespass by Bradley against the railway company for a personal injury. From a judgment for the defendant, on a directed verdict, the plaintiff appeals.

POTTER, J. The facts in this case are substantially as follows: On the evening of August 11, 1909, the plaintiff went to the passenger station of the defendant company, at Polk, Pa., at about 7 o'clock. He concluded to go to Franklin upon a train leaving about 9 o'clock, and with that purpose in view remained at or near the station. Shortly after 8 o'clock, while the plaintiff was seated upon a baggage truck, which stood upon the station platform, a freight train passed rapidly upon the second track from the platform. While the train was passing, an iron brake bar, which formed part of the brake equipment, broke, or became loosened at one end, fell down, and was dragged for some distance, and then broke away entirely, and was hurled violently from the train, striking the station platform, and, rebounding therefrom, struck and crushed plaintiff's hand, which rested upon the truck at his side. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the resulting injury. At the trial a verdict for the defendant was directed upon the ground that the evidence did not warrant a finding by the jury of negligence upon the part of the defendant company. Afterwards, in an opinion refusing a new trial, the learned judge of the court below considered the legal questions raised most elaborately, and concluded that, under the evidence, the plaintiff could not, at the time and place of the accident, be properly regarded as having assumed the relation of passenger to the defendant company, and further that the defendant company had in no way failed in the discharge of any duty which it owed to the plaintiff, and that there was no proof of negligence, on the part of the defendant, which caused the accident, and no basis upon which to found an inference of it. It seems that the brake bar which inflicted the injury was of considerable size and weight, being from two to three feet in length, and, when in its proper position, its place was under the trucks of the car, about on a level with the axle, and at right angles thereto. At either end of the bar were inserted fulcrum pins fastening it to brake levers, and through these pins ran cotter pins to hold them in place. If the cotter pins came out, through jolting or vibration, the fulcrum pins in turn might be misplaced, thus permitting the larger connecting bar to fall to the ground, which is just what seems to have happened in this case.

The facts bring the case within the principle of the decision in Bauman v. Manufacturing Co., 234 Pa. 416, 83 Atl. 293, where injury was caused by the loss of a cotter pin. This, without more, was held insufficient proof of negligence on the part of defendant. To the same effect were the decisions in Bradbury v. Kingston Coal Co., 157 Pa. 231, 27 Atl. 400, and East End Oil Co. v. Torpedo Co., 190 Pa. 350, 42 Atl. 707. In the present case it was shown that the cars on the train in question were inspected on the afternoon of the accident, and prior thereto, and were found to be in order with the exception that a brake bar was missing on one car, but that was not regarded as affecting in any way the safe operation of the train. The evidence shows that the matter may very properly be regarded as an accident pure and simple, and as such it falls within the rule that one engaged in a lawful act is not responsible for damage arising from a pure accident in the doing of it. It was not shown that the inspection made shortly before the accident was faulty or ineffective in any way, or that it was made by incompetent persons. As the trial judge says, it may be assumed that the accident was due to the cotter pin coming out of place, and that it would not have occurred had the pin been kept in place. Yet, as he points out, this affords no basis for inferring any lack of ordinary care upon the part of the defendant. The bolts and pins may have been in place when inspected, and yet have been jarred out of place or broken shortly afterward. There is no evidence upon this point, and nothing tending to show that the dropping of the brake bar was due to faulty inspection or any want of repair by the defendant company. That the bar should have fallen down, broken off, and been hurled from the train just at the spot where the plaintiff was sitting was of course a result which the defendant could not have foreseen. As the trial judge suggests, even if there had been any competent proof (and there was none) that the brake rod had become loosened, and, through oversight on the part of the employés, it was permitted to remain on the car, "only an extreme visionary would have imagined the consequences which followed, or that injury could result to person or property therefrom." We agree with the court below in the final conclusion that nothing in the evidence justified an inference that the defendant company failed in the discharge of any duty owed by it to the plaintiff.*

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

* Compare Kirk v. West Virginia Colliery Co. (1914) 215 Fed. 77: The coal from D.'s mine was run by D. down an incline from the pit's mouth to a tipple above a side track, and thence into cars. The center of the side track was 18

THE MERCHANT PRINCE.

(Court of Appeal, [1892] P. 179.)

Appeal by plaintiffs, the owners of the Catalonia, from a decision of the President, dismissing, with costs, their action of damage by collision against the defendants, the owners of the Merchant Prince, on the ground that the collision was the result of inevitable accident. In substance the plaintiff's case was as follows: The Catalonia, a screw steamer, was lying at anchor in the Mersey, when the Merchant Prince, a screw steamer, coming down the river in broad day light struck the Catalonia a heavy blow on the port quarter, doing very considerable damage. The defendants pleaded that the collision and damage were caused by inevitable accident, and the evidence shewed that at the time the Merchant Prince was proceeding down the Mersey, there was a moderate gale blowing from the westward, and, it being slack water, the Catalonia was lying wind-rode partly athwart the river. She was observed to be about half a point on the port bow at about a mile distant. Owing to the force of the wind the Merchant Prince griped a little as she approached the Catalonia, so that her head came over somewhat to port. The pilot thereupon gave the order "port," and then "hard a port," but the third officer, who was steering, on trying to get the wheel over to port, found that the steering gear would not act, and on calling out that the wheel was jammed, the engines were put astern, but the vessels were too close for the collision to be avoided. * * *

FRY, L. J. * * * It is a case in which a ship in motion has run into a ship at anchor. The law appertaining to that class of case appears to be clear. In the case of The Annot Lyle, 11 P. D. 114, it was laid down by Lord Herschell that in such a case the cause of the collision might be an inevitable accident, but unless the defendants proved this they are liable for damages. The burden rests on the defendants to shew inevitable accident. To sustain that the defendants must do one or other of two things. They must either shew what was the cause of the accident, and shew that the result of that cause was inevitable; or they must shew all the possible causes, one or other of which produced the effect, and must further shew with regard to every one of these possible causes that the result could not have been avoided. Unless they do one or other of these two things, it does not appear to me that they have shewn inevitable accident.

feet distant from the center of the main track. P., walking down the main track to take a train, asked D.'s foreman whether it was safe to pass the tipple. He said, "There is no danger, go on." P. accordingly started by, walking on the outer edge of the main track, when a lump of coal coming through the tipple bounded over from the car then being loaded by D. and struck P. The court was of opinion that "the case resolves itself into one of pure accident for which the coal company could not, upon any principle of law, be held liable."

In the present case the defendants have not shewn what was the cause. They have left that entirely undecided. In fact, their evidence has been largely given to shew that the event never did happen; but, unfortunately for them, it did happen. * * *[4]

Lopes, L. J. In this case the moving vessel runs into and comes into collision with a vessel at anchor. As I understand it, the law is perfectly clear that in the circumstances such as I have described the defendants are bound to shew that what happened was inevitable. In this case it is beyond dispute that the defendants are unable to tell what the cause of the accident was, or how or why it happened. It occurs to me that that being so, it cannot be said that they have discharged the burden fastened upon them by shewing that what happened was inevitable. Can they say that they could not avoid a thing when they did not know what the thing to be avoided was? I think not. In this case the steerage gear absolutely failed. How is that to be accounted for? It appears to me it can only be accounted for in two ways. It must have arisen from a defect in the machinery, or from bad management of the machinery. The defendants have not satisfied me that what happened did not proceed from the kinking of the chain. I rather think it did proceed from that cause. If that is so, how does the matter stand with regard to the defendants? They knew they had a new chain, and they ought to have known a new chain was liable to stretch. They ought to have known that a chain that stretched was liable to kink. Knowing these matters, they ought to have provided against that which happened by being prepared to use one or other of the modes of steerage with which they were supplied. In these circumstances, I am unable to see that what happened was inevitable; I am unable to agree with the learned judge below, and I think the appeal ought to be allowed and judgment given in favour of the plaintiffs.

Appeal allowed, judgment reversed and entered for the plaintiffs.

(b) Mistake

If I drive over a man in the dark because I do not know that he is in the road, I injure him accidentally; but if I procure his arrest, because I mistake him for some one who is liable to arrest, I injure him not accidentally but by mistake. In the former case I did not intend the harm at all, while in the latter case I fully intended it, but falsely believed in the existence of a circumstance which would have served to justify it. So if by insufficient care I allow my cattle to escape into my neighbor's field, their presence there is due to accident, but if I put them there because I wrongly believe that the field is mine, their presence is due to mistake. In neither case did I intend to wrong my neighbor, but in the one case my intention failed as to the consequence, and in the other as to the circumstance.

Trespass for breaking his close called the balk and the hade, and cutting his grass, and carrying it away. The defendant disclaims any title in the lands of the plaintiff, but says that he hath a balk and hade adjoining to the balk and hade of the plaintiff, and in mowing his own land he involuntarily and by mistake mowed down some grass growing upon the balk and hade of the plaintiff, intending only to mow the grass upon his own balk and hade, and carried the grass, etc., quæ est eadem, etc. Et quod ante emanationem brevis he tendered to the plaintiff 2s. in satisfaction, and that 2s. was a sufficient amends. Upon this the plaintiff demurred, and had judgment; for it appears the fact was voluntary, and his intention and knowledge are not traversable; they cannot be known.[5]

[5] See Holmes, Common Law (1881) 99 et seq.: Whittier's "Mistake in the Law of Torts" (1902) 15 Harv. Law Rev. 335–352: Salmond, Law of Torts (1910) 15: "The plea of inevitable accident is that the consequences complained of as a wrong were not intended by the defendant and could not have been foreseen and avoided by the exercise of reasonable care. The plea of inevitable mistake, on the other hand, is that although the act and its consequences were intended, the defendant acted under an erroneous belief, formed on reasonable grounds, that some circumstance existed which justified him. Such a mistaken belief in justification, however reasonable, is not itself a justification. This is probably the most important of all the exceptions recognized by law to the requirement of mens rea as a ground of civil liability."

"A word may be said as to the historical origin of this failure of English law to recognise inevitable mistake as a ground of exemption from civil liability. Ancient modes of procedure and proof were not adapted for inquiries into mental conditions. By the practical difficulties of proof early law was driven to attach exclusive importance to overt acts. The subjective elements of wrongdoing were largely beyond proof or knowledge, and were therefore disregarded as far as possible. It was a rule of our law that intent and knowledge were not matters that could be proved or put in issue. 'It is common learning,' said one of the judges of King Edward IV., 'that the intent of a man will not be tried, for the devil himself knoweth not the intent of a man.' Y. B. 17 Edw. IV. The sole question which the courts would entertain was whether the defendant did the act complained of. Whether he did it ignorantly or with guilty knowledge was entirely immaterial. This rule, however, was restricted to civil liability. It was early recognised that criminal responsibility was too serious a thing to be imposed upon an innocent man simply for the sake of avoiding a difficult inquiry into his knowledge and intention. In the case of civil liability, on the other hand, the rule was general. The success with which it has maintained itself in modern law is due in part to its undeniable utility in obviating inconvenient or even impracticable inquiries, and in part to the influence of the conception of redress in minimizing the importance of the formal condition of penal liability." STONEHOUSE v. ELLIOTT.

This action of trespass, assault and false imprisonment was tried before Lord Kenyon at the sittings at Westminister after last Hilary term, when these facts were given in evidence. The defendant, whose pocket had been picked at the play-house, suspected the plaintiff, and having laid hold of him gave him in charge to a constable who was present, and to whom she had before communicated her suspicions. The plaintiff was taken to the office in Bow Street, where the defendant still persisted in her charge against the plaintiff, but after some examination it appeared that the defendaant was mistaken in her suspicions of the plaintiff, and he was released. It was objected that the plaintiff had misconceived his action, that he should have brought an action on the case for making the malicious charge, and that trespass would not lie in such a case as the present. The cause however proceeded, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict subject to the opinion of this Court, whether the action in its present form could be maintained. Accordingly, Gibbs moved in the last term to set aside the verdict, and to enter a nonsuit.

Lord Kenyon, C. J. The doubt whether this was the proper form of action originated with me. I thought at the trial that as the constable's power to arrest flagrante delicto, for the purpose of putting the supposed offender into a course of justice, was allowed by the law, the person making the charge could only be liable in an action on the case for making such a charge maliciously. But I am now satisfied that trespass will lie in this case, this having been the constant course of proceeding.[6]

Per Curiam. Rule discharged.

HIGGINSON et al. v. YORK.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1809. 5 Mass. 341.)

Trespass for breaking and entering the close of the plaintiffs, called Burnt Coat island, and taking and carrying away three hundred cords of the plaintiffs' wood. Upon the general issue, pleaded and joined, the action was tried at the sittings after the last June term in this county, and a verdict found for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court upon the following facts contained in the judge's report.

[6] Compare Samuel v. Payne (1780) 1 Dougl. 359: Thinking, on reasonable grounds, that P. had stolen laces from him, D. caused an officer to take P. into custody. The officer acted without a warrant. It turned out that D. was mistaken. P. sued both D. and the officer in trespass for false imprisonment. Held, that D. was liable, but that the charge made by D. to the officer was a sufficient justification as to him.

In the year 1805, the defendant, being master of a vessel regularly employed in the coasting trade, was applied to by one Kenniston, who was then a trader in the town of Sedgwick, to take a cargo of wood from the said island to Boston. He accordingly went to this island with Kenniston, took on board his vessel thirty or forty cords of wood and carried the same to Boston, where it was sold and the proceeds thereof accounted for by the defendant to Kenniston.

It was also in evidence that one Phinney, without right or authority, had cut the wood in question, and sold it to Kenniston, previously to his agreement with the defendant to carry it to Boston. There was no evidence that the defendant had any knowledge of the trespass committed by Phinney, or that he was in any manner concerned, or aiding or assisting therein, other than by going to the island, and taking the wood upon freight as aforesaid. The title of the plaintiffs to the island was not questioned.

The cause was submitted without argument. The Court did not hesitate in giving their opinion in favor of the action, observing that the defendant was clearly a trespasser in going, without the license of the owner, upon the island of the plaintiffs; and supposing his taking the wood there to be a mistake as to the rights of Kenniston, and that under this mistake K. had been paid the full value of the wood taken by York, neither the mistake nor the accommodation, as being between joint trespassers, were any answer to the lawful owner, sustaining the injury to the soil, or the loss of his chattels. For when taken, the wood, being cut and separated from the soil, was the personal property of the plaintiffs.

The doubt in this case, which probably occasioned it to be reserved, was a mistaken apprehension that K. & Y. were to be constructively connected with Phinney in his original trespass in cutting the wood. But the causes of the action are entirely distinct. P. acquired no property in the wood by cutting it, as against the owners of the soil; K. could acquire none from him, and could transfer none to the present defendant; and these last broke the close of the plaintiffs in going upon their island, and were trespassers, and as such are chargeable in damages, at least to the value of the wood taken and carried away. Judgment according to the verdict.

HOBART v. HAGGET.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1835. 12 Me. 67, 28 Am. Dec. 159.)

In an action of trespass, in which the general issue had been pleaded and joined, the following facts appeared: The defendant had bought an ox of the plaintiff, and having paid plaintiff the agreed price was directed by him to go and take the ox. The defendant went to the plaintiff's enclosure and took out an ox which he supposed was the one he had purchased; but in fact it was not the ox which the plaintiff had intended to sell. The jury were instructed that if they were satisfied that there had been an innocent mistake between the parties, and that the defendant had supposed that he had purchased the ox in question when in fact the plaintiff supposed he was not selling that ox but another, then they should find for the plaintiff. Under these instructions there was a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant excepted.[7]

PARRIS, J. * * * The jury having found for the plaintiff have virtually found that he did not sell the ox in controversy, and the question is raised whether the defendant is liable in trespass for having taken it by mistake. It is contended that where the act complained of is involuntary and without fault, trespass will not lie, and sundry authorities have been referred to in support of that position. But the act complained of in this case was not involuntary. The taking of the plaintiff's ox was the deliberate and voluntary act of the defendant. He might not have intended to commit a trespass in so doing. Neither does the officer, when on a precept against A. he takes by mistake the property of B., intend to commit a trespass; nor does he intend to become a trespasser, who, believing that he is cutting timber on his own land, by mistaking the line of division cuts on his neighbor's land; and yet, in both cases, the law would hold them as trespassers. * * *[8]

The exceptions are overruled, and there must be judgment on the verdict.

✓ PAXTON v. BOYER.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1873. 67 Ill. 132, 16 Am. Rep. 615.)

Action of trespass by Boyer against Paxton for an assault and battery. The declaration was in the usual form. The defendant pleaded the general issue, with which was filed a stipulation that all matters might be given in evidence that could be specially pleaded. A trial was had, and the jury returned the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty, and assess the plaintiff's damages at $150. We, the jury, find from the evidence, that the blow complained of was struck by the defendant without malice, and under circumstances which would have led a reasonable man to believe it was necessary to his proper self-defense."

[7] This statement of the case is substituted for that by the reporter. A part of the opinion is omitted.

[8] Accord: Dexter v. Cole (1858) 6 Wis. 320, 70 Am. Dec. 465: D., a butcher, was driving sheep, which he had purchased, towards his slaughterhouse. As they were passing along a highway, they became mixed with 22 sheep belonging to P., which were running at large upon the highway. D. undertook to separate them and did throw out, as he thought, all of P.'s sheep. In fact, however, four of P.'s sheep remained in the flock, and were driven with it by D. to his slaughterhouse. P. sues in trespass.

BREESE, J. * * * The testimony shows the trespass was committed by the defendant against an unoffending party—against one who had given no cause or provocation of any kind. The defendant asked this instruction, which was refused:

"The defendant can not be found guilty, in an action of this kind, unless, in inflicting the injury complained of, he has been guilty of some wrong, evil intent or want of care; and if you find, from the evidence, he struck the blow without any fault, you will find for the defendant."

On coming in of the verdict, the defendant moved for judgment on the special verdict, which the court denied. This is the first point made by appellant. He insists judgment should have been rendered for the defendant upon the special verdict, as that ignores malice and unlawful intent, and finds that the act was done under circumstances which would have led a reasonable man to believe it was necessary to his proper self-defense. Appellant's theory is, that he mistook plaintiff for his brother, with whom he was in conflict, and who had felled him to the floor by violence.

The court, for the plaintiff, instructed the jury that it was no defense, so far as actual damages are concerned, that the defendant had been violently assaulted by persons other than the plaintiff, or was then being assaulted by such other persons, or that he may have honestly believed he was striking Peter Boyer when he struck the plaintiff, or that he may have honestly believed it was necessary for his self-defense to assault the plaintiff, if the jury find, from the evidence, that the plaintiff was not a party to such assault upon the defendant; such evidence of mistake of facts, or good intentions on the part of the defendant, can only be considered in this case by the jury as a defense against the infliction by the jury of vindictive damages, and not as a defense against such actual damages as the evidence may show the plaintiff has suffered from such assault, or as naturally resulted from such assault. These instructions involve the merits of this controversy.

Appellant relies, in support of his theory, upon Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75, and Brown v. Kendall, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 292. These cases are fully discussed, and sustain appellant. The facts in both cases are similar to those in this case, and were actions of assault and battery. The principle is announced in those cases, that a person is not liable for an unintentional injury resulting from a lawful act, where neither negligence nor folly is imputable to him who does the act, and that the burden of proving the negligence or folly, where the act is lawful, is upon the plaintiff.

This cause was tried on the general issue, with leave to give all matters in evidence which could be specially pleaded. That the plea of self-defense could have been pleaded is not questioned; in fact, the plaintiff in his second instruction, so put it to the jury, and they, by their special finding, have said the act was done in necessary self-defense, or under circumstances which would have led a reasonable man to believe it was necessary to his proper self-defense. This finding was not excepted to by the plaintiff, nor did he object that the jury should be instructed on that point. It, therefore, stands as the verdict of the jury, that there was no malice in the act, and that it was done in necessary self-defense. This brings the case within those relied on by appellant, supra.

Can it be a question that, for an act done under such circumstances, the party doing the act is liable either civiliter or criminaliter? The rule is well established that, in an action of assault and battery, the plaintiff must be prepared with evidence to show, either that the intention was unlawful, or that the defendant was in fault. 2 Greenleaf on Ev. § 85.

The jury, by their special finding, have ignored the unlawful intention, and have said the defendant was not in fault. On what principle, then, can he be made chargeable? If a person, doing a lawful act in a lawful manner, with all due care and circumspection, happens to kill another, without any intention of doing so, he is not liable criminally. How, then, can it be said he shall be responsible in a civil case, when, in doing a lawful act with due care, and an injury happens, he shall be deemed in fault, and mulcted in damages?

It is said by appellee the rule is different in civil cases; that the motive (quoting from Chitty), intent or design of the wrongdoer towards the plaintiff is not the criterion as to the form of the remedy, for when the act occasioning the injury is unlawful, the intent of the wrongdoer is immaterial; but appellant here is no wrongdoer, as the jury have said by the special verdict.

We do not deny the principle contended for by appellee, that, where a tort is done, intention is no element to be considered. The special verdict out of the way, we should not have much difficulty in coming to the conclusion appellee's counsel have reached, but, with that at the threshold of the case, we are unable to see the force of them.

The authority cited from 2 Greenleaf Ev. § 94, by appellee, keeping the special verdict all the time in view, is decisive of the question. It finds, substantially, appellant "free from fault," and therefore not responsible.

The special finding must override the general verdict, because both can not stand, there being such an irreconcilable antagonism, and this is the provision of section 51, supra. It may be answered to the argument of appellee, that he was assaulted while in the enjoyment of a legal right which he had not forfeited by any act of his; that the jury have found the act done by appellant was done in the exercise of his legal right, without any design to injure appellee.

We have thought much on this case, and are constrained to hold, on the authority of Morris v. Platt, and Brown v. Kendall, supra, and on principle, that judgment should have been pronounced for the defendant on the special verdict, for that justified him. This renders it unnecessary to consider any other question made on the record.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant on the special verdict.

Judgment reversed.

SEIGEL v. LONG.

Seigel sued Long for assault and battery. It appeared from the defendant's evidence that he had walked from his wagon down to an automobile in which the plaintiff was sitting, and had placed his hand on the plaintiff's forehead, and pushed his hat back, in order to see his face, remarking "Some scoundrel came along here yesterday and scared my horses and caused them to run away and break my rake, and I am looking for him." The plaintiff asked for a general affirmative charge for nominal damages. This was refused. There was a judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals.[9]

MAYFIELD, J. * * * It is true that defendant's testimony tended to show that defendant made a mistake as to the identity of the party whom he assaulted, and he told the plaintiff that, if he was not the person who frightened his team, he owed him an apology; but this did not prevent what he did from being an assault and battery It was an assault and battery, with or without mistaken identity. Carter v. State, 87 Ala. 113, 6 South. 356. It was likewise no defence that defendant offered to apologize after the assault, if he made a mistake as to the identity of the person assaulted.[10]

Reversed and remanded.

(c) NECESSITY

MOUSE'S CASE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1608. 12 Co. Rep. 63, 77 Reprint, 1341.)

In an action of trespass brought by Mouse, for a casket, and a hundred and thirteen pounds, taken and carried away, the case was, the ferryman of Gravesend, took forty-seven passengers into his barge, to pass to London, and Mouse was one of them, and the barge being upon the water, a great tempest happened, and a strong wind, so that the barge and all the passengers were in danger to be drowned, if a hogshead of wine and other ponderous things were not cast out, for the safeguard of the lives of the men: it was resolved per totam Curiam, that in case of necessity for the saving of the lives of the passengers, it was lawful to the defendant, being a passenger, to cast the casket of the plaintiff out of the barge, with the other things in it; for quod quis ob tutelam corporis sui fecerit, jure id fecisse videtur,[11] to which the defendant pleads all this special matter, and the plaintiff replies, de injuria sua propria absque tali causa: and the first day of this term, this issue was tried, and it was proved directly, that if the things had not been cast out of the barge, the passengers had been drowned; and that levandi causa they were ejected, some by one passenger, and some by another; and upon this the plaintiff was nonsuit.

It was also resolved, that although the ferryman surcharge the barge, yet for safety of the lives of the passengers in such a time and accident and necessity, it is lawful for any passenger to cast the things out of the barge: and the owners shall have their remedy upon the surcharge against the ferryman, for the fault was in him upon the surcharge; but if no surcharge was, but the danger accrued only by the act of God, as by tempest, no default being in the ferryman, everyone ought to bear his loss for the safeguard and life of a man: for interest reipublicæ quod homines conserventur, 8 Ed. 4. 23, etc. 12 H. 8. 15. 28 H. 8. [11] "There are, I conceive, two different and distinct principles upon which private property may be justly taken, used or destroyed for the benefit of others. Both of these are commonly comprehended and confounded in the phrase of 'taking or destroying private property for public benefit.' One of these principles is applied when the property of an individual is taken by the authority of the state for the common use or benefit of the public. * * * But there is also another ground upon which the property or rights of individuals may be justly sacrificed to the necessities of others, where neither the state, as a whole, nor the public, in the general sense of that term, have any interest in such a sacrifice. This may be seen in cases of imminent peril, where the right of self-defence, or the protection of life or of property, authorizes the sacrifice of other and less valuable property. The throwing overboard of goods in a storm, the pulling down of a house to prevent the spreading of a conflagration, are common examples of the exercise of this right. This is a natural right arising from inevitable and pressing necessity, when of two immediate evils, one must be chosen, and the less is voluntarily inflicted in order to avoid the greater. Under such circumstances, the general and natural law of all civilized nations, recognized and ratified by the express decisions of our own common law, authorizes the destruction of property by any citizen, without his being subject to any right of recovery against him by the owner. The agent in such destruction, whether in protection of his own rights or the rights of others which may be accidentally under his safeguard, acts from good motives and for a justifiable end: so that against him the sufferer has no rightful claim. But the loser may have an equitable right of compensation against those who have benefited by his loss in the preservation of their property." Verplanck, Senator, in Stone v. Mayor of New York (1840) 25 Wend. 157, 173.

[12] Compare: Surocco v. Geary (1853) 3 Cal. 70, 58 Am. Dec. 385: Action to recover damages for blowing up and destroying the plaintiff's house. Answer that the defendant had destroyed the house to stop the progress of a conflagration then raging. Said Murray, C. J., delivering the opinion: "The only question for our consideration is, whether the person who tears down or destroys the house of another, in good faith, and under apparent necessity, during the time of a conflagration, for the purpose of saving the buildings adjacent, and stopping its progress, can be held personally liable in an action by the owner of the property destroyed. * * * The right to destroy property, to prevent the spread of a conflagration, has been traced to the highest law of necessity, and the natural rights of man, independent of society or civil government. It is referred by moralists and jurists to the same great principle which justifies the exclusive appropriation of a plank in a shipwreck, though the life of another be sacrificed; with the throwing overboard of goods in a tempest, for the safety of a vessel; with the trespassing upon the lands of another, to escape death by an enemy. It rests upon the maxim, 'Necessitas inducit privilegium quoad jura privata.' The common law adopts the principles of the natural law, and places the justification of an act otherwise tortious precisely on the same ground of necessity. (See American Print Works v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. Law, 258, 264, and the cases there cited.) This principle has been familiarly recognized by the books from the time of the Saltpetre Case [12 Co. Rep. 13 (1607)], and the instances of tearing down a house to prevent a conflagration, or to raise bulwarks for the defence of a city, are made use of as illustrations, rather than as abstract cases, in which its exercise is permitted. At such times the individual rights of property give way to the higher laws of impending necessity."

The Queen v. Dudley and Stephens (1884) 14 Q. B. D. 273: Two seamen and a 17 year old boy, cast away in a storm on the high seas, were compelled to put into an open boat. After eighteen days in the boat, when they had been seven days without food and five days without water, and the boat was drifting more than 1000 miles from land, D. and S. decided that, as the boy was extremely weak and likely to die, they would kill him, in order that their lives might be saved. On the twentieth day D. with the assent of S. killed the boy. The two lived on his flesh for four days, when they were picked up by a passing vessel. At the time of D.'s act there was no sail in sight nor any reasonable prospect of relief; and there appeared to D. and S. to be every probability that unless they fed upon the boy all must die of starvation. When found, it appeared that if D. and S. had not fed upon the body of the boy, they would not have survived to be rescued. Lord Coleridge, C. J.:

"* * * It is said that it follows from the various definitions of murder in books of authority, which definitions imply, if they do not state, the doctrine, that in order to save your own life you may lawfully take away the life of another, when that other is neither attempting nor threatening yours, nor is guilty of any illegal act whatever towards you or any one else. But if these definitions be looked at they will not be found to sustain this contention. * * *

"The only real authority of former times is Lord Bacon, who, in his commentary on the maxim, 'necessitas inducit privilegium quoad jura privata,' lays down the law as follows: 'Necessity carrieth a privilege in itself. Necessity is of three sorts—necessity of conservation of life, necessity of obedience, and necessity of the act of God or of a stranger. First of the conservation of life; if a man steal viands to satisfy his present hunger, this is no felony or larceny. So if divers be in danger of drowning by the casting away of some boat or barge, and one of them get to some plank, or on the boat's side to keep himself above water, and another to save his life thrust him from it, whereby he is drowned, this is neither se defendendo nor by misadventure, but justifiable.' On this it is to be observed that Lord Bacon's proposition that stealing to satisfy hunger is no larceny is hardly supported by Staundforde, whom he cites for it, and is expressly contradicted by Lord Hale in the passage already cited. And for the proposition as to the plank or boat, it is said to be derived from the canonists. At any rate he cites no authority for it, and

HENN'S CASE.

(At a Justice's Seat for the Forest of Windsor, 1633. Coram the Earl of Holland, Lord Richardson, C. J., of K. B., and Baron Denham; Wm. Jones, 296, 82 Reprint, 157.)

The Judges agreed, that it hath been adjudged, that if a man do inclose, where he may by law, that he is bound to leave a good way, and also to keep it in continual repair at his own charge, and the countrey out not to be contributory thereto.

Mr. Attorney said, it was a Norfolke case, that in an action of trespass for debrusing his close, the defendant pleaded, that time out of mind, there was a common footpath, through that close, etc. The plaintiff replyed, that the defendant went into other places out of the

it must stand upon his own. Lord Bacon was great even as a lawyer; but it is permissible to much smaller men, relying upon the principle and on the authority of others, the equals and even the superior of Lord Bacon as lawyers, to question the soundness of his dictum. There are many conceivable states of things in which it might possibly be true, but if Lord Bacon meant to lay down the broad proposition that a man may save his life by killing, if necessary, an innocent and unoffending neighbour, it certainly is not law at the present day. * * *

"Now, except for the purpose of testing how far the conservation of a man's own life is in all cases and under all circumstances, an absolute, unqualified, and paramount duty, we exclude from our consideration all incidents of war. We are dealing with a case of private homicide, not one imposed upon men in the service of their Sovereign and in the defence of their country. Now it is admitted that the deliberate killing of this unoffending and unresisting boy was clearly murder, unless the killing can be justified by some well-recognised excuse admitted by the law. It is further admitted that there was in this case no such excuse, unless the killing was justified by what has been called 'necessity.' But the temptation to the act which existed here was not what the law had ever called a necessity. Nor is this to be regretted. Though law and morality are not the same, and many things may be immoral which are not necessarily illegal, yet the absolute divorce of law from morality would be of fatal consequence; and such divorce would follow if the temptation to murder in this case were to be held by the law an absolute defence of it. It is not so. To preserve one's life is generally speaking a duty, but it may be the plainest and highest duty to sacrifice it. * * * It is not needful to point out the awful danger of admitting the principle which has been contended for. Who is to be the judge of this sort of necessity? By what measure is the comparative value of lives to be measured? Is it to be strength, or intellect, or what? It is plain that the principle leaves to him who is to profit by it to determine the necessity which will justify him in deliberately taking another's life to save his own. * * *

"It is therefore our duty to declare that the prisoners' act in this case was wilful murder, that the facts as stated in the verdict are no legal justification of the homicide; and to say that in our unanimous opinion the prisoners are on this special verdict guilty of murder."

way (which was a kind of new assignment); the defendant rejoyned, that the footpath was adeo lutosa et funderosa, in default of the plaintiff, who ought to amend it, that he could not pass along that, and therefore he went as near the path as he could, in good and passable way, and this was resolved a good plea and justification; out of which Mr. Attorney inferred, that in case where a man incloseth, and doth not make a good way, it is lawful for passengers to make gaps in his hedges, to avoid the ill way, so that they do not ride further into his inclosed grounds then is needful for avoiding the bad way.[13]

[13] "Where a highway passes through open and uninclosed land, the public have a right to deviate onto the adjoining land (even though cultivated) when the usual track is foundrous and impassable; but it is uncertain whether this right exists as a matter of law independently of evidence of user, or not. It is, however, submitted that unless some evidence of the exercise of a prescriptive right to deviate can be adduced, the existence of such a right will not now be assumed as a matter of law. There is authority for saying that, if an owner of land adjoining a highway actively obstructs it, or being under obligation to repair it, fails to do so, the public may then deviate onto his adjoining land, even through his fences." Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 16, p. 50, citing and commenting on the English authorities.

For the American doctrine, see "Streets and Highways," 37 Cyc. 206, and cases cited in notes 90 and 91; Cent. Dig., "Highways," § 291; and Key No., Dec. Dig., "Highways," § 82.

Compare Campbell v. Race (1851) 7 Cush. (Mass.) 408, 54 Am. Dec. 728: D. was travelling with his team on a highway running east and west, which led to a highway running north and south. The latter led to another highway, on which the defendant had occasion to go and which could be reached, by highway, only by passing over the two highways first named. At the time of the alleged trespass, they were both impassable with snow-drifts. Because of this, D. turned out of the first highway, at a place where it was impassable, and passed over the adjoining fields of the plaintiff, doing no unnecessary damage, and turned into the second highway, as soon as he had passed the obstructions which rendered both impassable. And he contended, that the highways being thus rendered impassable, he had a way of necessity over the plaintiff's adjoining fields. The trial judge ruled, that these facts constituted no defense. But said Bigelow, J., giving the opinion of the reviewing court: "It is not controverted, by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the rule of law is well settled in England, that where a highway becomes obstructed and impassable from temporary causes, a traveller has a right to go extra viam upon adjoining lands, without being guilty of trespass. The rule is so laid down in the elementary books, and it is fully supported by the adjudged cases. Such being the admitted rule of law, as settled by English authorities, it was urged in behalf of the plaintiff, that it had never been recognised or sustained by American authors or cases. But we do not find such to be the fact. * * * The rule itself is founded on the established principles of the common law, and is in accordance with the fixed and uniform usage of the community. The plaintiff's counsel is under a misapprehension in supposing that the authorities in support of the rule rest upon any peculiar or exceptional principle of law. They are based upon the familiar and well settled doctrine, that to justify or excuse an alleged trespass, inevitable necessity or accident must be shown. If a traveller in a highway, by unexpected and unforeseen occurrences, such as a sudden flood, heavy drifts of snow, or the falling of a tree, is shut out from the travelled paths, so that he cannot reach his destination, without passing upon adjacent lands, he is certainly under a necessity to do so. It is essential to the act to be done, without which it cannot be accomplished. * * * To hold a party guilty of a wrongful invasion of another's rights, for passing over land adjacent to the highway, under the pressure of such a necessity, would be pushing individual rights of property to an unreasonable extent, and giving them a protection beyond that which finds a sanction in the rules of law. Such a temporary and unavoidable use of private property, must be regarded Trespass for breaking and entering two closes of the plaintiff. The defendant in two special pleas, claimed a private right of way, and alleged that this way had become impassable; that the defendant thereupon gave notice to the plaintiff to repair the same, which he refused to do; and that the defendant having occasion to use the said way, did of necessity turn out of it, and pass over the adjoining closes, keeping as near as he possibly could to the private way. The plaintiff demurred.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. * * * [14] The question intended to be agitated upon this record is, whether in the case of a private way the grantee may break out, and go extra viam, if it be impassable, as in the case of a public way. As to that, I consider Taylor v. Whitehead, Doug. 749, has settled the distinction, that the right of going on adjoining lands extends not to private as well as public ways. And there may be many reasons in the case of highways, why the public should have an outlet, because it is for the public good that a passage should be afforded to the subjects at all times. But the same necessity does not exist in the case of a private right. Whoever will look to Serjt. Williams's note to the case of Pomfret v. Rycroft, 1 Saund. 323, note 6, will find both the law upon the subject, and the manner of pleading a way of necessity, very accurately detailed. It is a thing founded in grant, and the granter of a private way does not grant a liberty to break out of it at random over the whole surface of his close. It is established law, that the grantee of a private way cannot break out of it, and I hope that we shall not be carried to Nisi Prius upon such an unlimited right as claimed by these pleas. It seems to me that both pleas are ill.[15] as one of those incidental burdens to which all property in a civilized community is subject. In fact, the rule is sometimes justified upon the ground of public convenience and necessity. Highways being established for public service, and for the use and benefit of the whole community, a due regard for the welfare of all requires, that when temporarily obstructed, the right of travel should not be interrupted."

[14] The statement of facts is abridged, and a part of the opinion is omitted.

[15] Compare Arnold v. Holbrook (1873) L. R. 8 Q. B. 96: P. was an occupier of an arable field across which was a public footpath, but the plaintiff had the right to plow up the footpath when ploughing the field. After a ploughing, the public way would become muddy, and those using it would walk out on either side of it, for a better way. To prevent this P. placed hurdles on the sides of the way. D. threw down three of these hurdles. P. sued for a trespass. The trial judge gave judgment in favor of the defendant, on the ground that it was the duty of the plaintiff, after he had ploughed up the path, to set out again a proper path for the use of the public, instead of leaving them to tread out a path the best way they could; and that the path so trodden out having become in a muddy and founderous state, the public were justified in deviating on the plaintiff's land to find a firmer and better path. Held, that this judgment must be reversed and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

PROCTOR v. ADAMS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1873. 113 Mass. 376, 18 Am. Rep. 500.)

Tort, in the nature of a trespass quare clausum, for entering the plaintiff's close and carrying away a boat. At the trial it appeared that the premises described in the declaration were a sandy beach on the sea side of Plum Island, and that the defendants went there, between high and low water mark, January 19, 1873, and against the objection and remonstrances of the plaintiff's tenant, carried away a boat worth $50, which they found lying there. The defendants offered evidence that upon the night of January 18, 1873, there was a severe storm; that the next morning they went upon the beach to see if any vessels or property had been cast ashore; that they found a boat lying upon the beach twenty-five feet below high water mark, which had apparently been driven ashore in the storm; that in order to save it, they endeavored to haul it upon the beach, and succeeded in putting it near the line of high water mark; that not thinking it secure, they, the next day, pushed it into the water, and carried it around into Plum Island River, on the inside of the Island; that they at once advertised it in the Ipswich and Newburyport papers; that they shortly afterwards delivered it to one Jackman, who claimed it as agent for the underwriters of the wrecked steamer Sir Francis, and who paid them twelve dollars for their services and expenses.

The court ruled that these facts, if proved, would not constitute a defence, and proposed to instruct the jury as follows:

"If the land upon which the boat was found and taken possession of by the defendants was in possession or occupation of the plaintiff, the defendants' entry upon it without permission of the plaintiff was an unlawful entry.

"If the defendants, having made an unlawful entry upon the plaintiff's land, there took and therefrom carried a boat, for any purpose affecting the boat as derelict or wrecked property, they are liable to the plaintiff for their unlawful entry upon the land in nominal damage, and also, the boat not being their property, but a wreck, in damages for the unlawful taking and carrying away of the boat, to the value of the boat."

The defendants requested the court to rule that, upon the case presented, the law would imply a license, but the court declined so to rule. The defendants then declined to go to the jury, and the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff for $51, and reported the case to this court.

GRAY, C. J. The boat, having been cast ashore by the sea, was a wreck, in the strictest legal sense. 3 Bl. Com. 106. Chase v. Corcoran, 106 Mass. 286, 288. Neither the finders of the boat, nor the owner of the beach, nor the Commonwealth, had any title to the boat as against its former owner. Body of Liberties, art. 90. Anc. Chart. 211. 2 Mass. Col. Rec. 143. St. 1814, c. 170. Rev. Sts. c. 57. Gen. Sts. c. 81. 3 Dane Ab. 134, 136, 138, 144. 2 Kent Com. 322, 359. But the owner of the land on which the boat was cast was under no duty to save it for him. Sutton v. Buck, 2 Taunt. 302, 312.

If the boat, being upon land between high and low water mark, owned or occupied by the plaintiff, was taken by the defendants, claiming it as their own, when it was not, the plaintiff had a sufficient right of possession to maintain an action against them. Barker v. Bates, 13 Pick. 255, 23 Am. Dec. 678. Dunwick v. Sterry, 1 B. & Ad. 831. But if, as the evidence offered by them tended to show, the boat was in danger of being carried off by the sea, and they, before the plaintiff had taken possession of it, removed it for the purpose of saving it and restoring it to its lawful owner, they were not trespassers. In such a case, though they had no permission from the plaintiff or any other person, they had an implied license by law to enter on the beach to save the property. It is a very ancient rule of common law, that an entry upon land to save goods which are in jeopardy of being lost or destroyed by water, fire, or any like danger, is not a trespass. 21 H. VII. 27, 28, pl. 5. Bro. Ab. Trespass, 213. Vin. Ab. Trespass (H. a. 4), pl. 24 ad fin.; (K. a.) pl. 3. In Dunwick v. Sterry, 1 B. & Ad. 831, a case very like this, Mr. Justice Parke (afterwards Baron Parke and Lord Wensleydale) left it to the jury to say whether the defendant took the property for the benefit of the owners, or under a claim of his own and to put the plaintiffs to proof of their title. In Barker v. Bates, 13 Pick. 255, 23 Am. Dec. 678, upon which the plaintiff mainly relies, the only right claimed by the defendants was as finders of the property and for their own benefit.

The defendants are therefore entitled to a new trial. As the answer was not objected to, and the declaration may be amended in the court below, we have not considered the form of the pleadings.

New trial ordered.

NEWKIRK v. SABLER.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1850. 9 Barb. 652.)

This was an action for an assault and battery. It appeared that the plaintiff had sent his servant, with a team and wagon, across the farm of the defendant, upon which he entered by taking down the bars, after the defendant had forbidden the plaintiff's crossing his lands. On the return of the team to the place where it had entered, the bars were found fastened by boards nailed over them. The servant, after an ineffectual attempt to get through, left the team and wagon on the defendant's land, and went and informed the plaintiff, who came and commenced tearing down the fence for the purpose of taking away his property. The defendant forbade the plaintiff's taking down the fence, but the latter persisting in his attempt, the defendant struck the plaintiff, or struck at him, with a stick. A fight ensued between the parties, in which the plaintiff received the injuries complained of; and both parties were more or less injured. The result was, that the plaintiff got the fence down, and brought away his team.

The judge charged the jury, among other things, that although the team and wagon of the plaintiff were wrongfully on the land of the defendant, it was the duty and right of the plaintiff to get them off, with the least possible injury to the premises; and that the defendant was not justified in using personal violence to prevent him from removing his team from the premises. That the real question for them to determine was, whether the plaintiff was, at the time of the assault, engaged in wanton and unnecessary destruction of the defendant's fences; or whether he was endeavoring in the most direct way, to remove his team from the premises; that if the jury should be satisfied from the evidence, that the force employed by the defendant was exerted for the purpose of preventing the plaintiff from removing his team from the premises, and not to preserve his fence from unnecessary injury, then they ought to find for the plaintiff. But on the contrary, if they should find that the injury the plaintiff was doing to the fence was unnecessary, and that the defendant committed the acts complained of for the purpose of preventing such unnecessary injury to the fence, then the verdict should be for the defendant. The counsel for the defendant excepted to so much of the charge, as charged that it was the duty of the plaintiff, and that he had a right, though his horses and wagons were upon the lands of the defendant, to remove them therefrom; and that the plaintiff was justifiable in breaking down the fence to remove them, if it was necessary to do so for that purpose; and that the defendant would not be justifiable in committing a battery to prevent him from so doing; and to so much of the charge as submitted to the jury the question which in the opinion of the judge, was the real question for them to try.

The jury found a verdict for $50 in favor of the plaintiff. From the judgment entered on this verdict the defendant appealed.

PARKER, J. I think that the learned justice erred in holding that the plaintiff had a right to enter upon the lands of the defendant for the purpose of regaining possession of his property.

The right to land is exclusive; and every entry thereon, without the owner's leave, or the licence or authority of law, is a trespass. (3 Bl. Com. 209. Percival v. Hickey, 18 John. 285, 9 Am. Dec. 210.) There is a variety of cases where an authority to enter is given by law; as to execute legal process; to distrain for rent; to a landlord or reversioner, to see that his tenant does no waste, and keeps the premises in repair according to his covenant or promise; to a creditor, to demand money payable there; or to a person entering an inn for the purpose of getting refreshment there. (3 Bl. Com. 212.

1 Cowen's Tr. 411.) In some cases, a license will be implied; as if a man make a lease, reserving the trees, he has a right to enter and show them to a purchaser. * * *

In some cases entry will be excused by necessity. As if a public highway is impassable, a traveler may go over the adjoining land. (Absor v. French, 2 Show. 28. Asser v. Finch, 2 Lev. 234. Young v. ———, 1 Ld. Raym. 725.) But this would not extend to a private way; for it is the owner's fault if he do not keep it in repair. (Taylor v. Whitehead, Doug. 747. Promfret v. Ricroft, 1 Saund. 321.) So if a man who is assaulted, and in danger of his life, run through the close of another, trespass will not lie, because it is necessary for the preservation of his life. (Year-Book, 37 H. 6, 37, pl. 26.) If my tree be blown down and fall on the land of my neighbor, I may go on and take it away. (Bro. Tres. pl. 213.) And the same rule prevails where fruit falls on the land of another. (Miller v. Fawdry, Latch, 120.) But if the owner of a tree cut the loppings so that they fall on another's land, he can not be excused for entering to take them away on the ground of necessity, because he might have prevented it. (Bac. Abr. Trespass F.)

Some times the right of action depends on the question which is the first wrongdoer. If J. S. have driven the beast of J. N. into the close of J. S., or if it have been driven therein by a stranger, with the consent of J. S., and J. N. go therein and take it away, trespass will not lie, because J. S. was himself the first wrongdoer. (3 Roll. Abr. 566, pl. 9. Chapman v. Thumbethorp, Cro. Eliz. 329). Tested by that rule, the plaintiff in this suit certainly has no right of action; for he was the first wrongdoer. But it is well settled that where there is neither an express nor an implied license, nor any such legal excuse as is above stated, a man has no right to enter upon the land of another for the purpose of taking away a chattel being there, which belongs to the former. The mere fact that the plaintiff owns the chattel, gives him no authority to go upon the land of another to get it. In Heermance v. Vernoy, 6 John. 5, where A. had entered upon the land of B. without his permission to take a chattel belonging to A.; it was held to be a trespass. So in Blake v. Jerome, 14 John. 406, a mare and a colt were taken out of the plaintiff's field, by a person who acted under the orders and direction of the defendant, after they had been demanded by the defendant and refused to be delivered to him; and after he had been expressly forbidden to take them, and the defendant was held to be guilty of a trespass.

In this case, the plaintiff's horses and wagon were on lands of the defendant, where they had been left by the servant of the plaintiff. They were not there by the defendant's permission. On the contrary the plaintiff had been guilty of a trespass in sending his team across the lands of the defendant, after he had been forbidden to do so. And I think the defendant had the right to detain them before they left the premises, and to distrain them damage feasant. 2 Rev. St. pt. 3, c. 8, p. 427. But it is not necessary to decide, whether the defendant detained the property rightfully or wrongfully.

The plaintiff attempted to enter upon the lands of the defendant and against his will, for the purpose of taking away his property. This he had no right to do, even though his property were unlawfully detained there. If the plaintiff could not regain the possession of his property peaceably, he should have resorted to his legal remedy, by which he could, after demand and refusal, have recovered either the property itself or its value. He had no right to redress himself by force. (1 Bl. Com. 4.) In pursuing his object, the plaintiff tore down the defendant's fence after he had been forbidden to enter, and after he had been ordered by the defendant to desist. The defendant had a right to protect himself in the enjoyment of his possession and his property, by defending them against such aggression. Weaver v. Bush, 8 T. R. 78, Gregory v. Hill, Id., 299; Greene v. Jones, 1 Saund. 296, note 1. Green v. Goddard, 1 Salk. 641. Turner v. Meymott, 1 Bing. 158. 3 Bl. Com. 5.

The defendant can not be held liable for the injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff, on the occasion in question, unless he used more force than was necessary for the defense of his possession; and it seems that he did not use enough to prevent the plaintiff's effecting his forcible entry and taking away the property. But that was a question proper to be submitted to the jury.

The judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and a new trial awarded; costs to abide the event.[16]

KIRK, Executor, v. GREGORY et ux.

(Exchequer Division, 1876. 1 Ex. Div. 55.)

The second count alleged a trespass by the female defendant in taking away certain jewelry claimed by the plaintiff as executor. Under a plea of not guilty the following facts were proved: The plaintiff's testator died in his own house, while in a state of delirium tremens. His attendants and others were feasting and drinking in the house. The female defendant, who was the wife of the testator's brother, immediately after the death, took out of an unlocked drawer in the room where the testator died some jewelry belonging to the testator, and (as she said) placed it with a watch of the testator's in a box, and put the box in a cupboard in another room for safety. The box and the cupboard were unlocked. The plaintiff on being informed found the watch, but the jewelry was missing and had never been found.

The judge left to the jury the question, whether the female defendant had put the things away bona fide for the purpose of preserving them. The jury answered in the affirmative, and the judge thereupon directed a verdict for the defendants, giving the plaintiff leave to move to enter the verdict for him for 1s. damages on the count of trespass; the defendants to have liberty to add any plea of justification which the facts would support.[17]

Anstie, for the defendants. To constitute a trespass, there must be a wrongful taking; here there was none such.

Cave, Q. C., for the plaintiff. Removing the goods from the drawer was an asportation, and it would be no answer to say that the things would otherwise have been lost, even if the defendants had saved them instead of losing them as they did. In Bac. Abr. Trespass, E. (7th Ed.) by Gwillim & Dodd, p. 671, it is said: "If J. S. take the goods of J. N. to prevent them from being stolen or spoiled, an action of trespass lies; because the loss to J. N. would not, if either of these things had happened, have been irremediable. But if the goods of J. N. are in danger of being destroyed by fire, and J. S., in order to prevent this, take them, this action does not lie; because the loss if this had happened would have been irremediable." For this Bro. Abr. Tresp. pl. 213, is cited. See, also, Isaac v. Clark, 2 Bulst. 306, 312, 1 Roll. Rep. 1216, 130, and Reg. v. Thurborn, 1 Den. Cr. C. 387.

Bramwell, B. * * * There has clearly been an asportation which the defendants have to justify. Mr. Anstie, on their behalf, had leave to add any plea he thought fit, provided it was a good plea. Suppose there was a plea to the effect that the owner of the goods was recently dead, the executor was unknown, no one was in charge of the house, that the defendants were near relations to the deceased who had visited him, and that the trespass in question was a necessary removal of the goods for their preservation and protection, and a reasonable step. I am inclined to think this would be a good plea. The law cannot be so unreasonable as to lay down that a person cannot interfere for the protection of such things as rings and jewelry in the house of a man just dead. But the whole of the supposed plea was not proved. The jury found that the defendant acted bona fide, that is to say, that the articles were removed for their preservation; but it was not proved that the interference was reasonably necessary, that is to say, that the things were in a position to require the interference, and that the interference was reasonably carried out. Mr. Anstie ingeniously argued that the responsibility of a person under circumstances of this kind is really a question of negligence and not of trespass. I do not think it is. But even if it were, it was not shewn that the goods were in jeopardy. The supposed plea has not been proved. As the point now raised by the plaintiff never went to the jury, the defendants would be entitled to a new trial; but as they do not ask for it, the verdict must be entered for the plaintiff for 1s. damages.[18]

PLOOF v. PUTNAM.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1908. 81 Vt. 471, 71 Atl. 188, 20 L. R. A. [N. S.] 152, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1072, 15 Ann. Cas. 1151.)

The case was heard on demurrer to the declaration. The declaration was held sufficient and the demurrer was overruled, to which the defendant excepted.

MUNSON, J. It is alleged as the ground of recovery that on the 13th day of November, 1904, the defendant was the owner of a certain island in Lake Champlain, and of a certain dock attached thereto, which island and dock were then in charge of the defendant's servant; that the plaintiff was then possessed of and sailing upon said lake a certain loaded sloop, on which were the plaintiff and his wife and two minor children; that there then arose a sudden and violent tempest, whereby the sloop and the property and persons therein were placed in great danger of destruction; that, to save these from destruction or injury, the plaintiff was compelled to, and did, moor the sloop to defendant's dock; that the defendant, by his servant, unmoored the sloop, whereupon it was driven upon the shore by the tempest, without the plaintiff's fault; and that the sloop and its contents were thereby destroyed, and the plaintiff and his wife and children cast into the lake and upon the shore, receiving injuries.

This claim is set forth in two counts—one in trespass, charging that the defendant by his servant with force and arms willfully and designedly unmoored the sloop; the other in case, alleging that it was the duty of the defendant by his servant to permit the plaintiff to moor his sloop to the dock, and to permit it to remain so moored during the continuance of the tempest, but that the defendant by his servant, in disregard of this duty, negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully unmoored the sloop. Both counts are demurred to generally.

There are many cases in the books which hold that necessity, and an inability to control movements inaugurated in the proper exercise of a strict right, will justify entries upon land and interferences with personal property that would otherwise have been trespasses. A reference to a few of these will be sufficient to illustrate the doctrine. In Miller v. Fandrye, Poph. 161, trespass was brought for chasing sheep, and the defendant pleaded that the sheep were trespassing upon his land, and that he with a little dog chased them out, and that, as soon as the sheep were off his land, he called in the dog. It was argued that, although the defendant might lawfully drive the sheep from his own ground with a dog, he had no right to pursue them into the next ground; but the court considered that the defendant might drive the sheep from his land with a dog, and that the nature of a dog is such that he cannot be withdrawn in an instant, and that, as the defendant had done his best to recall the dog, trespass would not lie. In trespass of cattle taken in A., defendant pleaded that he was seised of C. and found the cattle there damage feasant, and chased them towards the pound, and they escaped from him and went into A., and he presently retook them; and this was held a good plea. 21 Edw. IV, 64; Vin. Ab. Trespass, H. a, 4, pl. 19. If one have a way over the land of another for his beasts to pass, and the beasts, being properly driven, feed the grass by morsels in passing, or run out of the way and are promptly pursued and brought back, trespass will not lie. See Vin. Ab. Trespass, K. a, pl. 1. A traveler on a highway who finds it obstructed from a sudden and temporary cause may pass upon the adjoining land without becoming a trespasser because of the necessity. Henn's Case, W. Jones, 296; Campbell v. Race, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 408, 54 Am. Dec. 728; Hyde v. Jamaica, 27 Vt. 443 (459); Morey v. Fitzgerald, 56 Vt. 487, 48 Am. Rep. 811. An entry upon land to save goods which are in danger of being lost or destroyed by water or fire is not a trespass. 21 Hen. VII, 27; Vin. Ab. Trespass, H. a, 4, pl. 24, K. a, pl. 3. * * *

This doctrine of necessity applies with special force to the preservation of human life. One assaulted and in peril of his life may run through the close of another to escape from his assailant. 37 Hen. VII, pl. 26. One may sacrifice the personal property of another to save his life or the lives of his fellows. In Mouse's Case, 12 Co. 63, the defendant was sued for taking and carrying away the plaintiff's casket and its contents. It appeared that the ferryman of Gravesend took 47 passengers into his barge to pass to London, among whom were the plaintiff and defendant; and the barge being upon the water a great tempest happened, and a strong wind, so that the barge and all the passengers were in danger of being lost if certain ponderous things were not cast out, and the defendant thereupon cast out the plaintiff's casket. It was resolved that in case of necessity, to save the lives of the passengers, it was lawful for the defendant, being a passenger, to cast the plaintiff's casket out of the barge; that, if the ferryman surcharge the barge, the owner shall have his remedy upon the surcharge against the ferryman, but that if there be no surcharge, and the danger accrue only by the act of God, as by tempest, without fault of the ferryman, every one ought to bear his loss to safeguard the life of a man.

It is clear that an entry upon the land of another may be justified by necessity, and that the declaration before us discloses a necessity for mooring the sloop. But the defendant questions the sufficiency of the counts because they do not negative the existence of natural objects to which the plaintiff could have moored with equal safety. The allegations are, in substance, that the stress of a sudden and violent tempest compelled the plaintiff to moor to defendant's dock to save his sloop and the people in it. The averment of necessity is complete, for it covers not only the necessity of mooring, but the necessity of mooring to the dock; and the details of the situation which created this necessity, whatever the legal requirements regarding them, are matters of proof, and need not be alleged. It is certain that the rule suggested cannot be held applicable irrespective of circumstance, and the question must be left for adjudication upon proceedings had with reference to the evidence or the charge.

The defendant insists that the counts are defective, in that they fail to show that the servant in casting off the rope was acting within the scope of his employment. It is said that the allegation that the island and dock were in charge of the servant does not imply authority to do an unlawful act, and that the allegations as a whole fairly indicate that the servant unmoored the sloop for a wrongful purpose of his own, and not by virtue of any general authority or special instruction received from the defendant. But we think the counts are sufficient in this respect. The allegation is that the defendant did this by his servant. The words "willfully, and designedly" in one count, and "negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully" in the other, are not applied to the servant, but to the defendant acting through the servant. The necessary implication is that the servant was acting within the scope of his employment. 13 Ency. P. & Pr. 922; Voegeli v. Pickel Marble, etc., Co., 49 Mo. App. 643; Wabash Ry. Co. v. Savage, 110 Ind. 156, 9 N. E. 85. See, also, Palmer v. St. Albans, 60 Vt. 427, 13 Atl. 569, 6 Am. St. Rep. 125.

(C) Defense of the Person

The man who commits homicide by misadventure or in self-defence deserves but needs a pardon. Bracton cannot conceal this from us, and it is plain from multitudinous records of Henry III.'s reign. If the justices have before them a man who, as a verdict declares, has done a deed of this kind, they do not acquit him, nor can they pardon him, they bid him hope for the king's mercy. In a precedent book of Edward I.'s time a justice is supposed to address the following speech to one whose plea of self-defence has been endorsed by the verdict of a jury: "Thomas, these good folk testify upon their oath to all that you have said. Therefore by way of judgment we say that what you did was done in self-defence; but we cannot deliver you from your imprisonment without the special command of our lord the king: therefore we will report your condition to the king's court and will procure for you his special grace."

[22] On the general principle, see the remark of Pollock, C. B., in Ibbotson v. Peat (1865) 3 H. & C. 644, 649, 140 R. R. 655, 658: "The defendant, by his plea, says, 'You have done me some wrong and I have been trying to redress that wrong by doing some wrong to you.' As a general proposition it may be laid down, that cannot be done. If a person is attacked by force he may defend himself by force; but in general a person cannot, because a wrong has been done to him, commit some other wrong for the purpose of repairing the injury; but he must endeavor to obtain redress in a lawful manner. As my brother Bramwell suggests, if a person libels another the latter is not justified in horsewhipping him; and if a person horsewhips another the latter is not justified in libeling him. On these grounds it appears to me that the plea is bad, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment."

The standard form of the common-law plea of self-defence (the plea of son assault demesne), with its modifications under the Rules of Hilary Term of 1834, was as follows: "And for a further plea [i. e., after a general issue] in this behalf, the defendant says, that the plaintiff, just before the said time, when, etc., to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, with force and arms, made an assault upon him, the defendant, and would then have beaten and ill-treated him, the defendant, if he had not immediately defended himself against the plaintiff, wherefore the defendant did then defend himself against the plaintiff, as he lawfully might, for the cause aforesaid; and in so doing did necessarily and unavoidably a little beat, wound, and ill-treat the plaintiff: doing no unnecessary damage to the plaintiff on the occasion aforesaid. And so the defendant saith, that if any hurt or damage then happened to the plaintiff, the same was occasioned by the said assault so made by the plaintiff on him the defendant, and in the necessary defence of himself the defendant against the plaintiff; which are the supposed trespasses in the introductory part of this

(Court of King's Bench, 1729. 2 Strange, 953, 93 Reprint, 963.)

Trespass, assault and battery against Reynolds and Westwood. Reynolds pleaded son assault: and Westwood pleaded that he was a servant to Reynolds the other defendant, and that the plaintiff having assaulted his master in his presence, he in defence of his master struck the plaintiff. And on demurrer the plea was held ill, for the assault on the master might be over, and the servant cannot strike by way of revenge, but in order to prevent an injury; and the right way of pleading is, that the plaintiff would have beat the master, if the servant had not interposed, prout ei bene licuit. The plaintiff had judgment.

COCKCROFT v. SMITH.

(Court of King's Bench, 1705. 2 Salk. 642, 91 Reprint, 541.)

In an action of mayhem brought by Cockcroft Attorney against Smith, the defendant pleaded son assault demesne and issue being joined thereupon, HOLT, Chief Justice, directed a verdict for the defendant, the first assault being tilting the form upon which the defendant sat, whereby he fell; the maim was that the defendant bit off the plaintiff's finger.

But the question was, what assault was sufficient to maintain such a plea in mayhem? HOLT, C. J., said that WADHAM WYNDHAM, J., plea mentioned, and whereof the plaintiff hath above complained. And this the defendant is ready to verify." See Stephen on Pleading (Williston's Ed.) 190. The historic form, down to the Rules of Hilary Term, was not substantially different. See Stephen on Pleading (Tyler's Ed.) 180; 2 Chitty on Pleading (3d Am. Ed.) 429.

Under the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, schedule B, 45, the following short allegation was permissible: "That the plaintiff first assaulted and beat the defendant, who thereupon necessarily committed the alleged assault [or trespass, or did what is complained of] in his own defence." 2 Chitty on Pleading (16th Am. Ed.) 697.

[23] Accord: Lutlopp v. Heckmann (1901) 70 N. J. Law, 272, 57 Atl. 1046: Action for assault and battery. Plea of not guilty. Said Hendrickson, J.: "The evidence for the plaintiff was not returned with the writ, but, taking the evidence for the defendant, it plainly appeared prima facie that the assault complained of was established. Upon this point there was no question for the jury. The only defense suggested or that could be raised in avoidance of liability was that of self-defense. But no plea setting up such a defense had been filed, the defendant having gone to trial upon the general issue.

would not allow it if it was an unequal return; but the practice had been otherwise, and was fit to be settled: That for every assault he did not think it reasonable that a man should be banged with a cudgel; that the meaning of the plea was that he struck in his own defence: That if A. strike B. and B. strikes again, and they close immediately and in the scuffle B. mayhems A. that is son assault, but if upon a little blow given by A. to B., B. gives him a blow that mayhems him, that is not son assault demesne. POWELL, J., agreed: for the reason why son assault is a good plea in mayhem, is, because it might be such an assault as endangered the defendant's life.[24]

IRELAND v. ELLIOT.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1857. 5 Iowa, 478, 68 Am. Dec. 715.)

This action was brought to recover damages for an assault and battery upon the plaintiff by the defendant. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals. The questions made in the case arise upon the instructions of the court below, which will be found in the opinion of the court.

WOODWARD, J. * * * The plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury that: "No amount of words, will justify an assault, or an assault and battery," which the court gave, with the following qualification: "This is so in criminal cases, but if the jury find in this action that Ireland, by abusive words and threatening conduct, brought the battery on himself, it is a defence." The plaintiff further requested the court to instruct the jury, that: "Words alone, do not constitute such wrongful acts, as to justify an assault and battery," which the court gave, but with this modification: "Unless the words were such as to (and were so intended and designed), cause a prudent man to lose his reason for the time, and if the battery was not more excessive than the provocation. In such case, it is a defence in a civil action for damages, provided the plaintiff was the wrongdoer."

The time permits but a brief attention to the question here presented, and in truth, it requires but a word. Provoking and insulting language, constitutes a defence to acts of violence, in a civil action, no more than in a criminal prosecution. The farthest that the law has gone, and the farthest it can go, whilst attempting to maintain a rule, is to permit the high provocation of language, to be shown as a palliation for the acts and results of anger; that is, in legal phrase, to be shown in mitigation of damages. Thus far the law has gone and no farther. Language which, in its nature, tends generally to excite the angry passions of men, is admitted in evidence, as an extenuation, but never as a justification or defence, either in a criminal, or civil cause. * * *

[24] The statement of facts is from 1 Ld. Raym. 177. The same case, Cockcroft v. Smith, appears in (1704) 6 Mod. 230, 87 Reprint, 981, with this statement: "The defendant in a scuffle bit off the forefinger of an attorney's right hand." The case appears again in 11 Mod. 43, 88 Reprint, 872 (1705) Cockcroft v. Smith, with this statement of the facts: "Cockcroft in a scuffle ran his finger towards Smith's eyes, who bit off a joint from the plaintiff's finger."

KEEP v. QUALLMAN.

This action was brought to recover damages for an assault and battery alleged to have been committed by the defendant upon the person of the plaintiff.

The parties are neighbors, but not friends. On a certain Sunday afternoon they met in a public highway. Several other persons were present. The testimony tends to show that the defendant accosted the plaintiff by asking him, "What is the reason you are slandering me around all the time?" that immediately the plaintiff put his hand in his pocket, and was about taking it out again when the defendent struck him on the head with a cane twice, knocking him down. He got up, and, as the defendant testifies, attacked the latter, whereupon they fought with their fists until the plaintiff was vanquished and retreated. The defendant also testifies that he had just then heard that the plaintiff had told their neighbors to watch him; that previously he had been told that, at different times, the plaintiff had threatened to inflict personal violence upon him, and that plaintiff was in the habit of shooting people, and was a dangerous man; and when he put his hand in his pocket, the movement indicated to his (the defendant's) mind an intention to draw a revolver.

The court excluded other testimony offered by the defendant to show that the plaintiff was of a quarrelsome disposition and in the habit of using dangerous weapons. The jury were instructed that the defendant had shown no legal justification for the assault, and hence the defendant was liable to respond in damages therefor, and the case was submitted to the jury only for an assessment of damages. The damages were assessed at $175. A motion for a new trial was denied, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff pursuant to the verdict. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

LYON, J. It was not unlawful for the defendant to address the plaintiff as he did when they met on the highway, and if the plaintiff by his former threats of personal violence (if he made any), and by putting his hand in his pocket as testified to by the defendant (if he did so), gave the defendant reason to believe that he was about to draw a revolver or other weapon upon him, it was an assault, and the defendant had the right to act upon appearances and at once repel or prevent the supposed contemplated attack. See 1 Whart. Crim. Law, §§ 603–606. We think the testimony sufficient to send to the jury the question whether the acts of the plaintiff were sufficient to give the defendant reason to believe that he was in imminent danger of being attacked by the plaintiff when he knocked the latter down. That is to say, we think the testimony tends to prove a state of facts from which the jury might properly find the defendant was legally justified in striking the blows to prevent the plaintiff from attacking him. Hence the instruction that the defendant was absolutely liable in the action was erroneous. The instruction should have been that, if the defendant had no reasonable grounds to fear an immediate attack by the plaintiff, or, having such grounds, if he used more force than was necessary to prevent such attack, the plaintiff could recover; otherwise not.

We are also inclined to think that on the authority of State v. Nett, 50 Wis. 524, 7 N. W. 344, proof of the quarrelsome and violent disposition of the plaintiff should have been received, as elements in the correct solution of the questions above suggested.

BY THE COURT. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause will be remanded for a new trial.

TICKELL v. READ.

(At Nisi Prius, 1772. Lofft 215, 98 Reprint, 617.)

Action of assault and battery, defendant pleads the general issue, not guilty; and also a special plea in justification, that he assisted his servant, whom the plaintiff was beating.

Contended, that the law will not justify a master interposing on an assault against his servant, by assaulting the person who beats the servant, as it does a servant in like case interposing for his master; because it was the duty of the servant, who was hired to serve and be assistant to his master's person, but not so the master to the servant. On the other hand it was contended to this effect nearly; the duty of master and servant was reciprocal, and if the servant owed to his master fidelity and obedience, the master owed to the servant protection and defence; and might, therefore, well justify by this plea.

LORD MANSFIELD. I cannot tell them a master interposing when his servant is assailed, is not justifiable, under the circumstances of the case, as well as a servant interposing for his master: it rests on the relation.

(D) Defense of Property

(a) DEFENSE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY; RECAPTION

If a man will take my horse from me, or anything which belongs to me, and I will not suffer him to do it, although he is hurt, in this case I shall be excused in law. And suppose that a man is about to beat my servant, and I aid my servant in his defence, although the other is hurt by me, all this matter shall be adjudged in defence of my servant, and of my goods. For, since he was about to injure me, this malfeasance shall be said to be an assault upon me begun by him, and all this shall be said to be in defence of the goods and chattels of the defendant.[26]

Newton, C. J., Anon. (1440) Y. B. 19 Hen. VI, fol. 31, pl. 59.

Recaption or reprisal is another species of remedy by the mere act of the party injured. This happens when any one hath deprived another of his property in goods or chattels personal, or wrongfully detains one's wife, child, or servant: in which case the owner of the goods, and the husband, parent, or master, may lawfully claim and retake them wherever he happens to find them, so it be not in a riotous manner, or attended with a breach of the peace. The reason for this is obvious; since it may frequently happen that the owner may have this only opportunity of doing himself justice: his goods may be afterwards conveyed away or destroyed; and his wife, children, or servants concealed or carried out of his reach; if he had no speedier remedy than the ordinary process of law. If therefore he can so contrive it as to gain possession of his property again without force or terror, the law favors and will justify his proceeding. But as the public peace is a superior consideration to any one man's private property; and as, if individuals were once allowed to use private force as a remedy for private injuries, all social justice must cease, the strong would give law to the weak, and every man would revert to a state of nature; for these reasons it is provided that this natural right of recaption shall never be exerted where such exercise must occasion strife and bodily contention, or endanger the peace of society. If, for instance, my horse is taken away, and I find him in a common, a fair, or a public inn, I may lawfully seize him to my own use; but I cannot justify breaking open a private stable, or entering on the grounds of a third person, to take him, except he be feloniously stolen; but must have recourse to an action at law.

WADHURST v. DAMME.

(Court of King's Bench, 1604. Cro. Jac. 45, 79 Reprint, 37.)

Trespass; for that he killed his dog, being a mastiff dog. The defendant pleads, that Sir Francis Willoughby was seised in fee of a warren in D. within the same county, whereof he is and then was warrener, and that his dog was divers times killing conies there; and therefore he finding him there, tempore quo, etc., running at conies, he there killed him, absque hoc that he is guilty at Etonbridge prout, etc. And it was thereupon demurred * * * for the matter of the justification.

But all the court held that the matter of justification is good; because it being alleged that the dog used to be there killing conies, it is good cause for the killing him, in salvation of his conies; for, having used to haunt the warren, he cannot otherwise be restrained.

YELVERTON doubted thereof, because it is not alleged that the master was sciens of that quality, or had warning given to him thereof.

POPHAM. The common use of England is, to kill dogs and cats in all warrens as well as any vermin; which shews that the law hath been always taken to be, that they may well kill them: so the justification is good.[27] * * * Wherefore it accordingly was adjudged for the defendant.

[27] A question as to the venue is omitted.

Accord: Leonard v. Wilkins (1812) 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 233 (D. had shot P.'s dog when it was in D.'s field. "The dog was running with a fowl in his mouth, and the defendant called after the dog before he fired, but he had the fowl in his mouth at the time he was shot." The property in the fowl was not shown); Harrington v. Hall (1906) 6 Pennewill (Del.) 72, 63 Atl. 875, where the court charged the jury thus: "The defendant justifies the killing of a dog, whosesoever it was, on the day in question, because, as he claims, the dog was, at the time of the shooting, in the act of killing one of a flock of his turkeys then upon his premises. We say to you that if you find under the evidence that the defendant himself, or his son under the father's directions, did kill the plain-

WRIGHT v. RAMSCOT.

Trespass. The plaintiff declared that the defendant did beat, strike, and stab a mastiff of the plaintiff, so that the mastiff died. The defendant pleaded in bar, that the plaintiff suffered his mastiff to go unmuzzled in the street, by reason whereof the mastiff run violently upon a dog of one Ellen Bagshaw, and did then and there bite the said dog (which dog the said Ellen kept in her house for the preservation thereof); wherefore the defendant, being the servant of the said Ellen, then and there killed the mastiff, that he might not do any further mischief. Upon which plea the plaintiff demurred in law.

And Saunders of counsel for the plaintiff argued that * * * here the defendant has not said that he could not otherwise part or take off the mastiff from worrying the other dog; and if he had said so, it would have altered the case: and he might have justified the beating of the mastiff to preserve his dog, but not the killing of him, unless it could not otherwise be prevented. But in this case he said nothing more than that he killed the mastiff to prevent the other dog from being killed; whereas, for anything that appears to the contrary, he might have saved the other dog without killing the mastiff: and so he has killed the mastiff without any necessity or cause, which is not justifiable; and he has not in any way excused that injury. And therefore he concluded that the plea was bad.

And of that opinion was the whole Court; and judgment was given for the plaintiff.[28]

JANSON v. BROWN.

(At Nisi Prius, Adjourned Sittings in London, 1807. 1 Camp. 41.)

Trespass for shooting the plaintiff's dog. Pleas, 1, not guilty; and 2, a justification, that the dog was worrying and attempting to kill a fowl of the defendant's, and could not otherwise be prevented from so doing. Replication to the last plea, de injuria sua propria absque tali causa.

The case being made out on the part of the plaintiff, Garrow for the defendant said, he should prove that just before the dog was shot, being accustomed to chase the defendant's poultry, he was worrying the fowl in question, and that he had not dropped it from his mouth above an instant when the piece was fired. But, tiff's dog under such circumstances, it was justifiable, and the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. For, if the dog was upon the land of the defendant in the act of destroying his turkeys, the defendant was justified in killing him."

[28] The statement of the pleadings is abridged. The pleadings are set out at length in (1665) 1 Wms. Saund. 82, 85 Reprint, 92.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, this would not make out the justification; to which it was necessary that when the dog was shot, he should have been in the very act of killing the fowl, and could not be prevented from effecting his purpose by any other means.[29]

Verdict for plaintiff, with 1s. damages.

LIVERMORE v. BATCHELDER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1886. 141 Mass. 179, 5 N. E. 275.)

Tort for killing the plaintiff's dog. Trial without a jury; the trial judge found the following facts:

The plaintiff, on February 20, 1884, was the owner of a dog, which was duly licensed by the town of Reading, and wore a collar, duly marked as required by the Pub. St. 1882, c. 102, § 80. On said February 20, the plaintiff's dog, with another dog, came upon the defendant's premises and there killed and maimed hens of the defendant, which were in his hen-house or shed. The dogs were driven away, and, in about fifteen minutes afterwards, came again upon the defendant's premises, and were running toward the same shed and hen-house of the defendant, when the defendant, having reasonable cause to believe that the dogs were proceeding to maim and kill others of his hens in said shed and hen-house, shot and killed the plaintiff's dog.

Upon these facts, the judge ruled that the defendant's killing of the plaintiff's dog under the circumstances stated, was not in law justifiable; and thereupon found and ordered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant alleged exceptions.

HOLMES, J. The ruling of the court, as we understand it, meant that the facts found, without more, did not disclose a justification for killing the plaintiff's dog. It was found that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe that the dog was proceeding to maim and kill his hens, but not that he had reasonable cause to believe that it was necessary to kill the dog in order to prevent him from killing the hens. The justification, therefore, was not made out. Wright v. Ramscot, 1 Saund. 84. Janson v. Brown, 1 Camp. 41. See Commonwealth v. Woodward, 102 Mass. 155, 161.

It is unnecessary to consider whether the common law remedy is taken away by the Pub. Sts. c. 102, §§ 80–110.

Exceptions overruled.[30]

[29] Compare Reed v. Goldneck (1905) 112 Mo. App. 310, 86 S. W. 1104: "Under the rule of the common law which obtained prior to the statute as announced in the cases supra, one was not justified in killing a dog, even though it was on his premises, unless the dog was actually doing or attempting to do injury to his domestic animals; and in the latter case the danger from the dog must have been so apparent as to threaten imminent peril. * * * [But under the statute of 1899] if the dog be found either killing or chasing the animals, or under such circumstances as would make it appear satisfactorily to the jury that the dog had been engaged either in killing or chasing the animals, then the killing of the dog is justifiable."

[30] Compare Aldrich v. Wright (1873) 53 N. H. 398, 16 Am. Rep. 339: Four minks were swimming towards D.'s geese, at a distance of from one to three rods, when D. came out with a gun. The minks stopped pursuing the geese

McCHESNEY v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1903. 132 Mich. 252, 93 N. W. 627, 1 Ann. Cas. 191.)

The defendant shot and killed the plaintiff's dog when it was trespassing upon the defendant's premises. The dog had killed three chickens belonging to the defendant and was in the habit of urinating through the defendant's screen door onto his carpet. But at the time when he was shot the dog was not in the act of killing or pursuing a chicken. In the circuit court the plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for $20, the value of the dog. The defendant brings error.

GRANT, J. The court instructed the jury that the defendant was and ran upon a little island, and there stopped. D. fired at the minks on the island and killed them all at one shot. The trial court ruled that D. was not justified in killing the minks if the geese were not in imminent danger, and could have been protected either by driving away the geese, or frightening or driving off the minks. Verdict for plaintiff. Said Doe, J., delivering the opinion: "The plaintiff's claim that the defendant is liable if the geese were not in imminent danger, taken in the sense for which the plaintiff contends, and the sense in which both parties, at the trial, probably understood it, cannot be sustained. * * * It is probable that the parties understood that by the doctrine of imminent danger, the defendant was liable unless the geese would, in a few moments, have been killed by the minks but for the defendant's shot. The doctrine, asserted in that form, would be erroneous. It was for the jury to say, considering the defendant's valuable property in the geese, the absence of absolute property in the minks, their character, whether harmless or dangerous, the probability of their renewing their pursuit if he had gone about his usual business and left the geese to their fate, the sufficiency and practicability of other kinds of defense, considering all the material elements of the question,—it was for the jury to say whether the danger was so imminent as to make the defendant's shot reasonably necessary in point of time. If, but for the shot, some of the geese, continuing to resort as usual to the pond, apparently would have been killed by these minks within a period quite indefinite, and if other precautionary measures of a reasonable kind, as measured by consequences, would have been ineffectual, the danger was imminent enough to justify the destruction of the minks for the protection of property. The right of defense is the right to do whatever apparently is reasonably necessary to be done in defense under the circumstances of the case. * * * The claim that the defendant was liable if the geese could have been protected by driving them away from the minks, cannot be sustained. Requiring the defendant to drive away the minks if he could, is an admission that he had a right to drive them away, and that they had no right to remain on his premises without his consent. But, requiring him, if he could not drive them away from the geese, to drive the geese away from them, is a practical denial of his right to keep geese in his own pond or on his own land, if he could only keep them there by killing minks. It amounts to this: it being impracticable to permanently eject the assailants, he must banish the assailed; and the raising of geese being impossible, the raising of minks is compulsory. A freeholder, permitted to fire blank cartridges only to cover the endless retreat of his poultry before these maranders, and obliged to suffer such an enemy to ravage his lands and waters with boldness generated by impunity, is a result of turning the fact of the reasonable necessity of retreating to the wall before a human assailant into a universal rule of law. This rule practically compels the defendant to bring his poultry to the block prematurely, and to abandon an important branch of agricultural industry. His right of protecting his fowls is merely his right of exterminating them." The opinion in this case reviews at length the authorities and the principles involved.

not justified in killing the dog, unless he was in the act of chasing, killing, or annoying his sheep or other domestic animals. The following facts are conclusively established: (1) That the dog was a killer of domestic fowls; (2) that he was a frequent trespasser upon the premises of the defendant, and frequently committed the disgusting nuisance above mentioned; (3) that plaintiff was notified by the defendant and others of the disposition of his dog; (4) that he took no steps to restrain him. Evidently the attention of the learned circuit judge had not been called to the cases of Hubbard v. Preston, 90 Mich. 221, 51 N. W. 209, 15 L. R. A. 249, 30 Am. St. Rep. 426, and Throne v. Mead, 122 Mich. 273, 80 N. W. 1080, 80 Am. St. Rep. 568, otherwise I think he would have directed a verdict for the defendant. Under the principle laid down in these decisions the defendant was justified in killing the dog.

That there is property in dogs, for which the owner may recover in a proper case, is conceded; but this does not authorize a party to keep a dog of the character of the one in this case, who almost daily commits a nuisance at his neighbor's house, and kills and destroys his neighbor's domestic fowls. No statute is needed to justify the injured party in killing a dog of this character when he appears upon the premises, after notifying the owner of his depredations, and giving him ample time to take care of him. Whether the statute (Comp. Laws 1897, § 5592) is broad enough to include domestic fowls is unnecessary to decide. See Marshall v. Blackshire, 44 Iowa, 475. This is not a case where a dog is found for the first time committing a nuisance in trespassing, or in killing fowls or animals. This is not the case of Bowers v. Horen, 93 Mich. 420, 53 N. W. 535, 17 L. R. A. 773, 32 Am. St. Rep. 513, where the offense with which the dog was charged was in walking over a freshly painted porch, and once being found in a henhouse without doing any damage, and in going around the defendant's house at night, chasing cats into trees, and barking. In that case stress was laid upon the fact that the defendant, knowing who the owner was, failed to notify him that the dog gave him any annoyance. Had the defendant in that case done so, a different result might have been reached, under the decision of Hubbard v. Preston, supra. * * *[31]

[31] A part of the opinion is omitted. Hooker, C. J., and Montgomery and Moore, JJ., concurred in the reversal.

Compare Brill v. Flagler (1840) 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 354: D. shot P.'s dog, although it was not threatening either D. or his property. A demurrer to the plea admitted that the dog was in the constant habit of coming on D.'s premises, and about his dwelling, day and night, barking and howling, to the great annoyance of the family, that P. knew of this mischievous propensity of his dog and would not confine him, and that D. was unable to prevent the annoyance otherwise than by shooting. Held that the plea was a good bar. See generally under "Nuisance," infra.

BLADES v. HIGGS et al.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1861. 10 C. B. [N. S.] 713, 142 Reprint, 634, 128 R. R. 890.)

The declaration charged that the defendants assaulted and beat and pushed about the plaintiff, and took from him his goods, that is to say, dead rabbits. The defendants pleaded, amongst other pleas, Thirdly, as to the assaulting, beating, and pushing about the plaintiff, that the plaintiff, at the said time when, etc., had wrongfully in his possession certain dead rabbits of and belonging to the Marquis of Exter; that the said rabbits were then in the possession of the plaintiff without the leave and license and against the will of the said Marquis; and that the plaintiff was about wrongfully and unlawfully to take and carry away the said rabbits and convert the same to his own use; whereupon the defendants, as the servants of the Marquis, and by his command, requested the plaintiff to refrain from carrying away and converting the same rabbits, and to quit the possession thereof to the defendants as such servants, which the plaintiff refused to do; and that thereupon the defendants, as the servants of the said Marquis, and by his command, gently laid their hands upon the plaintiff, and took the said rabbits from him, using no more force than necessary; which were the alleged trespasses in the declaration mentioned, etc. Demurrer and joinder.

Beasley, in support of the demurrer: The plea is clearly bad. In order to sustain it, it must be made out, that, wherever A.'s goods are wrongfully in the hands of B., A. or his servants may forcibly take them, without showing that a felony has been committed, or the way in which the goods came to B.'s possession, or that the defendant was attempting to retake them on fresh pursuit. To permit this, would be manifestly against one of the first principles of law. It is not alleged that the defendant had wrongfully taken the rabbits. He might have been an innocent bailee, or a purchaser in market overt.[32]

ERLE, Ch. J. The declaration in this case was for an assault and battery. The substance of the justification was, that, the plaintiff having wrongfully in his possession rabbits belonging to the defendants (we consider the servants here the same as the master), and being about to carry them away, the defendants requested him to refrain, and, on his refusal, molliter manus imposuerunt, and used no more force than was necessary to take the rabbits from him. To this the plaintiff has demurred, and thereby admits that he was doing the wrong, and that the defendants were maintaining the right, as alleged: and he contends that the defendants are not justified in using necessary force, on account of the danger to the public peace: but he adduces no authority to support his contention. The defendants likewise have failed to adduce any case where the justification was supported without an allegation to explain how the plaintiff took the property of the defendant and became the holder thereof. But the principles of law are in our judgment decisive to show that the plea is good, although that allegation is not made.

[32] A large part of the argument is omitted.

If the defendants had actual possession of the chattels, and the plaintiff took them from them against their will, it is not disputed that the defendants might justify using force sufficient to defend their right and retake the chattels; and we think there is no substantial distinction between that case and the present; for, if the defendants were the owners of the chattels, and entitled to the possession of them, and the plaintiff wrongfully detained them from them after request, the defendants in law would have the possession, and the plaintiff's wrongful detention against the request of the defendants would be the same violation of the right of property as the taking of the chattels out of the actual possession of the owner.

It has been decided that the owner of land entitled to the possession may enter thereon and use force sufficient to remove a wrong-doer therefrom. In respect of land, as well as chattels, the wrong-doers have argued that they ought to be allowed to keep what they are wrongfully holding, and that the owner cannot use force to defend his property, but must bring his action, lest the peace should be endangered if force was justified: see Newton v. Harland, 1 Man. & G. 644. But in respect of land, that argument has been overruled in Harvey v. Brydges, 14 M. & W. 442. Parke, B., says: "Where a breach of the peace is committed by a freeholder, who, in order to get possession of his land, assaults a person wrongfully holding possession of it against his will, although the freeholder may be responsible to the public in the shape of an indictment for a forcible entry, he is not liable to the other party. I cannot see how it is possible to doubt that it is a perfectly good justification to say that the plaintiff was in possession of the land against the will of the defendant, who was owner, and that he entered upon it accordingly; even though in so doing a breach of the peace was committed."

In our opinion, all that is so said of the right of property in land, applies in principle to a right of property in a chattel, and supports the present justification. If the owner was compellable by law to seek redress by action for a violation of his right of property, the remedy would be often worse than the mischief, and the law would aggravate the injury instead of redressing it.

For these reasons, our judgment is for the defendants.[33]

[33] For the subsequent history of this case, see (1862) 12 C. B. N. S. 501; (1863) 13 C. B. N. S. (Exch.) 844; and (1865) 11 H. L. C. 621, to the effect that title to property created merely by the act of reducing a thing into possession, necessarily implies a reduction into possession effected by an act which is not in any way of a wrongful nature. Such an act, therefore, effected by one who is at the moment a trespasser, cannot create a title to property.

See the remark in Pollock on Torts (7th Ed.) p. 380, note c: "The reasons given at page 720 [of 10 C. B. N. S., i. e., Erle's opinion] seem wrong, and the decision itself is contrary to the common law as understood in the thirteenth century. One who retook his own goods by force (save, perhaps, on fresh pursuit) was a trespasser and lost the goods."

See, also, Sir Frederick Pollock's later comment on the case in 128 Rev. Rep. vi: "There seems to be no doubt that in Blades v. Higgs, the court allowed an

This was an action to recover damages for an assault and battery by which the plaintiff's arm was broken. The defendant pleaded a justification. The evidence showed that the parties were working on the highway (the defendant being superintendent of highways, and the plaintiff working under him), and that the plaintiff was handling an ordinary scraper, the horses attached to the scraper being driven by a third person; that the defendant was not satisfied with the manner in which the plaintiff handled the scraper, and an altercation arose between them, which resulted in a personal encounter. The plaintiff's testimony tended to show that he retained possession of the scraper, and the defendant attempted to take the scraper away from him, and struck his arm in the attempt, by which the arm was broken. The defendant's testimony tended to show that during the altercation the scraper came to a standstill, and that he then discharged the plaintiff from the work, and the plaintiff stood up and let go of the scraper; that thereupon the defendant took hold of both handles of the scraper, and the plaintiff then tried to take it away from him, and he (defendant) struck the plaintiff's arm in defending his possession of the scraper. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

WINSLOW, J. There was no doubt, under the evidence, of the fact that the defendant struck the plaintiff and fractured his arm; but the principal disputed question seemed to be whether the defendant struck the blow while trying to take the scraper from plaintiff's possession, or whether the plaintiff had entirely let go of the scraper, and the defendant had, without violence, taken it and struck the blow while the plaintiff was endeavoring to retake it. In the one case the act of defendant was an attempt to take the property by force from plaintiff's possession, and in the other case it was an attempt to defend his own possession. In this situation of the evidence, the following instruction was given:

"If the defendant in this case ordered and directed the plaintiff to let go of the scraper and quit work, and discharged him, and the plaintiff refused to let go of the scraper and refused to quit work, then, after such order and refusal, the defendant had a right to use proper and reasonable force to enable him to control the scraper in question, and the jury must determine from all the evidence how much and what kind of force the defendant did in fact use."

amount of self help which their predecessors in the Middle Ages would have disapproved as too dangerous to the public peace. Obviously the danger would be greater when most men went armed, and men of high rank with armed retinues."

But compare 27 Halsbury's Laws of England (1913) 868: "'If the goods are wrongfully removed or are in the wrongful possession of some one else, the owner may retake them and may use force if necessary."

For American cases, see 3 Cyc. 1078, note 15; 4 Cent. Dig., "Assault," §§ 13–15; Dec. Dig., Key No., "Assault," § 15.

This instruction admits at least of the construction that, if the defendant had discharged the plaintiff, the defendant was entitled to take the scraper from plaintiff's possession by force, if the force used was reasonable and proper to accomplish the purpose. We do not understand this to be the law. It was held in Barnes v. Martin, 15 Wis. 240, 82 Am. Dec. 670, that the owner of property which is in the peaceable possession of another has no right to retake the property by force. This principle is based upon public policy. It is in the interest of peace and public order. Any other rule would substitute the strong arm for the court of justice, and promote lawbreaking and violence. The right of the owner to recapture personal property is to be exercised only when he may peaceably do so, with the possible exception (not necessary to be discussed here) that, when the property has been momentarily taken from the owner by force or fraud, it may be lawfully retaken, if only reasonable and proper force be used. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 983; 3 Cyc. 1078. In the present case, plaintiff's original possession of the scraper was lawful, and, if he retained the possession continuously, the defendant was not justified in using force to take it away; but if the plaintiff let go of it, and the defendant peaceably took possession, he might defend such possession with reasonable and proper force.

The court further charged the jury that "in this case, as in all other civil cases, the burden is upon the plaintiff to establish the facts essential to his recovery by a preponderance of the evidence." This might well be understood as meaning that the plaintiff, after proving the blow, was obliged to prove that there was no justification for it. This is not the law. The blow and consequent damage being admitted by the defendant, a prima facie case was made, and the burden lay upon him to prove facts constituting a justification therefor. Timm v. Bear, 29 Wis. 254; Blake v. Damon, 103 Mass. 199; 2 Greenleaf, Ev. (15th Ed.) §§ 95–98.

Judgment reversed, and action remanded for a new trial.[34]

[34] Accord: Bobb v. Bosworth (1808) Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 81, 12 Am. Dec. 273: In an action by Bosworth for an assault and battery by Bobb, it appeared that at the time of the assault and battery, Bosworth was in possession of the slave which was the subject of dispute between the parties; that Bobb came to retake him out of Bosworth's possession in a violent and forcible manner, which was resisted by Bosworth; and that in the scuffle Bobb broke Bosworth's arm. Said the Court, per Trimble, J.: "It is not material, whether Bobb or Bosworth had the better right to the negro. Bosworth was in actual possession; Bobb could not lawfully use violence and force in regaining possession. Having broken the peace, and used force, where he was forbidden by law to do so, he must be answerable for the consequences."

Kirby v. Foster (1891) 17 R. I. 437, 22 Atl. 1111, 14 L. R. A. 317: P. was in the employ of a corporation as bookkeeper. The sum of $50 belonging to the corporation had been lost. P. was held responsible for this by the officers of the corporation, and the amount was deducted from his pay. On a subsequent pay day, D., an officer of the corporation, handed P. some money to pay the help. P., acting under the advice of counsel, took from this money the amount due him at the time, including what had been deducted from his pay, put it into his pocket, and returned the balance to D., saying that he had received his pay and was going to leave and that he did this under advice of counsel. D. thereupon attempted by force to take the money from him. In the struggle which ensued, P. received injuries, for which he brought suit. D. claimed a justification. There was a verdict for P., with a petition by D. for a new trial. Said Stiness, J., delivering the opinion: "Unquestionably if one takes another's property from his possession without right and against his will, the owner or person in charge may protect his possession, or retake the property, by the use of necessary force. He is not bound to stand by and submit to wrongful dispossession or larceny when he can stop it, and he is not guilty of assault in thus defending his right, by using force to prevent his property from being carried away. But this right of defence and recapture involves two things: first, possession by the owner, and, second, a purely wrongful taking or conversion, without a claim of right. If one has intrusted his property to another, who, afterwards, honestly though erroneously, claims it as his own, the owner has no right to retake it by personal force. If he has, the actions of replevin and trover in many cases are of little use. The law does not permit parties to take the settlement of conflicting claims into their own hands. It gives the right of defence, but not of redress. The circumstances may be exasperating; the remedy at law may seem to be inadequate; but still the injured party cannot be arbiter of his own claim. Public order and the public peace are of greater consequence than a private right or an occasional hardship. Inadequacy of remedy is of frequent occurrence, but it cannot find its complement in personal violence. Upon these grounds the doctrine contended for by the defendants is limited to the defence of one's possession and the right of recapture as against a mere wrong-doer. It is therefore to be noted in this case that the money was in the actual possession of the plaintiff, to whom it had been intrusted for the purpose of paying help, who thereupon claimed the right to appropriate it to his own payment, supposing he might lawfully do so. Conceding that the advice was bad, nevertheless, upon such appropriation the plaintiff held the money adversely, as his own, and not as the servant or agent of the company. If his possession was the company's possession, then the company was not deprived of its property, and there could be neither occasion nor justification for violence. Possession by the company would be constructive merely, which would cease when the plaintiff exercised dominion and control on his own behalf under an honest claim of right. It is only in this way, in many cases, that conversion is established. Having thus appropriated the money to himself, it is urged that the act amounted to embezzlement, which justified the intervention of the defendants to prevent the consummation of the crime. We do not think this is so. The plaintiff stated what he had done, and the grounds upon which he claimed the right to do it, handing back the balance above what was due him. A controversy followed; he started to go out, but was stopped by the defendants, and then the assault took place. The sincerity of the plaintiff's belief that he had a right to retain the money is unquestionable. Hence, as stated in Cluff v. Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 308, cited by the defendants, even a forcible taking of property, 'if done under an honest claim of right, however ill founded, would not constitute the crime of robbery or larceny; because, where a party sincerely, though erroneously, believes that he is legally justified in taking property, he is not guilty of the felonious intent which is an essential ingredient of these crimes.' * * * The defendants object to the charge of the court, that where a person has come into the peaceable possession of a chattel from another, the latter has no right to retake it by violence, whether the possession is lawful or unlawful, upon the ground that this rule would prevent the recapture of property obtained by trickery or fraud. The instruction must be considered not as an abstract proposition, but with reference to the case before the jury. Nothing appeared to show that the money had been procured by misrepresentation, trickery, or fraud. It was delivered to the plaintiff voluntarily, in the usual course of business. True, under the advice of a lawyer whom he had consulted, the plaintiff had previously determined to apply the money to his own payment when he should receive it; but this did not make the delivery itself fraudulent, nor did his intent to assert what he believed to be his right make that intent criminal. We think, therefore, with reference to the case as it stood, there was no error in the charge as given, nor in the refusals to charge as requested."

(b) DEFENSE OF REAL PROPERTY; FORCIBLE RE-ENTRY

The first and principal remedy is of this kind, namely, that he who has been disseised may reject the spoiler of his own strength if he can, or by strength which he has called in or recalled, provided no interval has elapsed, the disseisin or misdeed being flagrant.

Bracton (circa 1250) 162 b.[35]

And also the King defendeth, That none from henceforth make any entry into any lands and tenements but in case where entry is given by the law; and in such case not with strong hand, nor with multitude of people, but only in peaceable and easy manner. And if any man from henceforth do to the contrary, and thereof be duly convict, he shall be punished by imprisonment of his body, and thereof ransomed at the King's will.

SKEVILL v. AVERY.

(Court of King's Bench, 1629. Cro. Car. 138, 79 Reprint, 722.)

Trespass of assault, battery, and wounding. The defendant pleaded to the wounding, not guilty. To the assault and battery he pleaded, that he was possessed of a house in such a parish for years, and that the plaintiff entered his house, and would have thrust him out of possession thereof; whereupon he molliter manus imposuit to put him out, and the harm, if any done, was in defence of his own possession. The plaintiff hereupon demurred.

[35] As quoted by Barker, J., in Page v. Dwight (1897) 170 Mass. 29, 48 N. E. 850, 39 L. R. A. 418, and by Swayze, J., in Schwinn v. Perkins (1910) 79 N. J. Law, 515, 78 Atl. 19, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 51, 21 Ann. Cas. 1223.

"Bracton's expression as translated, 'provided no interval has elapsed,' hardly differs from Lord Denman's expression six centuries later [in Browne v. Dawson (1840) 12 Ad. & El. 624, 629: 'A mere trespasser cannot, by the very act of trespass, immediately and without acquiescence give himself what the law understands by possession against the person whom he ejects, and drive him to produce his title, if he can, without delay, reinstate himself in his former possession']. In such a case, as Mr. Justice Barker suggests in Page v. Dwight, the forcible entry and the recapture are but one transaction and the recapture is not a forcible entry but a successful and proper resistance of a forcible entry: all that has been done is to resist successfully a wrongful act." Mr. Justice Swayze in Schwinn v. Perkins (1910) 79 N. J. Law, 515, 78 Atl. 19, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 51, 21 Ann. Cas. 1223.

[36] A confirming statute in 1429 (8 Hen. VI., c. 9) provided that if it appeared that one had been forcibly put out of possession contrary to the statute, the justices "shall put the party so put out in full possession of the same lands and tenements so entered or holden as before."

Goldsmith, for the plaintiff, shewed for cause, that the defendant had pleaded a lease for years, not shewing who made the lease, nor when it was made, nor for how many years; whereas they ought to have been pleaded specially, and shewn particulatim, for if it be traversed, there cannot be any issue thereupon: and he relied upon Crogat's case, 8 Co. 66, that de injuria sua propria is no plea.

But all the Court held, that the defendant had well pleaded; for saying that he was possessed for years is but an inducement and conveyance to his justification and not the substance thereof, which is, that he offered to thrust him out of the possession of his house; and whatsoever title he hath, it is not material, for if he were in possession by virtue of a lease at will, or any other title, "de injuria sua propria" is a good plea; for the title or interest not coming in question (and what was pleaded or alledged being but an inducement to the plea), it needs not be so certain as where it is pleaded by way of title to make a claim in the defendant. Whereupon it was adjudged for the defendant.

WEAVER v. BUSH.

(Court of King's Bench, 1798. 8 Term R. 78, 101 Reprint, 1276.)

To trespass for assaulting and beating the plaintiff with a stick, the defendant pleaded (besides the general issue and son assault, which were found for the plaintiff) that:

"As to the assaulting of the plaintiff and beating, bruising, and ill-treating him, and with the said stick, giving and striking him the said blows, etc., he (the defendant) at the time when, etc., was lawfully possessed of and in a certain close called, etc., at, etc.; and being so possessed, the plaintiff at the said time when, etc., with force and arms and with a strong hand as much as in him lay did attempt and endeavour forcibly to break into and enter the said close of the defendant, and would have broken into and entered the said close without the defendant's licence and against his will, whereupon the defendant being then in his said close, and seeing the said attempt and endeavour of the plaintiff, did then and there resist and oppose such entrance into the said close; and upon that occasion did then and there defend his possession, as it was lawful for him to do; and that if any damage or injury then and there happened to the plaintiff, it was in the defence of the possession of the said close."

To this plea the plaintiff replied de injuria sua propria absque tali causa; the issue on this plea was found for the defendant.

Lens having moved to enter up judgment for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the justification in the third plea, which was found for the defendant, on the ground that that plea could not be supported on the authority of Jones v. Tresilian, 1 Mod. 36, where Twisden, J., said "You cannot justify the beating of a man in defence of your possession; but you may say that you did molliter manus imponere," etc.

Bond, Gibbs, and Dampier, now shewed cause against that rule.

LAWRENCE, J. The general form of pleading, certainly has been as the plaintiff's counsel contends; and on this ground, that the defendant ought not in the first instance to begin with striking the plaintiff; but the law allows him, either in defence of his person or possessions, to lay his hand on the plaintiff, and then he may say, if any further mischief ensued, it was in consequence of the plaintiff's own act; so that the battery follows from the resistance. But it does not necessarily follow from any thing stated in this plea, that the defendant did more than gently lay his hands on plaintiff in the first instance; and if not, this plea may stand consistently with all the authorities. * * *[37]

PER CURIAM. Rule discharged.

POLKINHORN v. WRIGHT.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1845. 8 Q. B. 197, 115 Reprint, 849.)

LORD DENMAN, C. J. This was an action of trespass for assault and battery; and the plaintiff in his declaration, complained that the defendant, on the 1st day of January 1844, assaulted the plaintiff, and then seized him, and dragged him about, and struck him many blows; by means whereof the plaintiff was greatly hurt, etc.

To this the defendant pleaded two pleas of justification: one in defence of the possession of a close and a gate, which the plaintiff endeavoured forcibly and with a strong hand to break and enter; and the other stating that the defendant was possessed of a cow, then being in a certain close, and that the plaintiff, against the will of the defendant, endeavoured to drive the cow away from the close and to dispossess the defendant of her, and would, forcibly and in breach of the peace, have driven away and dispossessed the defendant of the cow: wherefore the defendant resisted the attempt, and justifies the trespasses. The plaintiff replied de injuria. * * *

But the plaintiff contended that the defendant's pleas were bad for not alleging a request to desist before resisting with force. We do not think there is any weight in this objection. There is a manifest distinction between endeavouring to turn a man out of a house or close, into which he has previously entered quietly, and resisting a forcible attempt to enter. In the first case, a request is necessary: in the latter not. This distinction is expressly taken in Green v. Goddard (2 Salk. 641), and Weaver v. Bush (8 T. R. 78). In the present case the pleas justify the trespasses on the ground of resisting a forcible attempt, in the one case to enter the defendant's close, and in the other to dispossess him of his cow; in neither of which cases was a request to desist necessary.[38]

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1853. 1 El. & Bl. 782, 118 Reprint, 629.)

Trespass. The declaration contained counts for two assaults. There were seven pleas. The first was not guilty, with issue thereon. The sixth plea, to the first count, was that the defendant Bagge and ten others named, being eleven members of a cricket club called the Lynn Cricket Club, and eleven others named, being eleven members of a cricket club called the Lytcham Cricket Club, "were lawfully possessed of a certain close," and were lawfully playing a certain lawful game or match at cricket in the said close; and plaintiff was "unlawfully in and upon the said close," and "vexatiously and unlawfully interrupted, hindered and prevented" Bagge and the other twenty one persons "in and from any longer playing the said lawful game:" whereupon Bagge, in his own right and by the authority of the other twenty one persons, and Fletcher, as Bagge's servant, requested plaintiff "to depart from and out of the said close, and to desist from interrupting" the playing: which plaintiff refused to do: whereupon Bagge and Fletcher gently laid their hands upon plaintiff "in order to remove and did remove, him from and out of the said close in this plea mentioned." The seventh plea was similar to the sixth, but directed to the second count. To the sixth and seventh pleas, the plaintiff replied de injuria.

At the trial before Lord Campbell, C. J., at the last Norwich assizes, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant Bagge were both members of the committee of the Lynn Cricket Club. The owner of the close mentioned in the pleas was W. S. Rolin; and he had signed an agreement with the committee, of which the material parts were as follows:

"The said W. S. R. agrees to let unto the said committee, who accordingly hereby agree to hire, all that," etc., "now in the occupation of the said W. S. R., to be used as a cricket field by the members of the above named club, and for that purpose only, at the annual rent of £10." "The committee to do all that may be necessary for keeping the ground in proper playing condition, at their own expense. The tenancy under this agreement to be determinable at the end of any current season, on notice in writing to that effect being given by either party on or before the 29th September."

On the day of the alleged assault, there was a match between the eleven of the Lynn Cricket Club, of which eleven defendant Bagge was one, and plaintiff was not one, and the eleven of the Lytcham Cricket Club. The match was played on the close in question; and the spectators left a clear space round the players, which was, as the jury found, "tabooed" to all but the players. During the innings of the Lytcham Cricket Club, one of the Lynn eleven retired for a temporary purpose; and the plaintiff, who was among the spectators, was requested to take his place. He complied, but did not take off his coat. Bagge, who was captain of the Lynn eleven, told him to do so: offence was taken at the tone in which the command was given; and the plaintiff would neither take off his coat nor leave the "tabooed" spot. He was then, by the direction of the defendant, forcibly removed from the "tabooed" ground; and the assaults were committed in so removing him.

The Lord Chief Justice, on proof of these facts, was of opinion that, the assaults in fact being clearly made out, the issue upon Not guilty must be found for the plaintiff, and that none of the other pleas were made out. He took the opinion of the jury as to whether the twenty two were lawfully playing at cricket, and whether the plaintiff disturbed them. The jury said they were lawfully playing, and plaintiff disturbed them by remaining on the tabooed ground. The Lord Chief Justice thereupon directed a verdict for the plaintiff, but reserved leave to enter a verdict on the 6th and 7th issues for the defendant, if the Court should be of opinion that the part of those pleas proved constituted a defence.

Byles Serjeant moved for a rule nisi to enter the verdict on the 6th and 7th issues, pursuant to the leave reserved.

LORD CAMPBELL, C. J. * * * As to the sixth and seventh pleas, they set up that the twenty two persons named were lawfully possessed of a close, and lawfully playing cricket there, that plaintiff wrongfully remained on the close, and interrupted the playing, and, though requested to depart from the close and to desist from the interruption, would not do so; whereupon the defendants gently laid their hands on him "in order to remove, and did remove, him from and out of said close." Now, no doubt a plea might have been framed to meet the facts, so as to have entitled the defendant to a verdict; for according to the evidence the two elevens were lawfully playing; and, as the jury found, the space round the wickets was tabooed, and the plaintiff came into that tabooed space, and persisted in remaining there though requested to go. And it may be that it would be a good justification that they removed him for disturbing persons lawfully playing at a lawful game; and, if such had been the justification here the plea would have been proved. But such is not the language of this plea, it avers that the twenty two persons named were possessed of the close, and that the plaintiff was removed from the close, because he would not leave it. Therefore the plea justifies the trespasses on the ground that the twenty two were possessed of the close, and committed the trespasses in defence of their possession. Now, in fact, the twenty two were not possessed. It was the cricket field of the Lynn Cricket Club; and eleven out of the twenty two were strangers, invited by the Lynn Cricket Club to come there as guests to play. They were in no sense possessed of the field. Therefore the justification, as pleaded, fails; and those issues were rightly found for the plaintiff.[39]

Rule refused.

[39] The statement is abridged; part of the opinion, on another point, is omitted.

Compare Dean v. Hogg (1834) 10 Bing. 345, 38 R. R. 443: The defendant Lewis hired a steamboat for a party of pleasure to Richmond, upon the terms

BRUCH v. CARTER.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1867. 32 N. J. Law, 554.)

A writ of error brought up for review a judgment against the defendants below, after verdict in an action of trespass. The declaration, framed in four counts, had alleged, in the second count, that the defendants,

"with force and arms, seized and broke loose, from a certain post of the said plaintiff, where he stood tied, a certain other horse of the said plaintiff of great value, etc., and removed the said horse a great distance, to wit, a distance of ten yards, and fastened the said other horse to a certain other post, by means whereof the said horse of the said plaintiff became entangled in his halter, was thrown with great violence upon the ground, and was instantly killed."

The court having overruled an objection to the declaration, the defendants, after the plaintiff had rested his cause, moved that he be non-suited, on the ground that he had not established his right to recover in the action. This motion was refused, and the defendants excepted.

WOODHULL, J. * * *[40] No extended examination of the testimony is required to show that the motion to non-suit was properly refused. The fact that Jacob Cowell, one of the defendants, untied the plaintiff's horse, and removed him from the hitching post, to which his owner had fastened him, is so clearly established by the testimony of John Carter, the plaintiff below, and of Jacob Cowell disclosed in the following letter from the owner: "I note the Adelaide is engaged to you for Richmond or Twickenham for Tuesday the 28th of May, at the hire for the day of £5. 10 s., your party not exceeding fifty persons." The vessel was navigated by a captain and crew, employed and paid by the owner. Just as she was about to start from a quay in London, the plaintiff, an attorney, a stranger to the defendant, stepped on board, not being aware that the vessel had been hired for the day by Lewis, and his embarkation being countenanced by the captain. The plaintiff was not long in discovering that he had intruded into a private party, and expressed to some one near him his readiness to quit the vessel when an opportunity should present itself; but the person so addressed rather counselled him to stay. However, by the time the Adelaide had reached Battersea, it was generally bruited about that a stranger was on board. The ladies became alarmed; and Hogg, as the plaintiff alleged, in an imperious tone, ordered him to quit the vessel. The plaintiff, irritated by what appeared to him a harsh manner of making a lawful request, refused to go; whereupon the defendants, after calling on the captain to remove the plaintiff, with considerable violence shoved him into a boat alongside, and, in so doing, tore off the skirts of his coat. For this assault the plaintiff sued them in trespass; and having obtained a verdict for £10. damages, the question, upon a motion to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit instead, was, whether, under the above contract with the owner, Lewis had such possession of the steam vessel as to support the defendant's second plea, which alleged that Lewis was lawfully possessed of the steam vessel mentioned in the declaration; that the plaintiff was unlawfully in the steam vessel, from which he would not depart when requested; and then justified the committing of the trespasses by the defendants in defence of the possession of Lewis, and in order to remove the plaintiff from the vessel.

himself, that it does not appear to have been at all controverted in the cause. It is equally clear that the post in question stood in the highway, and that the plaintiff's right to use it, if not exclusive, was, at least, as good as that of either of the defendants. Here, then, we find, without looking further, acts done by one of the defendants, which must be held to amount to at least a technical trespass, for which the plaintiff below would be entitled, under the declaration in the cause, to recover nominal damages against this defendant, if nothing more. The plaintiff had, therefore, established his right to recover in the action, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a non-suit. * * *

It appears by one of the bills of exception that, towards the close of the testimony on the part of the defendants, the counsel for Bruch, asked the witness, Jacob Cowell, the following question: "Who put the post in the ground there from which you removed Carter's horse that day?" Which question was overruled by the court as proving an immaterial fact. The counsel then offered to prove, by the same witness, that the post from which he removed the horse, was his father's post; that the witness helped to put it there; and that he had a right to tie to it. Which offer was overruled by the court. The fourth and fifth assignments of error are founded upon the rejection by the court of the evidence thus offered on the part of the plaintiff in error. This evidence appears to me to be wholly immaterial to the issue in the cause, and to have been, for that reason, properly overruled. Admitting all these alleged facts to be true, they neither establish, nor tend to establish, in the defendants, or either of them, any such exclusive right to use the post in question as would enable them to justify the acts complained of in the declaration. It may well be doubted whether even Jacob Cowell's father, upon the facts as offered to be proved, could have legally untied and removed the plaintiff's horse, as the defendants, or one of them, did in this case. He may have owned the post, and may have placed it where it stood, in the highway near the church, for his own convenience: he may have had a perfect right to remove it at his pleasure, but while it remained there, should it not be regarded as so far dedicated to the use of persons having occasion to attend that church, that anyone finding it unoccupied, might lawfully tie his horse to it? However this may be, and whatever exclusive right Jacob Cowell's father may be supposed to have had to use the post in question, it is very certain that Jacob Cowell could not justify under that right, without showing that he acted by the direction, or, at least, the permission of his father. This he did not offer to do; but merely offered to prove that he helped his father put the post where it stood.

But the evidence in question, even if material, could not have been received under the general issue. * * *

GILMAN v. EMERY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1867. 54 Me. 460.)

Trespass to recover damages to plaintiff's horse and wagon. It appeared that the plaintiff started with his brother to drive two heifers from his stable, in Waterville, to another town. As they were passing the defendant's premises, leading plaintiff's horse attached to his wagon, and driving the heifers, one of the latter turned and ran back. Thereupon the plaintiff hitched his horse to a shade tree, twenty-two inches in diameter, standing upon the defendant's premises but within the limits of the highway, and went back for his heifer. The defendant seeing plaintiff's horse so hitched, removed him and hitched him to a post a few feet from the tree. When the plaintiff was returning for his horse, some twenty minutes afterwards, he saw his horse running through the streets, with halter dragging, and the wagon broken. There was no evidence as to the precise manner in which the defendant hitched the horse, or as to how he was freed from the post.

Plaintiff moved to amend by adding a count alleging a wrongful taking by the defendant, a negligent use and control of said horse and wagon, whereby they became injured and unfit for use. The presiding Judge overruled the motion, and ordered a nonsuit, and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

WALTON, J. Travellers have no right to hitch horses to shade trees. It is well known that most horses have a propensity to gnaw whatever they are hitched to. Hitching posts of the hardest wood have to be capped with iron or they are soon so badly gnawed as to be ruined. Too many beautiful shade trees, planted at great expense and watched for years with anxious care, have been destroyed by having horses hitched to them, not to know that the practice is exceedingly dangerous. When, therefore, the owner of a shade tree finds a horse hitched to it, he may immediately remove him to a place of safety, and such removal will not be a trespass.

In this case, the defendant found a horse hitched to one of his shade trees. He unhitched him and led him a few feet and hitched him to a post set in the ground on purpose to hitch horses to. This was not an act of trespass, and probably the plaintiff would not have complained of it, but for the fact that his horse afterwards broke loose from the post and ran away and broke his wagon. But there is no evidence that the defendant did not use ordinary care in hitching the horse, and the plaintiff's writ does not charge him with negligence; it simply charges him with trespass vi et armis, in taking and carrying away the horse, buggy, etc.

The presiding Judge, being of opinion that the action could not be maintained, ordered a nonsuit, to which the plaintiff excepted. We cannot doubt that the nonsuit was rightly ordered.

BRENDLIN v. BEERS.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1911. 144 App. Div. 403, 129 N. Y. Supp. 222.)

The plaintiff, who was engaged in the retail tea and coffee business, employed salesmen to take orders and make deliveries, but collected the bills personally. For the purpose of collecting a bill from a customer, the plaintiff went to an apartment house owned by the defendant, entered the vestibule, and rang the customer's bell. Thereupon the janitor appeared and asked what he wanted. The plaintiff informed him that he came to collect a bill from one of the tenants, whom he named. The janitor then told him to go down stairs and make the collection by means of the dumb-waiter, at the same time saying that this was in accordance with the orders given him by the owner of the premises. The plaintiff refused to do this, and attempted to forcibly pass the janitor for the purpose of going to his customer's apartment. The janitor thereupon seized him, and they both fell to the floor, where they remained until separated. The plaintiff then left the premises and instituted this action in the City Court of the City of New York against the owner of the apartment house to recover damages for alleged assault and battery by the janitor. The complaint was dismissed at the close of plaintiff's case, and the plaintiff appealed to the Appellate Term, which reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial, and from such determination the defendant appeals to this court. The janitor was acting within the scope of his authority.[41]

McLAUGHLIN, J. I am of the opinion the complaint was properly dismissed. There is no evidence that the janitor used any more force than was necessary to prevent the plaintiff from entering the house after he had been told he could not do so. The alleged cause of action is predicated upon the proposition that the plaintiff had a legal right to enter the apartment house, notwithstanding the fact that the owner forbade his doing so. He had no such right, and, if he had, he could not resort to force to accomplish that purpose. When the owner of a house rents it to another, he thereby confers upon the tenant the right to use the building or such part of it as is rented, and this includes an easement of ingress and egress by the usual way. This easement, however, is for the tenant (Totten v. Phipps, 52 N. Y. 354; Doyle v. Lord, 64 N. Y. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 629), and third parties, except upon the invitation, either express or implied, of the landlord or tenant, have no more right to enter the building than they would if it were vacant. Here the record is absolutely barren of any evidence that the tenant had, either expressly or impliedly, invited the plaintiff to enter the building, contrary to the rules established by the landlord. The plaintiff, before the alleged assault was committed, had been informed, that he could not deliver goods or collect bills, except by means of the dumb-waiter, which was located in the basement. This was a rule which had been established by the landlord, and so far as appears was a reasonable one, and entirely satisfactory to the tenant. It certainly was one which, so far as this plaintiff was concerned, the defendant had a right to make, and when he was so informed, and told he could not enter for the purpose of collecting the bill, he should have left the building. When he thereafter attempted to force his way into the building, defendant had a right to prevent his doing so, by using force sufficient for that purpose. Foye v. Sewell, 21 Abb. N. C. 15; Breitenbach v. Trowbridge, 64 Mich. 293, 31 N. W. 402, 8 Am. St. Rep. 829; Parsons v. Brown, 15 Barb. 590. * * *

HANNABALSON v. SESSIONS.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1902. 116 Iowa, 457, 90 N. W. 93, 93 Am. St. Rep. 520.)

Action at law to recover damages for an alleged assault and battery. It appeared that in a war of words the defendant had pushed the plaintiff's arm back from the defendant's side of a partition fence. There was a verdict and judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

WEAVER, J. * * * It is also said that the court erred in instructing the jury that, if plaintiff leaned over the partition fence and attempted to interfere with the ladder, defendant had the right to use such force upon her as was reasonably necessary to cause her to desist, and to expel her from his premises. It is claimed that this instruction is wrong. * * * The general doctrine announced in the instruction is, in our judgment, correct. The mere fact that the plaintiff did not step across the boundary line does not make her any less a trespasser if she reached her arm across the line, as she admits she did. It is one of the oldest rules of property known to the law that the title of the owner of the soil extends, not only downward to the center of the earth, but upward usque ad cœlum, although it is, perhaps, doubtful whether owners as quarrelsome as the parties in this case will ever enjoy the usufruct of their property in the latter direction. The maxim, "Ubi pars est ibi est totum,"—that where the greater part is, there is the whole,—does not apply to the person of the trespasser, and the court and jury could therefore not be expected to enter into any inquiry as to the side of the boundary line upon which plaintiff preponderated, as she reached over the fence top. It was enough that she thrust her hand or arm across the boundary to technically authorize the defendant to demand that she cease the intrusion, and to justify him in using reasonable and necessary force required for the expulsion of so much of her person as he found upon his side of the line, being careful to keep within the limits of the rule, "Molliter manus imposuit," so far as was consistent with his own safety. Under the instructions of the court, the jury must have found that defendant kept within the scope of his legal rights in this respect, and that the alleged assault was not established by the evidence.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.[42]

GREGORY and Honour, his Wife, v. HILL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1799. 8 Term R. 299, 101 Reprint, 1400.)

The declaration stated, that the defendant, on, etc., at, etc., with force and arms, made an assault on the plaintiff's wife; and then and there beat, bruised, and wounded and ill-treated her; and then and there gave and struck her divers and repeated blows and strokes on divers parts of her body; and then and there, with great force and violence, several and repeated times, knocked her down upon the ground, whereby, etc.

To this the defendant pleaded, that before and at the time when, etc., he was possessed of a certain dwelling house, situate, etc., which he then inhabited with his family; and that the said Honour, before the said time when, etc., entered into the said house, and continued therein, without the licence and against the will of him the defendant; and then and there made a great noise and disturbance therein, and disturbed the defendant and his family in the said house; whereupon the defendant requested she would cease her said disturbance, and quietly depart out of the said house, which she refused to do; whereupon the defendant gently laid his hands upon her, to turn her out of the said house, as it was lawful for him to do, which is the same assaulting, beating, bruising, wounding, ill-treating, and striking the said Honour divers and repeated blows and strokes, and knocking her down upon the ground, whereof the plaintiffs have above complained against him; without this, that the defendant is guilty of the premises aforesaid, at the place aforesaid, or elsewhere, out of the said house at, etc., and this he is ready to verify; wherefore, etc.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred; and assigned for causes, that it alleges no sufficient justification or excuse, nor any denial of the battery, bruising, wounding and ill-treating of the said Honour, and striking the said blows and strokes, and knocking down of the said Honour upon the ground, in the introductory part of the said plea mentioned.

Marryat was to have argued in support of the demurrer, and Espinasse against it; but

THE COURT said the case was too plain for argument: that though a plea of molliter manus imposuit would justify what the law considers as an assault, such as might be necessary to have put the party out of the house, without outrage and violence, yet it never was considered as any answer to a charge, such as is contained in the declaration, of beating, wounding and knocking the party down; and they adverted to the case of Collins v. Renison, Sayer, 138, where, to an action of trespass, alleging that the defendant overturned a ladder on which the plaintiff was standing, and threw him from it on the ground, the defendant pleaded, that he was possessed of a garden; and that the plaintiff, against his will, set up a ladder there, and went up the ladder, in order to nail a board to the plaintiff's house: that the defendant forbade him, and requested him to come down; and that the plaintiff persisting in nailing the board, the defendant gently shook the ladder, and gently overturned it and gently threw the plaintiff from it on the ground, doing him as little damage as possible; which was holden bad on demurrer.

The defendant had leave to amend.

JOHNSON v. PATTERSON.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1840. 14 Conn. 1, 35 Am. Dec. 96.)

The original action was trespass for killing and destroying ten hens and chickens, the property of the plaintiff. There was also a special count in case, for the same injury.

On the trial before the county court, the plaintiff offered evidence to prove, and claimed to have proved, the allegations in his declaration. The defendant claimed to have proved, by proper evidence introduced for that purpose, that he had been, for a long time, trespassed upon, by the plaintiff's fowls coming upon his land and destroying the seeds therein planted, and the vegetation thereon growing; and that to prevent a repetition and continuation of these trespasses, he prepared Indian meal mixed with arsenic, and scattered it upon his land, having first informed the plaintiff, that such a preparation would be placed there, and that the plaintiff must confine his fowls, or in some other way prevent them from trespassing upon his land again, otherwise they certainly would be poisoned; that after such notice, the meal so prepared was immediately scattered on the defendant's land; and the plaintiff still neglecting to confine his fowls, or to prevent their coming upon the defendant's premises, they trespassed thereon, and while so trespassing ate the Indian meal so prepared, and some of them thereafter died in consequence of it; which, the defendant claimed, was the same injury for which the plaintiff sought to recover damages. And the defendant claimed, that if these facts were satisfactorily proved, he was justified; and that the court should so charge the jury. The defendant further claimed, that he might lawfully scatter poisoned meal upon his own premises, without any notice to the plaintiff.

The court charged the jury, that unless the defendant had given full and ample notice to the plaintiff, after the poisoned meal had been laid, the defendant could not be justified; and that no previous notice of his intention so to prepare and leave the poisoned meal, could be sufficient; and refused to charge the jury, that the defendant had a right to scatter it, without notice.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant filed a bill of exceptions to the charge, and thereupon brought a writ of error in the superior court; which was reserved for the consideration and advice of this court.

SHERMAN, J. This is not a case in which the destruction of the plaintiff's property resulted from acts done by the defendant, in the ordinary use of his own, without any intention to do the injury complained; as in Blythe v. Topham, Cro. Jac. 158, where a stray horse fell into a pit made by the defendant in the common; or as in Bush v. Brainard, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 78, 13 Am. Dec. 513, where the cow of the plaintiff, trespassing on the defendant's land, was killed, by drinking maple syrup in the defendant's sugar works. In this case, the defendant scattered the poison in his enclosure with intent to kill the plaintiff's fowls, if they should again trespass on the place. Being of opinion that the notice given by the defendant immediately before the poisonous article was put on the land, was sufficient, the only important question is, whether the defendant, having given such notice, offered in evidence a sufficient justification. If the jury have found the verdict, which they ought ultimately to give, the final judgment must be affirmed, although the court erred in regard to the sufficiency of the notice.

By the settled principles of the English law, the degree of force, which may be employed in defending one's person or property, when present, is well defined, and admits of no controversy. It is entirely and exclusively defensive. If a man makes an assault on the person of another; or enters his house and refuses to go out, when ordered; or enters on his land; or in any way attempts a mere trespass on his property real or personal, by force; so much force as is necessary to repel or prevent injury, or remove the trespasser, may be employed. There is no doubt, that if A. is trespassing on the land of B., the latter, when present, by himself or his servants, may, after notice to depart, use such reasonable force as is necessary for his removal. He may use like force to expel another's beast from his land, or he may seize and impound it. But he has no right, by the English law or our own, when present, in such a case, to destroy life, or inflict permanent injury, or use greater force than is necessary for removal or prevention. This is admitted. The right to kill a bull or other furious beast from which one's person is in present danger; or a dog chasing sheep or other animals of property, so that they are exposed to harm; or a dog seen at large, which is accustomed to bite mankind; is an exception to this rule. * * *

We cannot justify the defendant in committing the comparatively small trespass for which the plaintiff complains, upon any principles which have been admitted in this state, or which we can reconcile with those just provisions of the English common law, which we have already incorporated into our own, in regard to the means which may be used to prevent a simple trespass. The case does not involve the inquiry, what may lawfully be done to prevent a burglary or other felony. Cases of that character are governed by other and well settled rules.

We advise that the judgment of the county court be affirmed.[43]

SKINNER v. WILDER.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1865. 38 Vt. 115, 88 Am. Dec. 645.)

Trespass quare clausum fregit, with a count in trover. Plea, the general issue. Upon the plaintiff's offer to prove the facts set forth in the opinion the court held pro forma that if these facts were proved the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover, and directed a verdict for the defendant, to which the plaintiff excepted.

PECK, J. In this case, it appears, that the plaintiff planted or set apple trees on his own land six feet from the division line between his land and the defendant's land; the trees grew until the roots extended into and the branches overhung the defendant's land. The question is, whether the defendant is liable either in trespass on the freehold or in trover for picking, carrying away, and converting to his own use the apples growing on the branches overhanging his own land. Each party claims to be the sole owner of the fruit in question; the plaintiff upon the ground that he is the owner of the tree; the defendant upon the ground that the branches and the fruit thereon overhung his land, and that in virtue of his ownership of his land he owns everything above it.

Accord: James v. Tindall (1913, Del. Super.) 88 Atl. 1003: D. shot and killed sixteen turkeys belonging to P., which at the time were in D.'s field. D. claimed that the killing of the turkeys was justified, because they were on his property destroying grain. But, said Rice, J., delivering the opinion: "We think it was neither necessary nor justifiable to kill the turkeys in the protection of grain. The defendant might have impounded the turkeys or brought an action for damages to his property, if any, caused by the fowls."

It is true that whoever owns land owns above it to an indefinite height,—that is, he owns the space above, or rather has the right to appropriate it to his use, so that no one can lawfully obstruct it to his prejudice. But it is not true in all cases that the owner of land owns everything upon or above it, though placed there wrongfully by another. Certainly, in case one's personal property is wrongfully placed upon the land of another, the property in the thing is not thereby changed. The owner of the soil has his remedy by action for damages, and he may remove it; but he does not become the owner. If a man build a house on his own land, with the eaves and windows above the surface of the ground projecting over the land of the adjoining proprietor, he is liable to an action for damages, and generally, at least under some circumstances, the adjoining proprietor may remove the obstruction as a nuisance; but the material removed does not become his property. In order to justify the act of removal in such a case, he must allege that the obstruction was wrongfully encumbering his premises, and that he therefore removed it, doing no unnecessary damage. If it appear that he unnecessarily destroyed it, or appropriated it to his own use, the justification fails. This shows that the right of removal does not depend on ownership, but on his right to protect his own premises from invasion. The defendant therefore cannot be regarded as the owner of the apples merely because the branches on which they grew were wrongfully encumbering his ground. * * *

TURNER v. MEYMOTT.

Trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's house. At the trial before the Lord Chief Baron, it appeared that the plaintiff had been tenant of the house to the defendant, from week to week; that he had received a regular notice to quit, but omitted to deliver up pos-

[44] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point.

Compare Dubois v. Beaver (1862) 25 N. Y. 123, 82 Am. Dec. 326 (action in trespass for cutting down a tree which stood in the line of the division fence between the plaintiff's and the defendant's land).

session, whereupon the defendant, at a time when nobody was in the house, broke open the door with a crow-bar, and other forcible applications, and resumed possession. Some little furniture was still in the house. The Chief Baron having said that the law would not allow the defendant thus forcibly to reinstate himself, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, whereupon,

Taddy, Serjt., obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, and

Pell, Serjt., now shewed cause against the rule: The question is, whether when a tenant refuses to deliver possession after a regular notice to quit, the landlord may make a forcible re-entry: but it cannot be permitted he should take the law into his own hands, and do that by violence which is usually accomplished by an action of ejectment. It is contrary to the first principles of law, that he should become judge in his own cause, and substitute his own strength for the ordinary civil process. If there had been resistance, and death had ensued, the crime of murder would have been committed; and it makes no difference that nobody was in the house, for the defendant could not ascertain that till he entered, and the plaintiff might have come up while the violence was in progress. Some furniture being in the house, this was not a case of vacant possession. The statute of 11 Geo. II., which gives the landlord double value where the tenant holds over, shews what is the appropriate remedy in such cases; but that statute would be useless if the landlord might thus take the law into his own hands. It might be urged that if the landlord had proceeded irregularly he would be liable in an indictment for a forcible entry, but his subsequent liability would not justify the previous wrong. In Taunton v. Costar [45] the entry made by the landlord's putting his cattle on the ground was entirely peaceable, and to that there could be no objection; so that Lord Kenyon's observation, "that if he dispossessed the tenant with a strong hand, he would be liable for a forcible entry, but there could be no doubt of his right to enter on the land at the expiration of the term," was uncalled for by the case before him, and leads to the absurdity that, in certain cases, a landlord may enter, and yet he shall be punished for the entry.

Dallas, Ch. J. The high respect which I entertain for my Lord Chief Baron has alone made me hesitate a single moment, and even now, perhaps, as the cause is to go down to be tried again, I ought not to express an opinion. The question is, whether a landlord has a right to enter in the manner the defendant did under the circumstances of this case, in which the tenant held over after his right to possession had ceased, and the landlord's right to enter had accrued. It must be admitted he had a right to take possession in some way; the case of Taunton v. Costar [45] is in point to shew that he might [45] In Taunton v. Costar (1797) 7 T. R. 431, 4 R. R. 481, it appeared that a tenant from year to year, who was holding over after proper notice to quit, had distrained as damage feasant certain cattle which his landlord, after the expiration of the term, had peaceably put upon the premises.

enter peaceably, and that no ejectment was necessary. If he has used force, that is an offence of itself; but an offence against the public for which, if he has done wrong, he may be indicted.[46]

BURROUGH, J. I was once concerned at the Cockpit in a case similar to the present, where I used the same arguments as have now been urged by my brother Pell, but Lord Kenyon and Lord Alvanley, who were there, entertained no doubt, and said the landlord might enter. The rule for a new trial in this case must be made absolute.[47]

[46] The allusion is to the statute of 5 Rich. II, c. 7 (1381), the terms of which are given ante.

[47] In Beddall v. Maitland (1881) 17 Ch. Div. 174, 188, Fry, J., remarks as follows of this act of 1381 (5 Rich. II., c. 7), and its effect in England: "This statute creates one of the great differences which exist in our law between the being in possession and the being out of possession of land, and which gave rise to the old saying that possession is nine points of the law. The effect of the statute is this, that when a man is in possession he may use force to keep out a trespasser; but, if a trespasser has gained possession, the rightful owner cannot use force to put him out, but must appeal to the law for assistance. And the result of the cases appears to me to be this, that, inasmuch as the possession of the defendant was unlawful, he can recover no damages for the forcible entry of the plaintiff. He can recover no damages for the entry, because the possession was not legally his, and he can recover none for force used in the entry because, though the statute of Rich. II. creates a crime, it gives no civil remedy. But, in respect of independent wrongful acts which are done in the course of or after the forcible entry, a right of action does arise, because the person doing them cannot allege that the acts were lawful, unless justified by a lawful entry; and he cannot plead that he has a lawful possession. This, as it appears to me, is the result of the cases. The leading authority on the subject is Newton v. Harland (1840) 1 Scott, N. R. 474, a case in which a great difference of opinion was evinced between the learned Judges before whom it came. It was tried three times, first before Baron Parke, secondly before Baron Alderson, and thirdly before Mr. Justice Coltman, and came three times before the Court of Common Pleas in Banc, and it must, in my judgment, be taken as having settled the law on the subject. The action was brought to recover damages for an assault committed on the plaintiff's wife in the course of a forcible entry by the defendant into some apartments which had been occupied by the plaintiff as tenant to the defendant. The plaintiff remained in the apartments after the expiration of his term, and the defendant entered by force and turned out the plaintiff's wife and family, and in so doing assaulted the wife. The defendant pleaded that the acts were done in defence of his possession of the house, and the Court of Common Pleas held, contrary to the opinions of Baron Parke and Baron Alderson, that the defence failed, because the defendant's entry was unlawful. On the other hand, when the cause of action alleged is simply the eviction, no damages can be recovered. That is the result of Pollen v. Brewer (1859) 7 C. B. (N. S.) 371, and it is also clear from other cases. No doubt, in Harvey v. Brydges (1845) 14 M. & W. 437, Baron Parke and Baron Alderson expressed their disapproval of Newton v. Harland (1840) 1 Scott, N. R. 474, but they were the Judges who had tried that case, and whose opinions had been overruled by the Court in Banc. * * * I think that none of those cases in any way countervail Newton v. Harland (1840) 1 Scott, N. R. 474, which I take to have established this, that there is a good cause of action whenever in the course of a forcible entry there has been committed by the person who has entered forcibly an independent wrong, some act which can be justified only if he was in lawful possession. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that, in respect of his claim for damages for the forcible entry and eviction, the defendant cannot succeed, but that, in respect of his claim for damages for the injury done to his furniture, which the plaintiff could only justify by a lawful possession, the defendant is entitled to succeed."

The facts in Beddall v. Maitland which are material to the question may be Defendant's petition for a new trial.

TILLINGHAST, J. The only question raised by the exceptions taken to the rulings of the court in this case is, whether a landlord can forcibly eject a tenant from his premises, after the expiration of the tenancy, if the tenant holds possession, in good faith, under a color and reasonable claim of right. The defendant requested the court to charge the jury as follows, viz.:

First. "If the landlord enter and expel the occupant who wrongly holds a tenement, but uses no more force than is reasonably necessary to accomplish this, he will not be liable to an action of assault and battery, although, in order to effect such expulsion and removal, it becomes necessary to use so much force and violence as to subject him to an indictment at common law for a breach of the peace, or under the statute for making forcible entry."

Second. "If the plaintiff was in possession, but the rent was due more than fifteen days after demand, the plaintiff was a mere trespasser and could be expelled by the defendant."

These requests were refused by the court, and the following was charged in lieu thereof, viz.: "One in possession under a reasonable claim and color of right, honestly believing it, has a right to maintain his possession, and no personal violence can be used to expel him. * * * If Mrs. Baldwin was in possession under a claim of right, the defendant had no right to use any degree of personal force to expel plaintiff."

In explanation of its charge, and refusal to charge as requested, the court stated the law applicable to the case on trial to be as follows, viz.: "That an owner has the right to put an undoubted trespasser off his premises. But if one is out of possession of property held by summarized thus: P.'s lease of D.'s house had expired. D. had demanded possession, but P. still continued to occupy the house. In this state of things, D., accompanied by several men, came to the house to demand immediate possession. He was admitted without resistance at the front door and told P. what he had come for. After some conversation they went out of the house together to look at the stock in the nursery. When they were outside, P. suddenly ran back into the house, and locked the door, and refused to allow D. to re-enter. D., with the assistance of his men, forcibly broke down the back door. No further resistance was offered. D. and his men turned P. and his family out, and also put his furniture out of the house. P. claimed a right to recover damages for the forcible entry and eviction and also a right to recover for the damage done to the furniture.

See also, as to the English doctrine, 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 557–558 (1911): "Where the tenant fails to deliver up possession, the landlord is entitled to re-enter and take possession, subject only to certain statutory restrictions. Thus he can re-enter where the tenant has abandoned possession, or where he can effect the entry peaceably; and even if he enters forcibly, and is thus liable to criminal proceedings under the statutes, yet the tenant has no civil remedy against him in respect of the entry, though the tenant can recover damages for injury to himself, or his family, or his property in the course of the entry. If, however, the entry is peaceable, the landlord is not liable for damage to goods which are unlawfully on the premises."

another under a color and reasonable claim of right, he has no right to use personal violence to regain possession. Hence, if Mrs. Baldwin was in possession under a fair claim of right to remain a tenant, or under her husband's tenancy, on the ground that the defendant had money belonging to one of them in his possession, more than the amount of rent due, on account of which her occupation had been recognized, he had no right to use personal violence to eject her."

We think this was error. The question at issue, in so far as the tenancy in question was concerned, was, whether or not it had been terminated. If it had, the plaintiff was a mere trespasser, and the defendant had the right to use so much force as was reasonably necessary to expel her. If the tenancy had not been terminated, she was not a trespasser, and the defendant had no right to interfere with her. But the question as to whether Mrs. Baldwin was entitled to possession was a mere question of right, depending upon the fact as to whether the tenancy had been legally terminated, and not upon the belief of the tenant as to her right to remain. That is to say, the mere fact that a person honestly believes that he is lawfully in possession of a tenement or messuage does not prevent him from being a trespasser, and liable to be dealt with as such. Possession of real estate is either rightful or wrongful. And the right to the possession thereof, like the right of ownership, is to be determined solely by the evidence submitted, and the law applicable thereto, and is not dependent upon, or in any degree affected by, the belief of the claimant as to such right. If this were not so, it would be in the power of any one in the wrongful possession of real estate, who believes his possession to be rightful, to compel the person who is legally entitled to the possession thereof to resort to an action at law to recover the same, thus practically nullifying the right which the law confers upon the owner to take forcible possession by expelling the trespasser.

Nor do we see that the distinction made by the court, between "an undoubted trespasser" and one who holds possession "under a color and reasonable claim of right," changes the legal aspect of the case. Mrs. Baldwin was either a trespasser or she was not. If she was, neither her belief that she was not, nor the fact that she held "under a color and reasonable claim of right," was of any importance. The only question of importance concerning this branch of the case was, whether she was in fact a trespasser. And this was a question to be determined by the jury upon all the proof bearing upon that point.

The doctrine laid down by this court in Souter v. Codman, 14 R. I. 119, 51 Am. Rep. 364, and subsequently followed in Freeman v. Wilson, 16 R. I. 524, 17 Atl. 921, is in harmony with the current of both the American and English decisions as to the right of a landlord to use physical force in expelling a tenant whose term has expired; and we see no reason to overrule or modify the opinions therein expressed. See, also, 2 Taylor's Landlord and Tenant (8th Ed.) §§ 531, 532, and cases cited.

We are therefore of the opinion that the court erred in refusing the defendant's requests to charge, and in charging to the contrary, as above set forth.

Petition granted.

BLISS v. BANGE.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1826. 6 Conn. 78.)

This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, brought on the statute directing proceedings against forcible entry and detainer, demanding treble damages.

The declaration stated, that on the 9th of December, 1823, the plaintiff was in the actual and peaceable possession of the locus in quo, when the defendant, with force and strong hand, entered upon the same, and broke open divers doors of the plaintiff's barn thereon standing, and broke to pieces divers locks, staples and hinges of said doors, and ejected the plaintiff, and kept him from the possession, use and occupation of the premises, with other enormities; and that the plaintiff, on the same day, pursuant to the statute, prayed out a writ of forcible entry and detainer against the defendant, to recover possession of the premises; and that such writ being legally served and returned, a jury, legally empannelled, found, by their verdict, that the defendant did, by force and strong hand, enter upon the premises, and detain the same, which verdict was accepted by the court, who thereupon rendered judgment of restitution of the premises. The defendant in his plea, admitting that he had entered upon the premises, and done the acts complained of, attempted to justify such entry and the commission of such acts, by command, and as the servant of Alice Lawrence, in whom the freehold of the premises then was. This plea was traversed by the plaintiff; and the jury found the facts alleged in it to be true. The plaintiff then filed his motion, that judgment might be rendered in his favor veredicto non obstante; and the question arising on such motion, was reserved for the advice of this court.

DAGGETT, J. There can be no doubt but that this motion ought to prevail, if an action of trespass can be maintained, under the statute, where the plaintiff, being in possession, has been forcibly ejected from lands or tenements, by the true owner: because enough is admitted, on that supposition by this plea, to shew a clear cause of action. Does, then, the statute "directing proceedings against forcible entry and detainer," by the fifth section, give the plaintiff an action of trespass?

It is urged, by the counsel for the defendant, that the English statute, and that of the state of New York, are similar to that of Connecticut; and that their courts and commentators have established the contrary doctrine, declaring, that when it appears on trial, that the plaintiff had no title, an action of trespass cannot be sustained. I decline an examination of these positions, because in my judgment, our statute is perfectly unequivocal. It gives the action of trespass, in so many words, to the party aggrieved; and the party aggrieved is, by irresistible implication, the person forcibly ejected. The statute designedly excludes the examination and decision of the question of title, and, on principles of public policy, prohibits forcible entries and detainers, authorizes the process of restitution, and the action of trespass.

I am not at liberty to disobey a plain legislative enactment of ancient date, and carefully revised, as late as 1821, to which there is no constitutional objection. I would, therefore, advise the superior court, that judgment be entered up for the plaintiff; and that damages be assessed by that court.

The other Judges were of the same opinion.

Judgment for the plaintiff.[48]

[48] The arguments of counsel are omitted. On the owner's invasion of a possession without right, see 19 Cyc. 1132.

See, also, 24 Cyc. 1394 et seq., and Dec. Dig. Key-No. "Landlord and Tenant," § 277(3). Compare Domhoff v. Paul Stier, Inc. (1913) 157 App. Div. 204, 141 N. Y. Supp. 825: "Trespass is an injury to possession, and action therefor may be maintained by any one in actual possession of land (Holmes v. Seely [1838] 19 Wend. [N. Y.] 509; Van Brunt v. Schenck [1814] 11 Johns. [N. Y.] 377), and title is unnecessary (38 Cyc. 1004; Oglesby v. Stodghill [1857] 23 Ga. 590; Price v. Brown [1886] 101 N. Y. 669, 670, 5 N. E. 434). Whether plaintiff was a tenant or a subtenant, whether he was liable to be dispossessed for holding over after expiration of his term, or for failure to pay rent, he was in actual possession of at least a portion of the farm, and defendant had no right to regain possession of such premises by force and violence. Bristor v. Burr (1890) 120 N. Y. 427, 24 N. E. 937, 8 L. R. A. 710; Michaels v. Fishel (1902) 169 N. Y. 381, 389, 62 N. E. 425; Norton v. Arvernam Co. (1897) 14 App. Div. 581, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1099." Per Burr, J.

And see Judy v. Citizen (1884) 101 Ind. 18, 20: "The statute providing a remedy for a forcible entry was designed to protect persons in the actual peaceable possession of premises, under a claim of right, from forcible eviction or unlawful invasion, whether such claim might in the end turn out to be well founded or not. Cooley, Torts, 323. Where a person is thus in actual peaceable possession, and such possession is forcibly and violently invaded, even though it be by the owner, who in the end has the right of possession, such person is entitled to the remedy provided by this statute. In such case, proof of actual, exclusive, peaceable possession under a claim of right will support the 'right to possession,' and entitle the person evicted to restitution. 'Presumptively, a peaceable possession is always rightful.' Cooley, Torts, 326. If this is not the proper construction of the statute, then every tenant holding over, and every other person in actual possession, whose claim turns out not to be well founded, would be at the mercy of the landlord or other person having the better legal right, and might be expelled with whatever violence the owner might reasonably think fit to employ, thus substituting force and violence in the place of the orderly methods of the law. To prevent this was, as we have seen, the very purpose for which the forcible entry and detainer act was first enacted. Under this statute, the possession cannot be changed against the person who actually has it, under claim of right, without the intervention of legal procedure." Per Mitchell, J.

GREELEY v. SPRATT.

(Supreme Court of Florida, 1883. 19 Fla. 645.)

This was a proceeding by Spratt, under the statute relating to forcible entry and unlawful detainer. The plaintiff, praying for restitution and damages, alleged "that Jonathan C. Greeley hath forcibly turned him out of and unlawfully and against his consent withholds from him the possession of a certain room, to wit, the room in the three-story brick building situate in the city of Jacksonville in the said county in the southwest corner of Pine and Forsyth streets immediately to the right of the staircase leading to the third story of said building."

Spratt testified that he took possession of the room in question about the first day of July, 1880, as his own property, to be used as a law office, and put in his office furniture, and was there several weeks; that he left one evening, having locked the door; that he returned, the next morning, as usual, and found his office furniture out, and a colored man there, and a white man, Warriner, taking the lock from the door; that witness was denied permission to enter; that when he offered to open the door something was said by persons inside; that witness then said, "What does this mean?" and that from the words in reply, he understood that he could not come in without using force. The rental value of the room was about $15 a month. On cross-examination defendant's counsel, to show that Spratt was simply an intruder or trespasser, asked him, "By what means did you originally get possession of this room?" The question was objected to as immaterial, and the objection was sustained, to which ruling the defendant excepted. The judge charged the jury thus:

"The peaceable possession and the forcible entry are the questions at issue. The law forbids forcible entry, whether the party has title or not, and there can be no inquiry into the title of the property. If the party entering has right to the possession he must resort to the authority of law to obtain such possession. * * * If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff, on or about the first day of July, 1880, was in the possession of the room described in the complaint, using the same for his office, and that while so possessed the defendant Greeley, by himself or his agent, instructed for that purpose, and whether said Greeley was present or not, by the use of a skeleton key opened the door and entered said room in the night time, and in the absence of the plaintiff, and turned out of said room the office furniture of said room so belonging to the plaintiff, and resisted the said plaintiff the next morning by closing the door upon him, and kept possession of said room until and at the exhibition of this complaint, then the jury must find for the plaintiff."

Both these charges were excepted to by the defendant. There was a verdict for plaintiff in statutory form and damages assessed at $224. From a judgment upon this verdict the defendant appeals.

RANDALL, Ch. J.[49] * * * The third ground of error is the ruling of the court in excluding the question by what means the plaintiff obtained possession of the room, which question was asked for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff was an intruder or trespasser. The statute provides that no person shall enter into lands or tenements but in case where entry is given by law, nor shall any person, where entry is given by law, enter with a strong hand, but only in a peaceable, easy and open manner. If any person shall enter in case where entry is not given by law, or shall enter any lands or tenements with strong hand, even in case where entry is given by law, the person turned out or deprived of possession by such unlawful or forcible entry, by whatever right or estate he held or claimed such possession, shall at any time within three years be entitled to the summary remedy provided. Chap. 1630, Act of 1868. The complaint was made under the provisions of this act.

It is not pretended that the plaintiff was a loafer or a vagabond, intruding upon the house or premises of another in an unseemly or offensive manner, for the testimony shows that the plaintiff was peaceably occupying the room in question as a law office with his books and furniture when he was dispossessed by putting his property out in the night and forbidden to enter, and by force prevented from entering. The statute contemplates that a party so having peaceable possession shall not be thus forcibly ejected even where entry is given by law; that is, where the right to enter and possess has been determined by law, but only in a "peaceable and open manner." The right to enter, based upon a paramount title or interest, cannot be tried in this proceeding. * * *[50]

[50] Compare Schwinn v. Perkins (1910) 79 N. J. Law, 515, 78 Atl. 19, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 51, 21 Ann. Cas. 1223 ("There may be possession without occupancy, as where a man's servant is in the actual occupancy of the property, holding possession for him, or where a man has temporarily gone out of his house, leaving no one in charge, but still having legal possession; and there may be a case of occupancy without possession, as where, in a man's absence, a mere stranger, visitor, or trespasser goes into his house without claim of right." Per Swayze, J.); Hodgkins v. Price (1882) 132 Mass. 196, 198 ("The process is for the purpose of restoring one to a possession which has been kept from him by force. It is not a process against a party who resists the right of possession by force, but it is for an interference with an actual possession. The claim that this plaintiff was ever in possession of this estate is simply preposterous. He had no more possession of it than he would have had of one of the rooms of the building if he had gone into such room and said to the occupant of it: 'I have come to take possession of this room. Here I am, in possession; you will please to go out. I propose to hold this by force, and if you attempt to remove me by force, then the weaker of us on being ejected will bring an action of forcible entry and detainer against the other.' But to make this illustration precisely analogous, we will say that this party, instead of calling in at the place of business when the tenant was there, took the opportunity while he had gone to dinner to clamber through the transom-window over his door, and in the mode before suggested salute him upon his return. It would be a disgrace to the law, and to all concerned in the administration of it, to say that a possession thus forcibly obtained, before the business hours of the day, from one who is in the actual, peaceable occupation of the premises, is to be protected and restored by the law when the actual occupant shall resume his occupation." Per Lord, J.).

Compare, also, Page v. Dwight (1897) 170 Mass. 29, 48 N. E. 850, 39 L. R. A. 418: D. was entitled to possession of premises occupied by P. under pos-

That portion of the charge excepted to, viz.: "If the party entering has the right to the possession he must resort to the authority of law to obtain such possession," is alleged to be erroneous and misleading, because it would call upon the jury to find for the plaintiff although defendant did not enter by force. But the judge in the same paragraph charged the jury that "the peaceable possession and the forcible entry are the questions at issue." The proposition of the charge was that if the plaintiff was in peaceable possession the defendant could not resort to force to oust him except by process of law; that force without process tended to a breach of the peace. The statute itself says that no person shall invade the possession of another except where entry is given by law, and that in a peaceable, easy and open manner and without a strong hand.

We find no substantial objection to the charge of the court. It submitted the whole issue of fact to the jury upon the testimony and assumed nothing as to the facts.

There was testimony given by defendant which, by itself, would go to show that he had not directed Warriner to remove plaintiff or his goods from the premises. Yet Warriner was in defendant's service at the time, and he swears that every thing he did was by defendant's direction. The jury have decided as to the facts and the liability of the defendant for the acts of Warriner.

session lawfully obtained but unlawfully withheld; D. puts P. out by force. Held, that under the Massachusetts statute (Pub. St. c. 175) P. cannot recover possession. "Upon the whole," said Barker, J., "we think that the better view is that the legislature, after making a fresh trial of the ancient system under which a possession ended by force might be restored without regard to title or right of possession, thought it better to provide that those only who had a right of possession should be put in by the courts, and to leave to the criminal law the acts of one who, being entitled to possession, takes it by prohibited force."

The statute of 1381 (5 Rich. II., c. 7) and its supplementary acts have had a substantial survival in many states of the Union, either as part of their inheritance from the mother country or by statutory adoption. See 19 Cyc. 1114, and notes 26–30. On the effect of the enactment, however, the states are not at one. See 24 Cyc. 1394–1395, and notes 90–99, and the notes to Wilson v. Campbell (1907) in 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 426, and to Schwinn v. Perkins (1910) 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 51. "In this country," says Professor Burdick, "neither the statutes nor the decisions are uniform upon these points. Some states punish forcible entry and detainer as crimes, but do not give a civil action against one guilty of these offenses, if he was entitled to possession, either for trespass quare clausum fregit, or for damages to the wrongful occupant. But, in most jurisdictions, even the owner of land who is entitled to immediate possession is not allowed to take the law into his own hands, and gain possession by the exercise of force which amounts to a breach of the peace. If he acquires possession in that way, he may be compelled to restore it and pay damages for trespass upon the property, as well as for injuries inflicted upon the persons of the wrongful occupants who resist the wrongful entry. If, however, he can gain possession peaceably, he may resort to force to retain it, without being chargeable with wrongful detainer, and he may resort to force to eject a mere trespasser." Burdick on Torts, 222 (3d Ed., 1913).

(E) Lawful Arrest

(a) Under Judicial Process

And a difference was taken when a Court has jurisdiction of the cause, and proceeds inverso ordine or erroneously, there the party who sues, or the officer or minister of the Court who executes the precept or process of the Court, no action lies against them. But when the Court has not jurisdiction of the cause, there the whole proceeding is coram non judice, and actions will lie against them without any regard of the precept or process, and therefore the said rule cited by the other side, sc. "Qui jussu judicii aliquod fecerit (but when he has no jurisdiction, non est judex) non videtur dolo malo fecisse, quia parere necesse est," was well allowed, but it is not of necessity to obey him who is not Judge of the cause, no more than it is a mere stranger, for the rule is, "judicium a non suo judice datum nullius est momenti." And that fully appears in our books; and therefore in the case betwixt Bowser and Collins in 22 E. 4, 33, b. there Pigot says, if the Court has not power and authority, then their proceeding is coram non judice: as if the Court of Common Pleas holds plea in an appeal of death, robbery, or any other appeal, and the defendant is attainted, it is coram non judice quod omnes concesserunt. But if the Court of Common Pleas in a plea of debt awards a capias against a duke, earl, etc., which by the law doth not lie against them, and that appears in the writ itself; and if the sheriff arrests them by force of the capias, although the writ be against law, notwithstanding, inasmuch as the Court has jurisdiction of the cause, the sheriff is excused: and therewith agrees 38 H. 8, Dy. 60, b.

The Case of the Marshalsea (1613) 10 Co. Rep. 68b, 76b.

O'SHAUGNESSY v. BAXTER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1876. 121 Mass. 515.)

Gray, C. J. This is an action of tort against a constable of Boston for an assault and false imprisonment. The material facts of the case, as they appear from the statements in the report and the findings of the jury, are as follows: This plaintiff, whose real name is John O'Shaugnessy, was sued by the name of John Shaugnessy, a name by which he was commonly known, upon a promissory note signed by another person of that name, and not by himself. The person who made the writ knew that the plaintiff was not the person who signed the note, but intended to have the writ served upon him, and it was served upon him by another constable, and entered in the court having jurisdiction thereof, which rendered judgment, upon his default, for the plaintiff in that action, and issued execution accordingly, in due form of law. The execution, with the proper certificates, was delivered to this defendant, with instructions to take this plaintiff and commit him to jail. The defendant did so, in obedience to such instructions, and in good faith, after ascertaining that the original writ had been served upon the plaintiff, but knowing that he was not the person who signed the note upon which the action was brought.

On this state of facts, the plaintiff, being the party against whom the writ was intended to be made, and on whom it was actually served, was the party defendant therein, and the person against whom the judgment was rendered and the execution issued. Whatever remedies he might have to relieve him from the judgment and execution as obtained by fraud, or to recover damages against the person who fraudulently abused the process of the court, the officer, acting in good faith, had the right to rely for his protection upon the process put into his hands, and was not bound to go behind that process, and to assume the risk of determining the question whether the plaintiff really signed the note upon which the action was brought, or the truth of any extrinsic fact which would exempt him from being arrested or imprisoned upon the execution. Laroche v. Wasbrough, 2 T. R. 737, 739; Magnay v. Burt, 5 Q. B. 381; s. c. Dav. & Meriv. 652; Wilmarth v. Burt, 7 Metc. 257; Twitchell v. Shaw, 10 Cush. 46, 57 Am. Dec. 80; Underwood v. Robinson, 106 Mass. 296, and other cases there cited. In the words of Chief Justice Parker, "The difficulty in such cases is, to ascertain whether the judgment was or was not, in fact, rendered against the person who is taken in execution; for if it was, although the person was mistaken, yet the officer would be justified." Hallowell & Augusta Bank v. Howard, 14 Mass. 181, 183.

The fact that this plaintiff was commonly known by the name by which he was sued and arrested, distinguishes the case from those in which one man has been arrested upon a writ against another of a different name. See Cole v. Hindson, 6 T. R. 234; Finch v. Cocken, 5 Tyrwh. 774, 785; s. c. 3 Dowl. 678, 686; Griswold v. Sedgwick, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 126, 132; Langmaid v. Puffer, 7 Gray, 378.

Judgment on the verdict for the defendant.[51]

[51] Compare Whitten v. Bennett (1896 C. C.) 77 Fed. 271 (B., while state's attorney, drew an indictment charging P., together with S., with murder in the second degree. By mistake and clerical error, the indictment against P. was marked by the grand jury as "a true bill," although the grand jury knew that there was no case against P. and did not intend to indict him. B. knew of all this, and that there was no evidence against P., but nevertheless used the indictment to obtain a requisition against P., who was in another state, and sent D. to arrest him under the requisition. D. was instructed to bring P. with all speed, so as to prevent his obtaining a habeas corpus. The process under which D. acted in arresting P. was regular in form, and the record showed a proper indictment).

PIPER v. PEARSON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1854. 2 Gray, 120, 61 Am. Dec. 438).

Action of tort against a justice of the peace, residing in Dracut, for assault, battery and false imprisonment. Answer, that the plaintiff was imprisoned in the county jail, in due process of law, for a contempt of court.

At the trial, the plaintiff gave in evidence copies, certified by the defendant, of the following papers: A complaint made to the defendant, charging John Russ with an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors in Lowell, and a warrant issued thereon for the arrest of Russ; a mittimus issued by the defendant for the commitment of the plaintiff to prison for refusing to testify on the trial of said complaint before the defendant at Lowell, concerning sales of intoxicating liquors, made by Russ, and known to the witness; and a subsequent judgment of acquittal of Russ by the defendant. By St. 1848, c. 331, § 4, the exclusive jurisdiction of all crimes and offences committed within the district of Lowell is vested in the police court of Lowell.

The defendant relied, for his justification, on the record of the judgment; and contended that no sufficient proof had been adduced to show that his acts were without jurisdiction and void. But Metcalf, J., ruled that the record and mittimus constituted no defence. And to this ruling the defendant, being found guilty, alleged exceptions.

BIGELOW, J. The decision of this case depends on the familiar and well settled rule concerning the liability of courts and magistrates exercising an inferior and limited jurisdiction, for acts done by them, or by their authority, under color of legal proceedings.

One of the leading purposes of every wise system of law is to secure a fearless and impartial administration of justice, and at the same time to guard individuals against a wanton and oppressive abuse of legal authority. To attain this end, the common law affords to all inferior tribunals and magistrates complete protection in the discharge of their official functions, so long as they act within the scope of their jurisdiction, however false and erroneous may be the conclusions and judgments at which they arrive. But on the other hand, if they act without any jurisdiction over the subject matter; or if, having cognizance of a cause, they are guilty of an excess of jurisdiction; they are liable in damages to the party injured by such unauthorized acts. In all cases therefore where the cause of action against a judicial officer, exercising only a special and limited authority, is founded on his acts done colore officii, the single inquiry is whether he has acted without any jurisdiction over the subject matter, or has been guilty of an excess of jurisdiction. By this simple test, his legal liability will at once be determined. 1 Chit. Pl. (6th Am. Ed.) 90, 209–213; Beaurain v. Scott, 3 Campb. 388; Ackerley v. Parkinson, 3 M. & S. 425, 428; Borden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 121, 8 Am. Dec. 225; Bigelow v. Stearns, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 39, 10 Am. Dec. 189; Allen v. Gray, 11 Conn. 95. If a magistrate acts beyond the limits of his jurisdiction, his proceedings are deemed to be coram non judice and void; and if he attempts to enforce any process founded on any judgment, sentence or conviction in such case, he thereby becomes a trespasser. 1 Chit. Pl. 210; Bigelow v. Stearns, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 39, 10 Am. Dec. 189. (See Clarke v. May, 2 Gray, 410, 61 Am. Dec. 470.)

These well settled principles leave no room for question as to the liability of the defendant in this action. As a justice of the peace for the county of Middlesex, he had no jurisdiction whatever to try the complaint against Russ. It was for an offence committed "within the district of Lowell," of which the police court of the city of Lowell had exclusive jurisdiction by St. 1848, c. 331, § 4, and which the justice of said court was legally competent to try and determine. Commonwealth v. Emery, 11 Cush. 406, 412. The defendant therefore acted wholly without legal authority, and can show no legal justification under any judicial record.

It was urged on the part of the defendant, that he had authority to punish the plaintiff for contempt, although he had no jurisdiction to try the principal case before him. But the answer to this suggestion is obvious. The power to punish for contempt is only incidental to the more general and comprehensive authority conferred on a magistrate, by which he is empowered to exercise important judicial functions. It is to enable him to try and determine causes without molestation, and protect himself from indignity and insult, that the law gives him authority to punish such disorderly conduct as may interrupt judicial proceedings before him or be a contempt of his authority or person. Rev. St. 1836, c. 85, § 33. But it is only when he is in the proper exercise of his judicial functions, that this power can be exercised. If he has no jurisdiction of a cause, he cannot sit as a magistrate to try it, and is entitled to no protection while acting beyond the sphere of his judicial power. His action is then extra-judicial and void. His power and authority are commensurate only with his jurisdiction. If he cannot try the case, he cannot exercise a power which is only auxiliary and incidental. There can be no contempt, technically speaking, where there is no authority. In the case at bar, the defendant had no more power to entertain jurisdiction of the complaint against Russ than any other individual in the community. Although he acted through mistake, it was nevertheless a usurpation. The plaintiff therefore could not have been guilty of contempt toward the defendant in his capacity as a magistrate, while trying a cause of which he had no jurisdiction; and the commitment therefor was unauthorized and void.

It was suggested by the counsel for the defendant, that there was nothing in the case from which it could be properly inferred that the offence with which Russ was charged was actually committed in the city of Lowell; and that as the defendant, by virtue of his authority as a justice of the peace, had cognizance of offences committed elsewhere in the county of Middlesex, which he might well hear and determine in the city of Lowell, the presumption was that he was acting rightfully, till the contrary was shown. But there are two decisive answers to this argument. In the first place, the record on its face sets out an offence committed in the city of Lowell. That being a district set apart by statute, in which the police court has exclusive jurisdiction of criminal offences usually cognizable by magistrates, and the offence being charged as having been committed in Lowell, the record legally imports that it was committed there. 1 Stark. Crim. Pl. (2d Ed.) 62; Bac. Ab. Indictment, G, 4.

But in the next place, it was for the defendant to show a complete justification for the alleged trespass; if the record left it doubtful whether he had jurisdiction of the offence, it would not avail as a defence to the action. There is a marked distinction in this respect between courts of general jurisdiction and inferior tribunals having only a special or limited jurisdiction. In the former case, the presumption of law is that they had jurisdiction, until the contrary is shown; but with regard to inferior courts and magistrates, it is for them, when claiming any right or exemption under their proceedings, to show affirmatively that they acted within the limits of their jurisdiction. Peacock v. Bell, 1 Saund. 74, and notes; Mills v. Martin, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 33, 34. The record in the present case prima facie shows a want of jurisdiction in the defendant.

Exceptions overruled.

SUMNER v. BEELER.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1875. 50 Ind. 341, 19 Am. Rep. 718.)

Action to recover damages for an illegal arrest, on charge of being found drunk, under the ninth section of the Baxter bill of 1873. The defendants answered in justification under the ninth section of this law. A demurrer for want of facts was sustained, and this ruling is assigned for error.

PETTIT, C. J. This section has been held to be unconstitutional, or, in other words, that it is not law. State v. Young, 47 Ind. 150. No question in law is better settled, and this is admitted by the counsel for the appellants in their brief, than that ministerial officers and other persons are liable for acts done under an act of the legislature which is unconstitutional and void. All persons are presumed to know the law, and if they act under an unconstitutional enactment of the legislature, they do so at their peril, and must take the consequences.

There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to this paragraph of the answer.[52]

GIFFORD v. WIGGINS.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1892. 50 Minn. 401, 52 N. W. 904, 18 L. R. A. 356.)

Action for false imprisonment. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

MITCHELL, J. The material allegations of the complaint may be summarized as follows:

The defendant made a complaint under oath to a justice of the peace in the village of Wilmar that plaintiff had violated the provisions of an ordinance of that village prohibiting peddling any goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles not manufactured or grown within the county of Kandiyohi without first having obtained a license therefor, and praying that the plaintiff might be arrested and dealt with according to law; that upon this complaint the justice issued a warrant, upon which the plaintiff was arrested and tried, and, upon the testimony of the defendant, adjudged guilty of a violation of the ordinance; that plaintiff was thereupon committed to jail, and there imprisoned until discharged on a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that the ordinance in question was unconstitutional and void. There is no allegation that the complaint was made maliciously and without probable cause; hence the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action for malicious prosecution.

If the complaint states a cause of action at all, it must be for false imprisonment. It is not alleged that defendant participated or took part in plaintiff's arrest, or officiously interfered therewith by giving orders or directions to the officers or otherwise. It is true that in the complaint to the justice he prayed that the plaintiff might be arrested and dealt with according to law, but this is what is done, impliedly at least, in every case where a complaint is made to a magistrate or court charging any person with a violation of public law. The allegation that the plaintiff was convicted on the testimony of the defendant adds nothing to the complaint. By testifying as witness, certainly defendant did nothing that rendered him liable unless he testified false-

[52] Accord: Barling v. West (1871) 29 Wis. 307, 9 Am. Rep. 576; Campbell v. Sherman (1874) 35 Wis. 103, 110: "How can it be expected, it is asked, that a mere ministerial officer could decide such a question, and then find out that his process was void for want of jurisdiction in the court which issued it? The maxim ignorantia juris non excusat—ignorance of the law, which every man is presumed to know, does not afford excuse—in its application to human affairs frequently operates harshly; and yet it is manifest that if ignorance of the law were a ground of exemption, the administration of justice would be arrested, and society could not exist." Per Cole, J.

For modifications and limitations of this principle, see Brooks v. Mangan (1891) 86 Mich. 576, 49 N. W. 633, 24 Am. St. Rep. 137; Trammell v. Russellville (1879) 34 Ark. 105, 36 Am. Rep. 1; Tillman v. Beard (1899) 121 Mich. 475, 80 N. W. 218, 46 L. R. A. 215; Bohri v. Barnett (1906) 144 Fed. 389, 75 C. C. A. 327.

ly, which is not charged. It is alleged that the confinement of plaintiff was "on account and by reason of the procurement and direction of the defendant," but, in the absence of any allegations of specific facts, this must be construed as having reference to the act of making the complaint upon which the warrant was issued. It is also alleged that this confinement was wrongfully, maliciously, and unlawfully procured by defendant, and that said confinement was without probable cause; but this has reference to and is qualified by what immediately follows, to wit: "In this, that said ordinance was and is wholly void and unconstitutional." Hence, after stripping the complaint of all mere verbiage, we have a case where all that it is alleged that defendant did was to lay before the justice the complaint upon which the justice issued the warrant on which the plaintiff was arrested; and the sole ground upon which defendant is claimed to be liable is that the ordinance under which the proceedings were instituted was void. There is no doubt of the invalidity of the ordinance as "class legislation," for we have not yet arrived at the point where it is permissible to protect "home industries" under the guise of an exercise of the police power. It is to be observed that the object of this prosecution was not the enforcement of any private right of the defendant. He did not make the complaint on his own account, or for his own private benefit. The complaint was for an alleged violation of public law, in which he represented, not himself, but the public,—an important distinction, which courts have sometimes overlooked, and which counsel for plaintiff seems to have failed to notice in the citation of cases. It seems to be settled by an almost unbroken line of authorities that if a person merely lays a criminal complaint before a magistrate in a matter over which the magistrate has a general jurisdiction, and the magistrate issues a warrant upon which the person charged is arrested, the party laying the complaint is not liable for an assault and false imprisonment, although the particular case may be one in which the magistrate had no jurisdiction. The law on this subject was as well stated as anywhere by Lord Abinger in West v. Smallwood, 3 Mees. & W. 417, as follows: "Where a magistrate has a general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and a party comes before him and prefers a complaint, upon which the magistrate makes a mistake in thinking it a case within his authority, and grants a warrant which is not justifiable in point of law, the party complaining is not liable as a trespasser, but the only remedy against him is by an action upon the case if he has acted maliciously." See, also, Leigh v. Webb, 3 Esp. 165; Carratt v. Morley, 1 Q. B. 18; Murphy v. Walters, 34 Mich. 180; Von Latham v. Libby, 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 339; Barker v. Stetson, 7 Gray (Mass.) 53, 66 Am. Dec. 457; Langford v. Railway Co., 144 Mass. 431, 11 N. E. 697; Teal v. Fissel (C. C.) 28 Fed. 351. This rule has been frequently applied where the facts stated in the complaint did not constitute a public offense, and it can make no difference in principle whether this is because the facts stated do not bring the case within a valid statute, or because the statute under which the proceedings were instituted is invalid. In either case, the acts charged constitute no offense, because there is no law making them such. Barker v. Stetson, supra, was a case of the latter class.

The present case comes fully within the rule. The justice had a general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, to wit, prosecutions for the violations of village ordinances. The defendant merely stated the case to the magistrate in a complaint, without, so far as appears, bad faith or malice. The magistrate erred in thinking that the ordinance was valid, and that it was therefore a case within his authority, and issued a warrant which was not justifiable in point of law, and the plaintiff was arrested. Under such a state of facts the complainant is not liable. Under any other doctrine a person would never feel safe in making complaint of the commission of a public offense until the validity of the statute creating the offense had been passed upon by the court of last resort. Order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McLEAN.

McLean was convicted in the circuit court of the county of Mackinac of resisting an officer, and sentenced to state prison for two years. He prosecuted error.

CHAMPLIN, J. * * * It appears from the testimony returned in the bill of exceptions that on the night of the twenty-third of August, 1887, L. J. Monteith was sheriff of Mackinac county, and Peter A. Paquin was under-sheriff; that about 10 o'clock in the evening of that day, Justice Rutherford handed the sheriff a warrant for assault and battery against McLean in front of Rutherford's office; that Peter A. Paquin was then present, and the sheriff told him to get into a hack, and go up to what was known as "Red Annie's," a house of ill fame, by the road, and arrest McLean if he found him there; that he would take another direction by the railroad track, and go to another house of ill fame, and search for McLean there; that the sheriff had the warrant with him, and that Paquin had no warrant; that these houses of ill fame were about 80 rods apart; that he and the under-sheriff separated, the sheriff going up the railroad track, and the under-sheriff going in a hack in another direction.

Paquin arrived at "Red Annie's," found the door open, and a number of persons in the room. He saw McLean in there and went in, and laid his hand on McLean's shoulder and said: "McLean, I want you. I have got a warrant for you; you are my prisoner." McLean then pulled a revolver from his right-hand coat pocket, and pointed it at Paquin's head, and said: "Get out, you ——— ——— ———, or I will blow your brains out."

Paquin did not know whether the revolver was cocked or loaded, but he backed out of the door, McLean following him with the revolver, pointed at him, saying: "Get out; get out; get out of the house, or I will kill you."

About five minutes after he got out he heard the report of a revolver, but who fired it he did not know. He started to find the sheriff, and met him coming a short distance from the house. He did not tell McLean that he was an officer, and had no uniform or badge of office on. He had no personal acquaintance with McLean, and had never talked with him before that night. He did not know at the time he attempted to make the arrest where the sheriff was, only the sheriff had told him where he was going. * * *

The question whether an arrest can be made without warrant has been decided from time to time according to the various circumstances of each particular case, many of which may be found in 2 Hale, P. C. 72–105. The principles recognized in the cases are:

1. Any person may arrest another who is actually committing, or has actually committed, a felony.

2. He may arrest any person whom he suspects on reasonable grounds to have committed a felony, if one has actually been committed.

3. Any constable or sheriff may arrest any person whom he suspects, on reasonable grounds, of having committed a felony, whether in fact a felony has been actually committed or not.

The common law never allowed the arrest of persons, who were either guilty of or suspected of having committed misdemeanors, without a warrant issued by lawful authority, except in cases of actual breach of the peace committed in the presence of the officer, while the person was taken in the act, or immediately after its commission. This exception was made, not to bring the offender to justice, but in order to preserve the peace, which by the common law was regarded as of utmost consequence.

McLean was charged simply with a misdemeanor, and he could not be arrested for the crime after the commission of the act, without a proper warrant. The warrant was issued and delivered to the sheriff. The sheriff is authorized to take such assistance with him in making an arrest as he may deem necessary, and the warrant in his possession while present and pursuing his object will be a justification to his assistants in making the arrest. But he has no authority to send an under-sheriff or deputy to one place to make an arrest without a warrant, while he goes to another for the same purpose with the warrant. He cannot send his deputy into one town or county while he gives pursuit in another. Under the ancient practice of hue and cry, before warrants were issued, this might be done in the pursuit of felons, but no hue and cry could be raised for a misdemeanor.

We think it clear that in cases of misdemeanors the sheriff must be present either in sight or hearing, directing the arrest, to justify a person not armed with the warrant to make the arrest. Such was not the case here. The under-sheriff had no warrant in his possession when he attempted to arrest McLean, and although acting under the orders of the sheriff, given before they separated, to search different places, the sheriff was not in such proximity nor did he have such immediate control of the action of the under-sheriff, as justified the court or jury in saying that the warrant was in the possession or control of the under-sheriff, or that it conferred upon him any authority to make the arrest. A warrant for a misdemeanor cannot lawfully be held by two officers at once, when they are not together. The case is fully covered in the opinion of Mr. Justice Campbell in Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 184 et seq. Upon this point there was no disagreement between the members of the court, although they were divided upon the question whether the offense charged was felony, and therefore authorized an arrest without warrant.

We think the judgment should be reversed, and prisoner discharged.[53]

HOLROYD v. DONCASTER.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1826. 3 Bing. 492, 130 Reprint, 603, 28 R. R. 672.)

This was an action of trespass for false imprisonment, tried before Bayley, J., last York Assizes. The declaration was in the usual form. A constable, who had made the arrest of which the plaintiff complained, stated that he had arrested the plaintiff under a warrant which he had received from another person, and that when about to execute it, the defendant desired him to make haste. It was also proved, that the defendant had admitted in conversation that he had sent the plaintiff to prison. But no warrant was produced in evidence. The plaintiff's counsel, however, having opened the case as an arrest upon an illegal warrant, it was objected on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff ought to produce the warrant. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff, with liberty for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiff ought to have produced the warrant.

Wilde, Serjt., accordingly moved for a rule to this effect, on the ground that the plaintiff ought to have produced the warrant which was the cause of his action; also, that it sufficiently appeared from the defendant's admission, that the plaintiff had been apprehended under a warrant, and that, therefore, the action ought to have been conceived in case and not in trespass. Morgan v. Hughes, 2 T. R. 225; Stonehouse v. Elliot, 6 T. R. 315, 3 R. R. 183.

A rule nisi was granted and Wilde was this day heard in support of it. But

[53] Part of the opinion is omitted.

THE COURT were clearly of opinion that the warrant not having been produced, there was no legitimate evidence on which it could be presumed that it had ever issued, or that the action ought, in consequence, to have been case; and that, with respect to the production of the warrant, it was equally clear that a party who took upon himself to imprison another was prima facie guilty of a trespass, the onus of justifying which rested entirely with himself.

Rule discharged.

WILLIAMS v. JONES et al.

(Court of King's Bench, 1736. Cas. t. Hard. 298, 95 Reprint, 193.)

Trespass for an assault, battery and imprisonment of the plaintiff. The defendants justify for that the defendant Jones sued out a capias ad respondendum against the plaintiff, out of the Court of Common Pleas, directed to and delivered to the Sheriffs of London; whereupon the sheriff issued a warrant to the defendant Chamberlain, one of the serjeants of mace, who by virtue thereof arrested the plaintiff, and detained him in custody for six hours, at the request of defendant Jones, who was plaintiff in the said writ, which is the same trespass and assault, etc. to which plea the plaintiff demurred generally. * * *

LORD HARDWICKE, C. J. The question is, whether a battery of the plaintiff can be justified by shewing an arrest by lawful process; and upon consideration of the cases, we are of opinion that a battery cannot be justified by shewing an arrest barely; but that in order to make it good, something further should be shewn: as, that defendant gently laid his hands in order to arrest; and did arrest him; as in the case of Patrick and Johnson, 3 Lev. 403; though that way of pleading has been doubted of: or else that the plaintiff made resistance, and was going to rescue himself, and by reason of that he beat him to take him. There is no case in all the books, that says, that a battery may be justified, barely by shewing an arrest. * * *

As to what has been said, that every arrest admits a battery, because it cannot be without laying on of hands, and every laying on of hands is so; that is a mistake in the case of Genner and Sparkes, which was cited to warrant that distinction, which it does not do; for the question there was, whether there had been a rescue, and the Court held that there had not, because there had been no arrest, for the officer had not touched the defendant; and to be sure in that case there was no arrest, for the party was neither touched nor confined. But it does not follow that an arrest cannot be made without touching the person: for if a bailiff comes into a room and tells the defendant he arrests him, and locks the door, that is an arrest, for he is in custody of the officer. But, supposing there was a laying on of hands in the present case, every laying on of hands is not a battery; for the party's intention must be considered: for people will sometimes by way of joke, or in friendship, clap a man on the back; and it would be ridiculous to say, that in every such case, a man must justify, and may not plead not guilty. The case of Wilson and Dodd, 2 Roll. Abr. 543, is directly in point, that a molliter manus is not a battery. That case indeed favours Lutwyche's opinion, that a molliter manus is not a justification, because it does not admit a battery: therefore as the arrest is not a battery, this is not a sufficient justification.

PER CURIAM. Judgment for plaintiff.[54]

(b) ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT

HENNESSY v. CONNOLLY.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1878. 13 Hun, 173.)

TALCOTT, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendant, rendered on a verdict at the Oswego Circuit, and from an order of the Special Term denying a new trial. The action was for assault and battery and false imprisonment. The defendant was a policeman of the city of Oswego, and arrested the plaintiff on view and without warrant, on the charge of violating an ordinance of the city, which is as follows, viz.:

"Section 8. The bridge across the Oswego river in this city, on the line of Bridge street, shall be kept and reserved free from all obstructions, and all groups and assemblages of persons thereon at any time are strictly prohibited. No person or persons shall sit or stand on said bridge or any railing thereof or occupy the same so as in any manner to obstruct the free passage thereof, or to hinder, molest or annoy any person in passing along the same; and no person shall peddle any fruits, nuts or other articles or things thereon. Whoever shall violate any provision of this section shall forfeit a penalty of five dollars for each and every offense."

By the charter of the city of Oswego, title 3, section 8 (Sess. Laws of 1860, ch. 463), the penalty for a violation of such an ordinance is to be collected before a justice of the peace, or other court, and the first process may be by civil warrant or summons. The justice at the circuit instructed the jury that the plaintiff was violating a city ordinance in regard to the bridge, and if he did not desist at the command of the officer then the officer had a right to arrest him without any process.

We find nothing, and are referred to no section in the charter of the city of Oswego, providing that a policeman may arrest without warrant and simply on view, for the violation of a city ordinance. It is not like the charter of Syracuse, which was examined by this court in this respect in Butolph v. Blust, 5 Lans. 84; and it was found in that charter the power was expressly conferred on a policeman of the city to arrest, detain and take before the police justice, any person whom he shall find committing a violation of any ordinance of the city.

Admitting the obstruction of the bridge to have been a misdemeanor, the policeman had no authority to arrest the defendant unless such misdemeanor was accompanied by a breach of the peace at common law. Butolph v. Blust, supra. There was some evidence tending to show a breach of the peace by the plaintiff, preliminary to the arrest, and that the conduct of the plaintiff was reprehensible in the extreme, but the difficulty with the charge excepted to is, that it was not in any manner qualified; and the jury was instructed generally that if the plaintiff was violating a city ordinance and did not desist on demand, the policeman had a right to arrest him without warrant.

It may be that a policeman should have authority to arrest without warrant, and on view, any person engaged in the violation of a city ordinance, and we presume this authority is conferred by most city charters, but it is a matter which rests with the legislature, and until the power is conferred, an arrest by a constable without warrant, in case of a misdemeanor, can only take place where it is accompanied by a breach of the peace. 1 Chitty's Crim. Law, 13; Carpenter v. Mills, 29 How. Prac. 473.

For the reason that the jury, under the instruction given them, cannot be deemed to have found a breach of the peace, the judgment and order denying a new trial must be reversed.

STATE v. HUNTER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina, 1890. 106 N. C. 796, 11 S. E. 366, 8 L. R. A. 529.)

This was an indictment for false imprisonment. The defendant, a policeman of the city of Asheville, had arrested one Bennett for alleged violation of a city ordinance in the following words:

"Whenever three or more persons obstruct the sidewalk, it shall be the duty of the officer to courteously request them to move on, and, if such persons unreasonably persist in remaining, so as to incommode others passing, he shall take them to the station house."

The defendant testified that Bennett and four or five others were standing on the sidewalk when other people were passing, that the latter had to step on the curbing to get around them, that when defendant requested Bennett and his companions to move on, all left except Bennett, who refused, a third time, to go, and that the defendant then arrested Bennett, and took him to the station house. From a verdict of guilty, the defendant appealed.

AVERY, J. In the case of State v. Freeman, 86 N. C. 683, the court distinctly recognized the right of a police officer to arrest without warrant, not only for felonies, riots, and breaches of the peace, but for violation of a city or town by-law prohibiting nuisances, and which the municipality has the power to make, when the offense is committed in his presence. The Code (section 3820) makes it a misdemeanor to violate any valid city or town ordinance. * * *

The second ordinance relied upon for the protection of the officer, rule 15, is clearly in violation of the Constitution (article 1, §§ 12, 13, 17), in providing that a person may be arrested because he refuses to "move on," and, in the opinion of the officer, who is left to judge of his conduct, "unreasonably persists in remaining, so as to incommode others passing," and can be taken, without warrant or hearing, to the station house. Under this law, he may be deprived of his liberty, and sent to a dungeon, not only without trial, but without even a preliminary examination, or an opportunity to give bail for his appearance at an investigation to be had in future, because, in the opinion of a policeman, he consumes an unreasonable time in exchanging greetings with two friends whom he meets upon the sidewalk of the city. * * *

The charter of the city (chapter 111, §§ 25, 27, 59 Priv. Laws 1883) gave the city marshal the powers, as a peace officer, of the sheriff or constables of the county of Buncombe, and to both the marshal and a policeman the authority to make arrests "(1) whenever he shall have in his hands a warrant duly issued by the mayor of the city of Asheville or a justice of the peace of the county of Buncombe; * * * (3) whenever a misdemeanor or violation of any ordinance has been committed, and he has reasonable cause to believe that the suspected party may make his escape before a warrant can be obtained." The power to arrest without warrant is, in express terms, confined to two classes of cases,—where he sees an offense committed; or where he knows it has been committed and has reasonable ground to apprehend an escape. The latter provision enlarges his authority beyond that of a sheriff or constable, but upon condition that the ordinance has certainly been violated. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (volume 1, § 211), says: "Charters authorizing municipal officers to make arrests upon view, and without process, are to be viewed in connection with the general statutes of the state, and, being in derogation of liberty, are strictly construed." Pesterfield v. Vickers, 3 Cold. (Tenn.) 205; White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550. In the exercise of the extraordinary power given him by the charter, it was the duty of the defendant, before he touched the person of the prosecutor and demanded a surrender of his liberty, to know that the misdemeanor had been committed, either from seeing, or from such information as made him willing to incur the risk of indictment, or of being mulcted in damages, if no ordinance had been violated. The question of good faith on the part of the policeman comes to his aid when he is resisted in making an arrest that he has an undoubted right to make, if there be resistance, and the question arise whether excessive force was used to overcome it; but policemen of Asheville must determine at their peril, preliminary to proceeding without warrant, whether a valid ordinance has been violated within or out of their view. The principle recognized in the cases of State v. McNinch, 90 N. C. 695, and State v. Pugh, 101 N. C. 737, 7 S. E. 757, 9 Am. St. Rep. 44, was never intended to apply in any case except where an officer is making a lawful arrest. * * *

We conclude that, according to the defendant's own evidence, he was guilty; and, therefore, though the judge may have failed to state the law correctly in submitting to the jury the whole case, still the defendant is not entitled to a new trial if he was guilty in the aspect of the testimony most favorable to himself, and founded upon the conception that his own statement was true. The judgment must be affirmed.[55]

DAVIS, J., dissenting.

COOK v. HASTINGS.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1907. 150 Mich. 289, 114 N. W. 71, 14 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1123, 13 Ann. Cas. 194.)

The action was by Cook against Hastings and two others. The judgment below was in favor of the defendants; the plaintiff brings error.

CARPENTER, J. The three defendants are each members of the police force of the city of Detroit. December 6, 1904, between 8 and 9 p. m., defendant Hastings arrested plaintiff on Columbia street, in said city of Detroit. Hastings was looking for a man who had been exposing his person to women and children, and—stating the facts most favorably to defendants—he believed and had reason to believe plaintiff to be that man. The arrest was made because of that belief, and because plaintiff refused to state his name or his business, and gave a false explanation (perhaps it was a false explanation) for waiting on the street behind a tree where Hastings discovered him. After the arrest, Hastings placed plaintiff in a patrol wagon of which defendants Stock and McDermott were in charge, and carried him to the Central Police Station, and the undisputed evidence compels the inference that while in the wagon plaintiff was in the joint custody of the three defendants. Soon after the patrol wagon reached the Central Station, plaintiff was given his liberty. He brought this suit to recover damages for false imprisonment. It was tried in the circuit court before a jury. The trial judge directed a verdict in favor of defendants Stock and McDermott, and submitted to them the question of defendant Hastings' liability, and they returned a verdict in his favor.

The law governing this case is elementary. Except for a breach of the peace committed in his presence, or when he has a reasonable ground to believe that the person arrested is a felon or is about to commit a felony, a police officer has no authority to arrest without a warrant. In this case there was not only no reasonable ground to believe, but there was not even a suspicion, that plaintiff was a felon or was about to commit a felony. (For the offense of which he was suspected was not a felony.) It is equally clear that refusal to make any explanation to the police officer was not a breach of the peace. Klein v. Pollard, 149 Mich 200, 112 N. W. 717, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1008, 119 Am. St. Rep. 670. The arrest was therefore illegal, and the trial court should have directed a verdict against defendant Hastings. The liability of the other defendants, legally speaking, is equally clear. During his conveyance in the patrol wagon, plaintiff was just as much in their custody as he was in Hastings'. It is then quite correct to say that they assisted defendant Hastings in depriving plaintiff of his liberty. It is true they rendered this assistance, not by actually laying their hands on plaintiff, but by a voluntary display of force which was intended to and did deprive him of his liberty. The law governing this question is correctly stated in a note, 12 A. & E. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 777 (citing Griffin v. Coleman, 4 H. & N. 265), as follows: "If an arrest by a constable is in its inception wrongful, all other constables who act and assist in the continuance of the wrongful imprisonment are responsible for the entire damage thereby caused to the plaintiff, although they had no knowledge of the unlawfulness of the imprisonment and intended to act in the strict discharge of their official duties." The trial court should have directed a verdict for plaintiff against all the defendants.

Defendants' counsel urge that under the law declared in this opinion police officers will sometimes be compelled either to neglect their duty of preserving order—a duty they owe to the public—or to make unlawful arrests, and it is also urged that that alternative was presented in this case. If so, they must either neglect that duty or accept the risk of being held liable for the consequences, for if they are sued, the court will pass judgment on their conduct in accordance, not with the judge's notion of justice, but in accordance with a law which condemns. It is not for the judge presiding over the court to determine whether or not he will apply that law. He has no choice. He did not make the law, and he cannot change it. That law is as obligatory on him as it is on the humblest suitor who ever appeared in his court. He is bound to apply it in determining controversies.

The argument under consideration is in reality an appeal for a change of the law. It should have been addressed, not to a court, but to some other tribunal—a tribunal having authority to change the law.[56]

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

TIMOTHY v. SIMPSON.

(Court of Exchequer, 1835. 1 Cr., M. & R. 757, 40 R. R. 722.)

PARKE, B. This was an action of trespass and false imprisonment, tried before me at the sittings after Trinity Term last, at Guildhall. The declaration was for an assault and false imprisonment; to which there was a plea of not guilty, and a special plea of justification, on the ground that the plaintiff was guilty of a breach of the peace in the defendant's dwelling-house, and that he thereupon gave him in charge to a policeman, who was not averred to have had view of the breach of the peace. To this special plea there was a replication of de injuria sua propria absque tali causa. On the trial, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff on the general issue, and for the defendant on the special plea, as I was of opinion that the material parts of it were proved; but, as it appeared to me that the plea was bad in law, I directed the jury to assess the damages on the general issue, and I also gave the plaintiff permission to move to enter a verdict for him on the special plea, if the Court should be of opinion that it was not substantially proved. A rule nisi having been obtained to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, or judgment non obstante veredicto, the case was fully argued before my Brothers Bolland, Alderson, Gurney, and myself, last Term. We have since considered the case, and are of opinion that the rule ought not to be made absolute, but that there should be a new trial, unless the parties will consent to enter a stet processus.

The facts of the case, as to which there was little or rather no contradictory evidence, may be very shortly stated. The defendant was a linen-draper; the plaintiff was passing his shop, and, seeing an article in the window, with a ticket apparently attached to it, denoting a low price, sent his companion in to buy it; the shopman refused, and demanded a larger price; the plaintiff went in himself and required the article at the lower rate. The shopman still insisted on a greater price; the plaintiff called it "an imposition." Some of the shopmen desired him to go out of the shop in a somewhat offensive manner; he refused to go without the article at the price he bid for it; the shopmen pushed him out. Before they did so, he declared he would strike any one who laid hands on him. One of the shopmen, really supposing, or pretending to suppose, this to be a challenge to fight, stepped out and struck the plaintiff in the face, near the shop door; the plaintiff went back into the shop and returned the blow, and a contest commenced, in which the other shopmen took a part, and fell on the plaintiff. There was a great noise in the shop, so that the business could not go on—many persons were there, and others about the street door. The noise brought down the defendant, who was sitting in the room above. When he came down he found the shop in disorder, and the plaintiff on the ground struggling and scuffling with the shopmen; and this scuffle continued in the defendant's presence for two or three minutes. The defendant sent for a policeman, who soon afterwards came; in the meantime the plaintiff was taken hold of by two of the shopmen, who, however, relinquished their hold before the policeman came; and, on his arrival, the plaintiff was requested by the defendant to go from the shop quietly; but he refused, unless he first obtained his hat, which he had lost in the scuffle. He was standing still in the shop insisting on his right to remain there, and a mob gathering round the door; when the defendant gave him in charge to the policeman, who took him to the police station. The defendant followed; but, on the recommendation of the constable at the station, the charge was dropped.

[56] Accord: Hardy v. Murphy (1795) 1 Esp. 294 (P. and S. were talking loudly in the street, and refused to be quiet when so ordered by D., a watchman, who thereupon took them to the station house); Booth v. Hanley (1826) 2 C. & P. 288 (D., a policeman, arrests P., who, in a public street, was "turning to the wall for a particular purpose"); Wooding v. Oxley (1839) 9 C. & P. 1 (P. arrested for disturbing a public meeting); Palmer v. Maine Cent. R. Co. (1899) 92 Me. 125, 42 Atl. 800, 44 L. R. A. 673, 69 Am. St. Rep. 513 (the conductor of the defendant railway company caused the plaintiff to be arrested by a constable without a warrant, on the ground that plaintiff had fraudulently evaded the payment of his fare); Kurtz v. Moffitt (1885), 115 U. S. 487, 6 Sup. Ct. 148, 29 L. Ed. 458 (a deserter from the Federal army was arrested by a state police officer without a warrant).

Upon these facts the plaintiff appears to have been, in the first instance, a trespasser, by refusing to quit the shop when requested, and so to have been the cause of the affray which subsequently took place; but the first act of unlawful violence and breach of the peace was committed by the shopman; that led to a conflict, in which there were mutual acts of violence clearly amounting to an affray, the latter part of which took place in the defendant's presence; and the plaintiff was on the spot on which the breach of the peace occurred, persisting in remaining there under such circumstances as to make it probable that the breach of the peace would be renewed, when he was delivered by the defendant to the police officer in the very place where the affray had happened.

The first question which arises upon these facts is, whether the defendant had a right to arrest and deliver the plaintiff to a constable, the police officer having, by the stat. 10 Geo. IV. c. 44, § 4, the same powers as a constable has at common law. It is not necessary for us to decide in the present case whether a private individual, who has seen an affray committed, may give in charge to a constable who has not, and such constable may thereupon take into his custody the affrayers, or either of them, in order to be carried before a justice, after the affray has entirely ceased, after the offenders have quitted the place where it was committed, and there is no danger of its renewal. * * * Here the defendant, who had immediately before witnessed an affray, gave one of the affrayers in charge to the constable on the very spot where it was committed, and whilst there was a reasonable apprehension of its continuance; and we are of opinion that he was justified in so doing, though the constable had seen no part of the affray. It is unquestionable that any bystander may and ought to interfere to part those who make an affray, and to stay those who are going to join in it till the affray be ended. It is also clearly laid down that he may arrest the affrayers, and detain them until the heat be over, and then deliver them to a constable. Lambard, in his Eirenarcha, chap. 3, p. 130, says: "Any man also may stay the affrayers until the storm of their heat be calmed, and then may he deliver them over to a constable to imprison them till they find surety for the peace; but he himself may not commit them to prison, unless the one of them be in peril of death by some hurt, for then may any man carry the other to the goal till it be known, whether he, so hurt, will live or die, as appeareth by the stat. 3 Hen. VII. c. 1." In Hawk. P. C. book 1, c. 63, § 11, it is said, that it seems agreed that any one who sees others fighting may lawfully part them, and also stay them until the heat be over, and then deliver them to the constable, who may carry them before a justice of the peace, in order to their finding sureties for the peace; and pleas founded upon this rule, and signed by Mr. Justice Buller, are to be found in 9 Went. Plead. 344, 345; and De Grey, Ch. J., on the trial, held the justification to be good. It is clear, therefore, that any person present may arrest the affrayer at the moment of the affray, and detain him till his passion has cooled, and his desire to break the peace has ceased, and then deliver him to a peace officer. And, if that be so, what reason can there be why he may not arrest an affrayer after the actual violence is over, but whilst he shews a disposition to renew it, by persisting in remaining on the spot where he has committed it? Both cases fall within the same principle, which is that, for the sake of the preservation of the peace, any individual who sees it broken may restrain the liberty of him whom he sees breaking it, so long as his conduct shews that the public peace is likely to be endangered by his acts. * * * For these reasons we are of opinion that the defendant was, upon the facts in evidence, justified in delivering the plaintiff to the police officer.

This brings me to the second question, whether the plea upon the record was substantially proved. I thought upon the trial that it was, but, upon further consideration, I concur with the rest of the Court in thinking that it was not. The plea was as follows:

"And the defendant says, that before and at the said time when, etc., the said defendant was lawfully possessed of a certain dwelling-house in the city of London, and the said defendant being so possessed thereof, the said plaintiff just before the said time when &c. entered and came into the said dwelling-house, and then and there, with force and arms, made a great noise, disturbance, and affray therein, and then and there insulted, abused, and ill-treated the defendant and his servants in the said dwelling-house, and greatly disturbed and disquieted them in the peaceable and quiet possession of the said dwelling-house, in breach of the peace of our said lord the King; whereupon the defendant then and there requested the plaintiff to cease his noise and disturbance, and to depart from and out of the said house, which the plaintiff then and there wholly refused to do, and continued in the said house, making the said noise, disturbance, and affray therein; whereupon the defendant, in order to preserve the peace and restore good order and tranquility in the said house, then and there gave charge of the plaintiff to a certain policeman of the city of London, and then and there requested the said policeman to take the plaintiff into his custody, to be dealt with according to law; and the said policeman, so being such policeman as aforesaid, at such request of the defendant, then and there gently laid his hands on the plaintiff for the cause aforesaid, and did then and there take the plaintiff into his custody."

The replication puts in issue all the allegations constituting the ground of the arrest, and of these it is not necessary to prove all. It is enough to establish so many of them as would justify the arrest. It is not enough to prove facts which justify the imprisonment, it is necessary to prove such of the facts alleged as would do so. The allegations which were proved were the entry into the defendant's house, the assault on his servants, the disturbance of the defendant in his possession of the house, by an affray in it, in which the plaintiff bore a part, just before the time of the arrest, and that the defendant gave the plaintiff in charge in order to preserve the public peace; but the fact of an assault on the plaintiff himself was not proved, and that is the only breach of the peace which in the plea appears by necessary implication to have been committed in the defendant's presence; for in none of the other alleged facts is the defendant's presence inserted or necessarily implied before the moment of actual interference. The disturbance of the defendant in the possession of his dwelling-house might have occurred by an entry in his absence, and therefore that averment does not by necessary implication affect the defendant's presence. If so, the substance of this plea, that is, so many of the allegations in it as constituted a defence, was not proved, as the assault on the defendant himself was not proved. For this reason we think that the proof failed; but, as this is a case in which an amendment would have been allowed by virtue of the late statute, as it is clear upon the facts that there was a defence, on the ground of the defendant's right to arrest for a breach of the peace in his presence, and as the declaration of my opinion, that the plea was substantially proved, at the time, probably prevented an application to amend, we think that there should be a new trial, when, or before which, the plea may be amended. And as ultimately there will be a verdict for the defendant, if the same evidence is adduced, the best course will be for the parties to agree to enter a sfet processus.[57]

Rule accordingly.

DERECOURT v. CORBISHLEY.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1855. 5 El. & Bl. 188, 119 Reprint, 451.)

Declaration for assaulting and beating defendant, and giving him into custody to a policeman, and causing him to be imprisoned at a police station. There was a plea that

Before the committing, etc., one John Watkins was lawfully possessed of a messuage, situate within the city of London police district: and, being so possessed, the plaintiff, with force and arms, and with a strong hand, into the said messuage unlawfully, violently and forcibly did enter and, from the possession of the said messuage, with a strong hand, unlawfully, violently and forcibly did expel and amove the said J. W., against the peace, etc.; and the plaintiff committed the said breach of the peace in the presence of one of the officers of the city of London police, and a peace officer and constable of our lady the queen, and who then and there had view of the said breach of the peace which was committed within the city of London police district. And thereupon defendant gave plaintiff in charge of the said police officer for the said offence, and directed him to take him into custody and convey him before one of the city of London police magistrates to answer for the said offence; and the said police officer, accordingly, in pursuance of the said charge, gently laid his hands on the plaintiff, and took him into custody; and, for the purpose of conveying him before a city of London police magistrate, conveyed him in custody to, and imprisoned him for a short and reasonable time at, the said police station, doing no more than in duty he was bound to do; and which are the trespasses and acts complained of.

To the plea there was a demurrer.

ERLE, J. I also think that the plea is good. The action is for trespass and false imprisonment: I think there is a good confession and avoidance. The defendant says he did call upon the constable to arrest the plaintiff; so there is a good confession. Then the avoidance is, that the plaintiff committed a breach of the peace in the sight of the constable, and thereupon the defendant directed the constable to arrest him; that, I think, is a good avoidance. The argument for the plaintiff is, that the breach of the peace might have been over before the arrest took place; but the plea uses the word "thereupon," which I understand to mean the same as "then and there." Then was the defendant wrong in directing the constable to do his duty against the plaintiff? I think it very important to hold that he was right. On the plea, as we must understand it, the plaintiff has been shewn to be dealt with according to law. No right, therefore, has been violated. It has been pressed upon us that, although the constable might have a right to arrest, the defendant had no right to direct him to do so. It may very often happen that bystanders may see a constable passing by a breach of the peace with perfect indifference, and may think it right to take up the matter and direct the constable to do his duty. I should be very unwilling to hold, and I never heard that it has been holden, that in such a case a bystander may not set the constable in motion.

Judgment for defendant.[58]

BAYNES v. BREWSTER.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1841. 2 Q. B. 375, 114 Reprint, 149, 57 R. R. 707.)

Trespass for assault and false imprisonment. The defendant pleaded first, not guilty, and secondly, that the plaintiff on a certain night, notwithstanding the defendant's request that he cease and depart, knocked and rapped on the back door of defendant's dwelling house and was threatening the defendant to continue making the said noise and disturbance until defendant should deliver to plaintiff a certain book, then in the possession of the defendant; that the plaintiff having continued to make said noise and disturbance for two hours, the defendant then sent to one James Chatters, then being the constable of the parish, for the purpose of arresting and taking plaintiff into custody, and thereby preventing him further disturbing and annoying defendant and his family as aforesaid; and plaintiff, having ascertained that he was about to be given into custody by defendant, ceased the said knocking and rapping at the back door of the said dwelling house, but which he had violently, wrongfully, and illegally continued up to that period, and then and there ran and escaped off and from the said premises of the defendant; when defendant, accompanied by certain persons who had been called to the aid and assistance of the said James Chatters, so being such constable as aforesaid, immediately followed and pursued plaintiff, and overtook him in a certain close near to the said dwelling house of the defendant; whereupon defendant, in order to preserve the peace and to prevent the said plaintiff from continuing to disturb the good order and tranquillity of the said dwelling house of the defendant, and to hinder and prevent plaintiff from continuing to make said noise and disturbance at the said dwelling house of defendant during the whole night, then gave charge of plaintiff to said James Chatters, then and there being such constable as aforesaid, and then requested the said James Chatters, so being such, etc., to take plaintiff into his custody, and carry him before some justice or justices of our said lady the queen, assigned, etc., to answer the premises, and to be dealt with according to law.

Issue was taken on this second plea, and at the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff on the general issue and for the defendant on the second plea. Afterwards a rule nisi was obtained for judgment non obstante veredicto.[59]

[58] The concurring opinions of Lord Campbell, C. J., and Coleridge, J., are omitted.

[59] The statement of facts has been abridged. Part of the opinion of Coleridge, J., and the concurring opinions of Lord Denman, C. J., and Williams, J., are omitted.

COLERIDGE, J. * * * The plaintiff quitted the premises when he ascertained that the constable was coming. The plea does indeed allege that the defendant gave the plaintiff into custody in order to prevent a continuance of the breach of the peace: but it is not averred that the plaintiff, after quitting the premises, either threatened or intended to continue the breach of the peace. The plea, therefore, contains nothing equivalent to an allegation that another breach of the peace was about to be committed. The question is simply whether, after a breach of the peace is over, a constable who has not seen it may take up the party without warrant. Then it is contended that after verdict we must infer all the facts necessary to support the verdict. But the plea here contains nothing of which proof might not have been given without evidence of circumstances necessary to complete a good defence.

WIGHTMAN, J. The plaintiff is entitled to our judgment on the question, whether or not the defendant, when he caused the imprisonment, was justified in so doing. The point is perfectly clear. The authorities are collected in Timothy v. Simpson [1835] 1 Cr., M. & R. 757. * * *[60]

The defendant here fails to bring his case within that principle. On the contrary the plaintiff only threatened at first to continue the disturbance; but, when he heard the officer was coming, ran away. There is nothing to show that, after he ran away, he either insisted on remaining, or intended to do so. It would be going a very great length indeed to hold that the subsequent apprehension upon a pursuit under such circumstances, without warrant, was justifiable.

Rule absolute.

BALTIMORE & O. R. CO. v. CAIN.

Action by Cain against the railway company for false imprisonment in having plaintiff arrested on a charge of disorderly conduct, on one of defendant's trains. From a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant appealed.

It appeared in the evidence that on a Sunday morning the plaintiff and three companions drove to a camp meeting at Washington Grove and shortly thereafter took passage on the defendant's train for Washington City, entering the ladies' car. There was evidence also, that, after these men entered the ladies' car, they cursed and swore and drank liquor openly, and that one of them was smoking; that the conductor expostulated with them, and urged them to be quiet or to go into the smoking car, where they could drink and smoke as much as they pleased; that they said they had paid their fares, and would ride where it suited them.

McSherry, J. * * * The conductor again appealed to them to be orderly, or he would be obliged to put them off the car; whereupon the plaintiff replied: "If you put him off (meaning Watkins, who was smoking), you will have to go too." It was further proved that numerous complaints were made by ladies and gentlemen about the conduct of these four men, and that one lady left the car, and went into the forward car. Afterwards other ladies who got on the train at other stations were put in the forward car, because it was not fit for them to enter the one where the men were. The conductor did not undertake to put them off, because he did not believe himself able to cope with these four intoxicated and lawless men. Just before the train arrived in Washington, the plaintiff was still behaving in a disorderly manner, and using profane language, in the hearing of the passengers on the same car. There were between 50 and 60 passengers on the train, most of whom were on their way to church in Washington. Finding himself unable to control these men or to suppress their disorder, and feeling powerless to eject them because of their threatened resistance, the conductor telegraphed from Forest Grove to Washington for an officer to arrest them, and, when the train drew up in the depot in that city, the policeman was there, and the conductor pointed out to him the plaintiff; and the officer then and there arrested the plaintiff, and took him to the station house.

With these facts before the jury, there were two prayers presented by the plaintiff, both of which were granted; and there were nine presented by the defendant, all of which, except the sixth, were rejected. The view we take of the case dispenses with a separate consideration of each of these prayers, inasmuch as the defendant's fifth prayer raises the crucial inquiry contained in the record; and what we shall say in discussing that prayer will, with a few brief additional observations, dispose of most, if not all, of the others. The fifth prayer maintains that, if the plaintiff was riotous and disorderly, the conductor had the right to eject him; that, if the conductor was unable to do this by reason of the threat of resistance, then the conductor was justified in requesting the first police officer whom he could find to arrest the plaintiff and it proceeds:

"If the jury further find that the police officer at the Washington depot was the first police officer the conductor saw, and that the conductor used due diligence in procuring a police officer, and that the conductor directed the police officer to arrest the plaintiff for said disorderly conduct, that the defendant is not liable for this arrest, and the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant."

From this prayer, considered in connection with the evidence to which allusion has been made, it is obvious at a glance that the predominant and controlling question before us involves the legality of the conceded arrest made in the city of Washington. Under the undisputed proof, that arrest was made without a warrant having been first procured. It was not made for an alleged felony, nor for a misdemeanor or breach of the peace, committed within view of the officer who took the plaintiff into custody, but, if the evidence of the defendant's witnesses be credited, it was made for a flagrant breach of the peace, which began at Washington Grove, and continued into Washington City, on the morning train of the defendant, and was made at the instance of the conductor, the very moment he reached a place where he could deliver these intoxicated offenders into the custody of a police officer. Was the arrest so made illegal?

It is settled that an officer has the right to arrest without a warrant for any crime committed within his view. It was his duty to do so at the common law, and this is still the law (Roddy v. Finnegan, 43 Md. 504; Phillips v. Trull, 11 Johns. [N. Y.] 486; Derecourt v. Corbishley, 5 El. & Bl. 188); and in cases of felony he may arrest upon information, without warrant, where he has reasonable cause (Rex v. Birnie, 1 Moody & R. 160; Rohan v. Sawin, 5 Cush. [Mass.] 281). And so any person, although not an officer, in whose view a felony is committed, may arrest the offender. Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 213. But the right of a person not an officer to make an arrest is not confined to cases of felony for he may take into custody, without a warrant, one who in his presence is guilty of an affray or a breach of the peace. Knot v. Gay, 1 Root (Conn.) 66. "It seems agreed that any one who sees others fighting may lawfully part them, and also stay them till the heat be over, and then deliver them to the constable, who may carry them before a justice of the peace, in order to their finding sureties for the peace." 1 Russ. Crimes, 272; 1 Archb. Cr. Prac. & Pl. 82; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 63, §§ 11, 17; 2 Hale, P. C. 90; East, P. C. 306; Timothy v. Simpson, 1 Cromp., M. & R. 757. * * *

Now, if it be true that the plaintiff was guilty of the reprehensible and disorderly conduct attributed to him by the witnesses, he was incontestably engaged in a flagrant and an outrageous breach of the peace, as pronounced as if there had been an actual affray during the whole time he was in the defendant's car; and it was clearly lawful, under these conditions, for the conductor to expel him and his drunken companions from the train if he had a sufficient force to overcome their threatened resistance, or else to arrest them all without warrant, and then deliver them to the first peace officer he could procure within a reasonable time. If this were not so, then, as said by Lord Chief Justice Denman in Webster v. Watts [11 Q. B. 311], "the peace of all the world would be in jeopardy." And it would be in jeopardy, because if, in such and similar instances, no arrest could be lawfully made without a warrant, the culprit, "if transient and unknown, would escape altogether," before a warrant could be obtained (Mitchell v. Lemon, 34 Md. 181), and there would soon cease to be any order or any security or protection afforded the public on swiftly-moving railroad trains, or even elsewhere, unless a peace officer were constantly present. The delay necessarily incident to obtaining a warrant would be in many, if not in most, cases of this and a kindred character equivalent to an absolute immunity from arrest and punishment; and, should the name of the offender be unknown, he, most probably, would never be apprehended if once suffered to depart. The law is not so impotent and ineffective as that.

Being physically unable to expel these alleged riotous persons from the train, the conductor telegraphed for a peace officer, and without delay, and while the plaintiff was still drunk, caused his arrest the instant the officer thus summoned came in view of the plaintiff. If, then, any bystander could, in the language of Baron Parke, "for the sake of the preservation of the peace, * * * restrain the liberty of him whom he sees breaking" the peace, the act of the conductor in telegraphing for the policeman, and within a short space of time thereafter handing the plaintiff over to the officer, was in no respect different from a formal arrest of the plaintiff by the conductor, in the midst of the riot and disorder, and the prompt delivery of him afterwards to the officer. If the plaintiff was not in fact arrested by the conductor because of the presence of superior resisting force, that fact cannot make the subsequent act of the conductor in pointing out the plaintiff to the officer wrongful or illegal. The charge, according to the plaintiff's own testimony, was sustained. A fine was imposed, and he paid it. The accusation was therefore well founded, and what was done by the conductor, if the facts testified to by the defendant's witnesses be credited, was undeniably lawful, under all the circumstances. If this be so, then there is obviously no cause of action against the defendant, because no wrong has been done to the plaintiff. This is the theory of the defendant's fifth prayer. That prayer, being correct in principle and proper in form, ought to have been granted. For the same reasons, the second, third, fourth, and seventh prayers should have been granted.

The eighth was properly rejected. It makes the right to arrest depend on the fact that, while on the train, the plaintiff was charged by the conductor with being disorderly, whereas the right to arrest depended on the fact that the plaintiff was in reality disorderly. His having been charged by the conductor with being disorderly is quite a different thing from his having been in fact disorderly. The ninth prayer was properly rejected. It failed to submit to the jury that the arrest was made for the alleged breach of the peace. Though the arrest had been made without an assigned cause, the prayer exonerated the defendant.

The plaintiff's first prayer ought to have been rejected. Its fallacy lies in the postulate that an arrest for a breach of the peace, committed out of the view of a peace officer, necessarily could not be legally made without a warrant. * * *

HANDCOCK v. BAKER et al.

Trespass for breaking the plaintiff's dwelling-house and assaulting him therein, and dragging him out of bed, and forcing him without clothes out of his house along the public street, and beating and imprisoning him without cause. Two of the defendants suffered judgment by default; and the other two pleaded, 1st, not guilty; 2ndly, as follows:

That the plaintiff, in the said dwelling-house, broke the peace and assaulted his wife, and purposed to have feloniously killed and slain her, and was on the point of so doing: and that her life being in great danger she cried murder and called for assistance; whereupon the defendants, for the preservation of the peace, and to prevent the plaintiff from so killing and slaying his wife, and committing the said felony, endeavoured to enter by the door, and knocked thereat; and because the same was fastened, and there was reason to presume that the wife's life could not have been otherwise preserved than by immediately breaking open the door and entering the said dwelling-house, and they could not otherwise obtain possession, they did for that purpose break and enter the said dwelling-house, and somewhat break, etc., doing as little damage as possible, and gently laid hands on the plaintiff, and prevented him from further assaulting and feloniously killing and slaying his said wife; and for the same purpose and also for that of taking and delivering the plaintiff to a constable, to be by him taken before a justice, and dealt with according to law, kept and detained him a short and reasonable time in that behalf, and because he had not then proper and reasonable clothes on him, took their hands off from him, and permitted him to enter a bed-chamber, and to remain there a reasonable time, that he might put on such clothes, which he might have done; and because he did not nor would so do, but wholly refused and went into bed there, and remained there at the end of such reasonable time, and would not quit the same, although thereto requested, the defendants for the same purposes as they so kept and detained the plaintiff as above mentioned, there being then no reasonable ground for presuming that he had changed his purpose of further assaulting and feloniously slaying his said wife, entered the bed-chamber in order for these purposes to take him therefrom, whereupon the plaintiff assaulted and would have beat the said defendants if they had not defended themselves, which they did, and if any damage happened to the plaintiff it was occasioned by his own assault, and the defendants for the purpose in that behalf aforesaid, gently laid hands upon the plaintiff and took him from the bed and out of the dwelling house along the public streets for a reasonable time, and kept and detained him for a short and reasonable time for those purposes, till they could find a constable, and as soon as they could find a constable delivered him to the constable for the purpose in that behalf aforesaid.

On the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff on the general issue, and for the defendants on the special justification. At the following term a rule nisi was obtained calling on the defendants to show cause why judgment in their favor on the special justification should not be arrested and a verdict entered for the plaintiff on the general issue, with 1s. damages.

LORD ELDON, Ch. J. * * * In this case the plaintiff being about to commit a felony by killing and slaying his wife, the defendants interfered by breaking and entering the house in order to prevent the execution of that intent; and "for the same purposes," that is, with a view to prevent the plaintiff from killing and slaying his wife, they afterwards committed the injury complained of in the bed-room, into which they had permitted him to enter in order to put on necessary clothes. It is stated that there was no reasonable ground for presuming that the plaintiff had changed his purpose; and it is argued that it ought to have been averred that his purpose actually continued: but if the preceding allegation be true, that the defendants entered the bed-room for the same purpose for which they had previously entered the house, the latter allegation was unnecessary; since the averment that it was for the same purposes sufficiently brought the question before the jury, Whether or not the defendants (entered) into the bed-chamber and detained the plaintiff for the purpose of preventing him from killing and slaying his wife? It is not difficult to conceive that under some circumstances it might be more especially the defendants' duty to interfere in that manner. Suppose A. endeavour to lay hold of B. who is in pursuit of C. with an intent to kill him, and B. thereupon ceases to pursue with a view of effecting his purpose with more cunning, the act of ceasing to run, so far from being evidence of an intention to desist from his purpose, might afford strong evidence of an intention to prosecute it with more effect; in which case the detention of B. would be justified. In this case the jury were competent to consider whether under all the circumstances of the case, including the presence or absence of the wife, the plaintiff got into bed with a view of more effectually executing his intent to kill his wife. In fact the jury have found that the defendants kept and detained the plaintiff after he had gone into the bed-room for the same purpose for which they kept and detained him before. With respect to the averment which has been supposed to be necessary, it is sufficient to answer, that after verdict it must be presumed that every thing is proved which is necessary to support the verdict; and the jury have found that it was necessary for the preservation of the woman's life that the defendants should do what they did.

HEATH, J. I am of the same opinion. It is a matter of the last consequence that it should be known upon what occasions by-standers may interfere to prevent felony. In the riots which took place in the year 1780, this matter was much misunderstood, and a general persuasion prevailed that no indifferent person could interpose without the authority of the magistrate; in consequence of which much mischief was done, which might otherwise have been prevented. In this case the defendants broke and entered the plaintiff's house in order to prevent the commission of murder, and that seems to have been admitted to be a good justification. The only dispute therefore turns on the propriety of their conduct towards the plaintiff after they had suffered him to go into the bed-room. Now I think that enough is stated in the justification to support the verdict, since the jury have thought that the conduct of the defendants was right. After verdict we may suppose anything. We may suppose that the plaintiff's passion continued, and that he again declared that he would kill his wife.

BECKWITH v. PHILBY et al.

(Court of King's Bench, 1827. 6 Barn. & C. 635, 108 Reprint, 585, 30 R. R. 484.)

This was an action for assaulting, beating, handcuffing, and imprisoning the plaintiff, and keeping and detaining him handcuffed and imprisoned, without any reasonable or probable cause for forty-eight hours, on a false and pretended charge of felony. At the trial the following appeared to be the facts of the case:

The plaintiff was a blacksmith residing at Waltham Cross, in the county of Hertford. The defendant Philby was high constable of Ongar in Essex, and resided at Loughton, in that county. The defendants Wilks and Spicer were constables of that parish. The plaintiff, on the 31st of January, 1826, with a bridle and saddle on his back, was returning from Romford market, where he had sold a pony for £7. 10 s., and about half past six in the evening sat down to rest himself near Loughton Bridge. While he was sitting there, one Gould, a farmer resident in the neighborhood, passed him. Gould told Philby the circumstance, and said he thought he ought to look after the man. Philby went out and asked the plaintiff several questions, to which he gave such answers as induced Philby to think he had been stealing a horse, or was about to do so. The plaintiff was searched, and was again asked by Philby where he came from; the plaintiff then said that he had come from Cheshunt, and had been to Romford to sell a horse, that his name was Beckwith, and he had got the horse of one Bartlett. He then referred Philby to one Noble, who lived in the neighbourhood. No inquiry was made by Philby of Noble that night. Philby then sent for the defendant Wilks, to take the plaintiff to the watch-house, and on Wilks' arrival desired him to handcuff the plaintiff, which was done. Wilks took him, at his own request, to a public-house at Loughton, and he remained there handcuffed during the night. On the following morning Wilks delivered the plaintiff to the custody of Spicer, who took him to a magistrate, who examined him, and said he thought it his duty to detain him, but that if there was anybody near who would be bound for his appearance, he might go home to his family. Noble became bound for the plaintiff's appearance, and he was then discharged. Philby was present at this examination. On inquiry at Cheshunt it appeared that the plaintiff had bought a horse of Bartlett, as he had stated, and nothing subsequently appeared against his character. No horse had been stolen in or near Loughton on the day, or for some days before the plaintiff was apprehended, but within the preceding month many had been stolen.

Shepherd and Williams, Serjts., arguing against the rule, cited 9 Edw. IV., 26 b, Bro. Ab. tit. Trespass, pl. 184, where to trespass for assault and imprisonment the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was lying in wait in the highway to rob the king's subjects, that one Alice was riding on the same highway, against whom the plaintiff drew his sword and commanded her to deliver her purse, whereupon she levied hue and cry, that the defendant was riding there and heard the cry, and returned and took the plaintiff, and because there were no stocks in the vill he carried him to S. and there delivered him to the constable; and the plea was held good by the whole Court, and Moile said, If one say to me, "See this man, I will certainly kill him," in this case I may hold him so that he do not kill the man, and this holding is no imprisonment.

For the plaintiff it was contended, that as there was no charge of felony made, nor any felony committed, the defendant Philby was not justified in making the arrest in the first instance, and still less were he and the other defendants justified in detaining the plaintiff during the night. The learned Judge was of opinion that the arrest and detention were lawful, provided the defendants had reasonable cause to suspect that the plaintiff had committed a felony, and he directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendants, if they thought upon the whole evidence that the defendants had reasonable cause for suspecting the plaintiff of felony. A verdict was found for the defendants, but liberty was reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for nominal damages, if the Court should be of opinion that the arrest and detention were unlawful.

Gurney now moved to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for nominal damages, on the ground that a constable had no authority without a warrant to apprehend a person unless there was a charge of felony made by a third person, or unless a felony had been committed. A constable acting on his own suspicion, places himself in the situation of a private person. The latter cannot lawfully arrest another unless a felony has actually been committed, and then it must be on his own suspicion, and not on report or suspicion of another. When a felony has been committed by some one, a constable may, upon the information of others, lawfully apprehend a supposed offender, without any knowledge of the circumstances on which a suspicion is founded. But if he act without having information from others, and on his own suspicion, then he, in the same manner as a private individual, must be liable to an action if it afterwards appear that no felony has been committed.

Lord Tenterden, C. J. I am of opinion that there is no ground for disturbing the verdict. Whether there was any reasonable cause for suspecting that the plaintiff had committed a felony, or was about to commit one, or whether he had been detained in custody an unreasonable time, were questions of fact for the jury, which they have decided against the plaintiff, and in my judgment most correctly. The only question of law in the case is, whether a constable having reasonable cause to suspect that a person has committed a felony, may detain such person until he can be brought before a justice of the peace to have his conduct investigated. There is this distinction between a private individual and a constable; in order to justify the former in causing the imprisonment of a person, he must not only make out a reasonable ground of suspicion, but he must prove that a felony has actually been committed; whereas a constable having reasonable ground to suspect that a felony has been committed, is authorized to detain the party suspected until inquiry can be made by the proper authorities. Now in this case it is quite clear upon the evidence, and the jury have so found, that the conduct of the plaintiff had given the defendants just cause for suspecting that he either had committed, or was about to commit a felony, and the jury having so found, I am of opinion that the action was not maintainable.

WALTERS v. W. H. SMITH & SON.

(Court of King's Bench, [1914] 1 K. B. 595.)

Action by Walters to recover damages for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of Sir Rufus Isaacs, C. J.:

"The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. It was tried by me with a special jury to whom I submitted certain questions to which they gave the following answers: (1) Did the defendants take reasonable care to inform themselves of the true facts of the case?—Yes. (2A) Did the defendants honestly believe that the plaintiff had stolen the book?—Yes. (2B) Did the defendants reasonably believe that the plaintiff had stolen moneys and stock (other than the book 'Traffic') from the bookstall?—Yes. (3) Were the defendants in instituting the criminal proceedings actuated by malice?—No. (4) What damages for false imprisonment?—£75.

"I ruled that there was not an absence of reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution. Thus the plaintiff failed and the defendant succeeded upon the claim for malicious prosecution, and the claim for false imprisonment remained to be dealt with.

"During the trial it was contended by the plaintiff that, inasmuch as the defendants admitted that no felony had in fact been committed in respect of the book 'Traffic' there was no defence to the claim based upon false imprisonment. The defendants contended that all that they need establish as legal justification for the imprisonment was (1) that an actual felony or felonies had been committed, and (2) that they had reasonable and probable cause for suspecting the plaintiff of having committed an actual felony or actual felonies; in other words, it was argued for the defendants that it was not essential to their defence to prove that the felony for which the plaintiff was arrested had in fact been committed. In order to give the defendants the opportunity of raising this point of law I left question (2B) to the jury, which was answered in favour of the defendants. Both parties claimed judgment upon the verdict of the jury. The matter was then argued before me, and I received great assistance from counsel on both sides, who argued the case with great ability. It was agreed by counsel for the parties that I should be at liberty to find any further facts which might become necessary. So far as they are material to the questions now raised the facts are that the plaintiff was, and had been for some nine years, in the employment of the defendants as assistant manager at a bookstall at the King's Cross Railway Station of the Great Northern Railway where some five other persons were also employed under a manager. Early in 1912 it was discovered at the usual half-yearly stocktaking that there was a deficiency of £126. which pointed to dishonesty and thefts by one or more of the defendants' servants. Stock was again taken in February, when the deficiency was £154., and again in April, 1912, when it was £148. Such a deficiency was inexplicable except upon the basis that money or stock, or both, had been stolen; probably only money was taken, but it might well be that stock also had been stolen. It is clear, and indeed it was not, and could not be, disputed by the plaintiff at the trial, that a felony, or more probably a series of felonies, had been committed which caused the deficiency, and it was unlikely that they could have been committed otherwise than by a person employed by the defendants at this bookstall. The defendants in order to detect the culprit, and acting upon advice, thereupon set what was called 'a trap.' Copies of a book called 'Traffic' were marked and delivered to the bookstall at King's Cross. An agent of the defendants went to a shop at Staines kept by the plaintiff and his wife, where magazines and newspapers were sold, to purchase a copy of 'Traffic.' On a later day he called, and one of the marked copies was sold to him in exchange for the price which he then paid. The book had been taken on June 15, 1912, by the plaintiff from the bookstall without payment having been made, and without the knowledge of the manager or other assistants at the bookstall. These facts when ascertained were duly reported, on June 19, to Mr. Kimpton, a manager of one of the defendants' departments, to whom the elucidation of the mystery had been entrusted. In addition, and as the result of inquiries, it was discovered that the plaintiff had acted in various respects in contravention of the practice regulating his employment by the defendants, which he knew he was bound to observe, and that in particular he, with his wife's assistance, had commenced, and was carrying on, a business where newspapers and magazines, and occasionally books, were sold. All these facts were thereupon reported to Mr. Hornby, one of the members of the defendant firm. The plaintiff was asked into a room, and in answer to questions put to him made statements which were of a very unsatisfactory character, and wholly failed to give an explanation of his possession of the book 'Traffic.' Mr. Hornby honestly believed that the plaintiff had stolen the book 'Traffic' and that the plaintiff had committed the thefts of money or books from the bookstall which had caused the deficiency, and at the end of the interview Mr. Hornby gave the plaintiff into the custody of Sergeant Budge, who had been employed in the matter as a detective officer. The plaintiff was taken to the police court and charged with stealing the book 'Traffic.' He was committed for trial and was eventually tried at the County of London Sessions held at Newington and acquitted; the defence was that in taking the book he had no felonious intent, which the jury accepted. At the hearing before me it was admitted by the defendants that the plaintiff had not stolen the book, but had taken it away with the intention of subsequently accounting or paying for it, and no imputation now rests upon him in connection with this transaction, and no suggestion is made against him of being party to the acts of theft or dishonesty which caused the deficiency.

"Having regard to the facts proved I have no doubt that the defendants had reasonable and probable cause for suspecting the plaintiff of having stolen the money or books other than the book 'Traffic' when they gave the plaintiff into custody. I further find as a fact that the plaintiff was given into custody for stealing the book 'Traffic,' and that although the defendants when they caused his arrest were convinced that the man who stole 'Traffic' was also guilty of the other thefts, they did not cause his arrest for those other thefts, but only for that theft of which they thought they had clear evidence. Doubtless they were influenced in taking this course by the suspicion, and indeed conviction, in their minds that the plaintiff had committed the other thefts. It induced them to give him into custody for stealing the book, whereas otherwise they might merely have summoned him or indeed might not have prosecuted him at all."

Sir Rufus Isaacs, C. J., after stating the facts above set out, continued: If as a matter of law the defendants must prove that the particular felony for which the plaintiff was imprisoned had in fact been committed they have failed in their defence, inasmuch as no felony with regard to "Traffic" had in fact been committed. If as a matter of law the defendants may justify the imprisonment by proof that at the time of the arrest of the plaintiff felonies had been committed other than that for which he had been arrested, and that they had reasonable and probable cause for suspecting the plaintiff of having committed them, they would be entitled to succeed.

That is, in my view, the precise question for decision in this case, and one which, so far as I am aware, has never been expressly decided, and for that reason I have gone carefully into the facts and set them out in detail in order that, should it be desired to argue the case further, all the findings of fact will be found in my judgment.

It was strenuously argued before me by counsel for the defendants that in ordering the arrest of the plaintiff they had only caused such an interference with his liberty as was necessary to put matters in train for judicial inquiry, and that the charge subsequently formulated against the plaintiff in the legal proceedings should not be regarded in the claim for false imprisonment. I cannot accept that view inasmuch as it became quite clear during the course of the case, as I have found, that the plaintiff was arrested for stealing the book; and I must deal with the case upon that basis. Interference with the liberty of the subject, and especially interference by a private person, has ever been most jealously guarded by the common law of the land. At common law a police constable may arrest a person if he has reasonable cause to suspect that a felony has been committed, although it afterwards appears that no felony has been committed, but that is not so when a private person makes or causes the arrest, for to justify his action he must prove, among other things, that a felony has actually been committed. See per Lord Tenterden, C. J., in Beckwith v. Philby, 6 B. & C. 635. I have come to the conclusion that it is necessary for a private person to prove that the same felony had been committed for which the plaintiff had been given into custody. In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown (7th Ed., 1795) bk. ii., ch. xii., p. 163, the law is thus stated: "As to the fourth particular, namely, in what manner an arrest for such suspicion is to be justified in pleading. Sect. 18. It seems to be certain, that * * * regularly he ought expressly to show that the very same crime for which he made the arrest, was actually committed." * * *

The case which is nearest to the one which we are at present considering is Anon., Y. B. 27 Hen. VIII, p. 23, where the plea was that divers cattle were stolen, and the defendant suspected the plaintiff of stealing six cattle. That plea was held bad on the ground that the defendant must prove that the thing which he suspected the plaintiff of stealing was in fact stolen. It is not the precise point, but it is at any rate the nearest to it that I have been able to find. * * *

My attention was also directed to a more modern authority, namely, Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading (3d Ed., 1868) at page 797. This authority was produced by the defendants for another purpose to which I will refer in a moment, but in the note at page 795 I find the law thus stated: "A private individual is justified in himself arresting a person or ordering him to be arrested where a felony has been committed and he has reasonable ground of suspicion that the person accused is guilty of it"—that means the felony for which he has been arrested. I doubt whether the two cases cited are in themselves a sufficient authority for the proposition there laid down, but I am satisfied that, as indeed one would expect to find in this very learned work, it is an accurate statement of the common law. I cannot find that any doubt has ever been expressed as to the accuracy of this proposition. On behalf of the defendants Mr. Clavell Salter attached some importance to Chitty on Pleadings, vol. iii., pp. 333 and 334, which contains a plea in bar in an action for trespass, and no doubt there the plea was in terms that the arrested person was given into custody (I am not using the exact language) for the purpose of setting on foot a judicial inquiry or legal proceeding, and that was very persistently and very ably relied upon before me. For the reason I have already given I do not think that in this case it assists the defendants, as I am quite convinced that the dominant intention in the minds of the defendants, as was shewn by the fact of the arrest, was to give the plaintiff into custody for having stolen the book and not merely for the purpose of setting on foot a judicial inquiry or formulating subsequently the charges upon which he was arrested. I think on examination of that plea it will be found that it does not support, or at least does not assist in, this case, because as a matter of law I think it is perfectly right to say (and it will be found in the pleas in all the old books on pleading) that there is a statement such as Mr. Salter argued must be pleaded, that it must be pleaded in substance that the plaintiff had been given into custody for the purpose of setting on foot a judicial inquiry, because were it otherwise there could be no justification for the arrest, and no private person would be justified in detaining a person in his own room or in his own house merely for the purpose of detention or punishment. His only justification, given the other circumstances which I have indicated, must be that he did it for the purpose of setting on foot a judicial inquiry. It is only by means of judicial process that the arrest can otherwise be justified. The mere fact of arrest for the purpose of detaining a person and not setting on foot a judicial inquiry could not be justified. It is in that connection that reference was made to the pleas in Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading in the edition which I have quoted.

I have considered the authorities cited by Mr. St. John Hutchinson, but I do not think that they really assist. It is admitted on both sides that there is no authority precisely in point; one gets close to it, no doubt, in a number of cases, but I do not think that any real assistance is derived from the consideration of authorities which are not upon the precise point to be determined. It is by reference to the earlier works on the common law, which has never been altered, that one must ascertain what is the law of the land. I cannot find that any doubt has ever been expressed upon the accuracy of the proposition of law which I have stated in the simplest language from the note in Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading. I am bound to follow the law thus laid down, and, moreover, I am convinced on consideration that it is based on sound principle. I should be bound to follow it whether I was of that opinion or not, although it may well be that in some cases—as in this particular case—the law seems to operate somewhat harshly upon the defendants. But I have to bear in mind that the principle of law applicable to the facts in this case must be one of general application and cannot be modified, unless the law allows it, in order to meet the difficulties of a particular set of circumstances. The principle urged by the defendants' counsel would, in my judgment, be an encroachment upon the liberty of the subject as hitherto understood. It is true that very often there is a duty cast upon a person to put the law in motion in order to bring offenders to justice, and it is no doubt for reasons of public policy that some excuse, limited in character, is permissible in an action for damages at civil law for false imprisonment when a private person has wrongly caused the arrest of another. But be it observed that this concession is limited to felonies, and although a misdemeanour, which may be a more serious crime than some felonies, may have been committed, yet if a person causes a wrongful arrest, however serious the misdemeanour may be, it cannot be made the basis of any legal excuse if the party has been wrongfully arrested.

When a person, instead of having recourse to legal proceeding by applying for a judicial warrant for arrest or laying an information or issuing other process well known to the law, gives another into custody, he takes a risk upon himself by which he must abide, and if in the result it turns out that the person arrested was innocent, and that therefore the arrest was wrongful, he cannot plead any lawful excuse unless he can bring himself within the proposition of law which I have enunciated in this judgment.

In this case, although the defendants thought, and indeed it appeared that they were justified in thinking, that the plaintiff was the person who had committed the theft, it turned out in fact that they were wrong. The felony for which they gave the plaintiff into custody had not in fact been committed, and, therefore, the very basis upon which they must rest any defence of lawful excuse for the wrongful arrest of another fails them in this case. Although I am quite satisfied not only that they acted with perfect bona fides in the matter but were genuinely convinced after reasonable inquiry that they had in fact discovered the perpetrator of the crime, it now turns out that they were mistaken, and it cannot be established that the crime had been committed for which they gave the plaintiff into custody; they have failed to justify in law the arrest, and there must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff for the £75. damages which have been awarded, with the consequent results.

It follows from what I have said that, although there is judgment for the plaintiff for this amount, the defendants have succeeded on the issue as to malicious prosecution, and having succeeded, in my judgment they are entitled to all such costs as the Master thinks were properly attributable to that issue as distinguished from the general costs of the action, and I think the costs should follow the event; the Master will have to rule upon it, but so far as it may be necessary I make that order.

There will therefore be judgment for the plaintiff for £75. and costs.[64]

(F) Discipline

A master may justify the beating his apprentice, servant, scholar, etc., if the beating is in nature of correction only, and with a proper instrument, otherwise immoderate castigavit is a good reply; and so it was adjudged in Keits's Case, per Holt, Chief Justice.

Assault and battery; the defendant justified, for that the plaintiff was his apprentice, and that he tempore quo, etc., gave him gentle correction, and traversed that he was guilty at any time before or after he was his apprentice; and upon a demurrer to this plea it was adjudged ill, because the defendant ought to shew some cause specially, or the fault for which he beat his apprentice, and then conclude absque hoc, that he beat him before or after that time.

And such persons are protected in exercise thereof, if they act with good faith and in a reasonable and moderate manner. Parental authority is the most obvious and universal instance. * * * The master of a merchant ship has by reason of necessity the right of using force to preserve order and discipline for the safety of the vessel and the persons and property on board. * * * There are conceivable circumstances in which the leader of a party on land, such as an Alpine expedition, might be justified on the same principle in exercising compulsion to assure the common safety of the party." SHEEHAN v. STURGES.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1885. 53 Conn. 481, 2 Atl. 841.)

Action for assault and battery, tried to the court. Finding of facts, with judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

GRANGER, J. This is a complaint for an assault and battery. The defense is that the plaintiff was at the time a pupil in a school kept by the defendant, that he willfully violated the reasonable rules of the school and disobeyed the reasonable commands of the defendant as his teacher, and that for this misconduct the defendant as such teacher whipped him in a reasonable manner. The sole controversy upon the trial was as to the reasonableness of the punishment inflicted. The court found that "such whipping was not unreasonable or excessive and was fully justified by the plaintiff's misconduct at that time."

The extent and reasonableness of the punishment administered by a teacher to his pupil is purely a question of fact. This is too well settled to make the citation of authorities necessary. The finding of the court therefore settles the question as to this, unless the court acted upon improper evidence.

The plaintiff testified as a witness in his own behalf, and on his cross-examination the defendant, against the objection of the plaintiff's counsel, was allowed to ask him whether on two former occasions, [66] "The husband also, by the old law, might give his wife moderate correction. For, as he is to answer for her misbehavior, the law thought it reasonable to intrust him with this power of restraining her, by domestic chastisement, in the same moderation that a man is allowed to correct his apprentices or children; for whom the master or parent is also liable in some cases to answer. * * * But with us in the politer reign of Charles the Second this power of correction began to be doubted and a wife may now have security of the peace against her husband; or, in return, a husband against his wife. Yet the lower rank of people, who were always fond of the old common law, still claim and exert their ancient privilege; and the courts of law will still permit a husband to restrain a wife of her liberty, in case of any gross misbehavior." 1 Bl. Com. 444 (1765).

Compare State v. Rhodes (1868), 61 N. C. 453, 98 Am. Dec. 78: A husband struck his wife three blows "with a switch about the size of one of his fingers." Said the court: "The violence complained of would, without question, have constituted a battery, if the subject of it had not been the defendant's wife." Held, that the husband should not be convicted.

But see State v. Oliver (1874) 70 N. C. 60, Fulgham v. State (1871) 46 Ala. 143, Kales, Cas. on Persons, 609, and Lawson v. State (1902) 115 Ga. 578, 41 S. E. 993: While a husband may use such force as is necessary to repel a felonious assault by his wife upon him, he is not justified under any circumstances in striking his wife, either by way of chastisement or in resentment of a past injury.

both of them more than a week before the whipping in question, he had not assaulted the teacher while he was chastising him. And the defendant afterwards, in his testimony in his own behalf, was allowed, against the objection of the plaintiff, to state that the plaintiff's conduct in school was habitually bad, and that on two former occasions, one of them about two weeks and the other seven or eight days before the whipping in question, the plaintiff had assaulted him while he was chastising him. The defendant was also allowed, on the plaintiff's cross-examination, against objection, to inquire of him whether he had not, seven or eight days before the whipping in question, put stones in his pocket and declared that he was going to attack the teacher with them. The plaintiff, in answer to the inquiry, denied that he had done so, and the defendant, against the plaintiff's objection, was allowed to show by a witness that the plaintiff had so done. The defendant did not inform the plaintiff at the time of the whipping that he was punishing him for his past and habitual misconduct.

We think the court committed no error in admitting the inquiries and evidence. The right of the schoolmaster to require obedience to reasonable rules and a proper submission to his authority, and to inflict corporal punishment for disobedience, is well settled. * * *

No precise rule can be laid down as to what shall be considered excessive or unreasonable punishment. Reeve's Dom. Rel. 288. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances. In Commonwealth v. Randall, 4 Gray (Mass.) 36, it is held that, "in inflicting corporal punishment, a teacher must exercise reasonable judgment and discretion, and be governed as to the mode and severity of the punishment by the nature of the offense, and the age, size, and apparent powers of endurance of the pupil." And we think it equally clear that he should also take into consideration the mental and moral qualities of the pupil, and, as indicative of these, his general behavior in school and his attitude towards his teacher become proper subjects of consideration.

We think therefore that the court acted properly in admitting evidence of the prior and habitual misconduct of the plaintiff, and that it was perfectly proper for the defendant, in chastising him, to consider not merely the immediate offense which had called for the punishment, but the past offenses that aggravated the present one, and showed the plaintiff to have been habitually refractory and disobedient. Nor was it necessary that the teacher should, at the time of inflicting the punishment, remind the pupil of his past and accumulating offenses. The pupil knew them well enough, without having them brought freshly to his notice.

There is no error. In this opinion the other judges concurred.[68]

STATE v. VANDERBILT.

(Supreme Court of Indiana, 1888. 116 Ind. 11, 18 N. E. 266, 9 Am. St. Rep. 820.)

The teacher of a public school, having made a rule that pupils must pay for the wanton and careless destruction of school property, enforced it by chastising a pupil. A charge of assault and battery was thereupon brought against the teacher, who was acquitted in the trial court. The State appealed the case.

ZOLLARS, J. * * * Looking to the record before us as a whole, we think that it sufficiently presents the question as to whether or not a teacher of a public school may establish, and enforce by chastisement, a rule requiring pupils to "pay for the wanton and careless destruction of school property."

The bill of exceptions shows that the State, by the prosecuting attorney, asked the court to charge the jury "that a teacher in a public district school has no right to inflict a money penalty upon a pupil for the accidental destruction or breakage of school property, and enforce the same." That instruction the court refused, and over the exception of the State gave the following instruction:

"A rule of the teacher, requiring that the pupil shall pay for the wanton and careless destruction of school property, is a reasonable rule, and one that the teacher has the right to enforce."

It is not necessary that the evidence should be in the record to enable us to pass upon these instructions, if in any case on appeal by the State the evidence can be examined, a question which we leave where it is left by our cases. Without speaking of the instruction refused, which is the opposite of that given, the latter, if erroneous, would be erroneous under any supposable state of the evidence.

Under our cases, a school teacher has the right to exact from pupils obedience to his lawful and reasonable demands and rules, and to punish for disobedience, "with kindness, prudence and propriety." And where, in such case, the punishment is not administered with unreasonable severity, a proceeding for an assault and battery can not be maintained against the teacher. Danenhoffer v. State, 69 Ind. 295, 35 Am. Rep. 216. The rule or rules to which the teacher may thus enforce obedience must, however, be reasonable, and whether or not such rules are reasonable is ultimately a question for the courts. Fertich v. Michener, 111 Ind. 472, 11 N. E. 605, 14 N. E. 68, 60 Am. Rep. 709.

We think that a rule requiring pupils to pay for school property which they may wantonly and carelessly break or destroy, is not a reasonable rule, and, therefore, that teachers have no right to make and enforce such a rule by chastisement of the pupils. The "wanton and careless destruction," etc., amounts to nothing more than carelessness. Lafayette, etc., R. R. Co. v. Huffman, 28 Ind. 287, 92 Am.

Dec. 318; Terre Haute, etc., R. R. Co. v. Graham, 95 Ind. 286, 296, 48 Am. Rep. 719. Carelessness on the part of children is one of the most common, and yet one of the least blameworthy, of their faults. In simple carelessness there is no purpose to do wrong. To punish a child for carelessness in any case is to punish it where it has no purpose or intent to do wrong or violate rules.

But beyond this, no rule is reasonable which requires of the pupils what they can not do. The vast majority of pupils, whether small or large, have no money at their command with which to pay for school property which they injure or destroy by carelessness or otherwise. If required to pay for such property, they would have to look to their parents or guardians for the money. If the parent or guardian should not have the money, or if they should refuse to give it to the child, the child would be left subject to punishment for not having done what it had no power to do.

Without giving other reasons for our conclusion that the rule in question was an unreasonable rule, our judgment is that the court below erred in giving the instruction above set out, and that this appeal must be sustained, and the appellee taxed with the costs on appeal.[69]

KING v. FRANKLIN.

Action for false imprisonment and placing the plaintiff in irons.

The defendant was captain of, and the plaintiff a passenger in, the Undaunted. The placing in irons having been proved, the defence set up was, that a mutiny was imminent, and a justification of the imprisonment for the prevention of the mutiny. It appeared that a quarrel had arisen between the captain and some of the passengers respecting the playing of cards in a particular part of the vessel, and some confusion arose therefrom. In the course of the dispute the plaintiff had said that the ship was a floating hotel and the captain only the landlord of her. The captain thereupon ordered the plaintiff to be slightly ironed, stating, in his evidence, that there was no cabin in which to confine him.

Watson, B. (in summing up). The captain has the absolute control over the passengers and crew. The contract with the passenger is to carry, board and lodge him, and the passenger is to obey all the captain's reasonable orders, in an emergency even to work the ship when necessary. If a passenger misconduct himself at table, the captain may remove him, or may even imprison him for a short period, if imprisonment be necessary for the enforcement of his lawful commands. The rule of law is simple; the power of the captain is limited to the necessity of the case. In the present case the defendant justifies, for "that he had reasonable and probable cause to believe, and did believe, that a mutiny was imminent." To succeed in his defence he must prove the whole of this allegation. It would not be sufficient that he did believe unless he had also reasonable cause for apprehending a mutiny. The defendant appears to have taken great offence at the term "landlord of hotel" being applied to him; but the term is not altogether incorrect, except that in case of misconduct the landlord may remove the guest from the house, but as the captain cannot remove the passenger from the ship, he may, if necessary, and in moderation, imprison him. He certainly would not be justified in imprisoning a person for having called him "the landlord of an hotel."

Verdict for the plaintiff.

BROWN, HUSSEY & ERITH v. HOWARD.

(Supreme Court of Judicature of New York, 1817. 14 Johns. 119.)

Howard sued Brown, Hussey and Erith, for assault and battery and false imprisonment on the high seas, on board the ship Teaplant. Brown, the master of the ship, pleaded not guilty, and son assault demesne; the other defendants, who were mates on the ship, pleaded not guilty, and justified that they acted by the orders of Brown, the master. There was testimony that Hussey and Erith interfered in no other way than by tying Howard, at the master's order. The counsel for the defendants then moved that the two mates should be acquitted, and struck out of the record, which the court refused; and judgment was given for the plaintiff for $125.

THOMPSON, C. J. * * * The return states that all the facts relative to the transaction took place in presence of the two defendants who were offered as witnesses, and of course, fully known to them at the time they obeyed the order of the captain in binding the plaintiff's hands and feet with ropes. If this was an illegal act in the captain, the mates were not bound to obey him, and cannot excuse themselves under such order. A master has no right to command his servant to commit a trespass, or do a wrongful or unlawful act. From the facts stated in the return, it appears to me that the conduct of the captain, to say the least of it, was harsh and rigorous and altogether unjustifiable; and unless we are warranted in presuming the statement to be, in some degree, colored by the witnesses who were fellow seamen with the plaintiff below, the conduct of the captain merits severe animadversion.

Although a captain may have a right to inflict corporal punishment upon a seaman under his command, yet it is not an arbitrary and uncontrolled right; he is amenable to the law for the due exercise of it. He ought to be able to show, not only that there was a sufficient cause for chastisement, but that the chastisement itself was reasonable and moderate. 2 Bos. & P. 224; Michaelson v. Denison, 3 Day (Conn.) 294, Fed. Cas. No. 9,523. The rule on this subject is well laid down by Abbott. Abb. on Shipping, 125. By the common law, says he, the master has authority over all the mariners on board the ship, and it is their duty to obey his commands in all lawful matters relative to the navigation of the ship, and the preservation of good order; and in case of disobedience or disorderly conduct, he may lawfully correct them in a reasonable manner; his authority, in this respect, being analogous to that of a parent over a child, or a master over his apprentice or scholar. Such an authority is absolutely necessary to the safety of the ship and of the lives of the persons on board; but it behooves the master to be very careful in the exercise of it, and not to make his parental power a pretext for cruelty and oppression.

Not being able to discover, from the return, the least justification for the captain's treatment of the plaintiff below, and the mates having been acquainted with the whole transaction, I can perceive no ground upon which they can be exonerated as parties, nor, of course, admissible as witnesses. The judgment below must, accordingly, be affirmed.[70]

HANNEN v. EDES.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1819. 15 Mass. 347.)

This was an action of trespass for an assault and battery. The defendant pleads, in bar, that at the time when, etc., he was master of the ship Cicero, then in a distant port; that the plaintiff was a seaman, or mariner, on board the same ship; that he, the defendant, issued a reasonable and proper order to the plaintiff, relative to his duty on board the vessel, which the plaintiff wilfully disobeyed; and that he, the defendant, moderately chastised him for such disobedience—which is averred to be the same beating complained of in the declaration. The plaintiff replied de injuria sua propria absque tali causa, etc., on which issue was joined.

On the trial the defendant having proved his justification, so far as respected his authority, the duty of the plaintiff, and his disobedience of a reasonable and proper command, the plaintiff was permitted to show, in evidence, (the defendant objecting), and to insist to the jury, that the beating complained of was excessive, and out of all proportion to the offence committed; and having proved this, a verdict was returned in his favor. The defendant moved for a new trial, on the ground that this evidence was improperly admitted; contending that, if the plaintiff relied upon any excess or unreasonableness in the beating, he ought to have set it forth specially in his replication, in the nature of a new assignment.

PARKER, C. J. * * * The general doctrine upon which the whole matter rests is that, whenever the defendant's plea, in an action of trespass, confesses and avoids, by justifying the whole trespass set forth in the declaration, and the plaintiff would set up some new matter as the foundation of his action, he shall show that new matter specially, as in the case of Scot v. Dixon, 2 Wils. 3, cited in the argument. Where, in trespass, the defendant justifies under a license, for putting his cattle into the plaintiff's close, the plaintiff may reply that he put them in at another time without leave, and he shall not shew this in evidence under the general traverse; for, not having specified the time in his declaration, and there being but one trespass complained of, the justification shall be held to apply to that, unless the plaintiff shows another and distinct trespass, in such manner as to give the defendant an opportunity to deny or justify it.

So, in the case of Dye v. Leatherdale, 3 Wils. 20, also referred to in the argument for the defendant, which was trespass for taking and carrying away a hog, and converting him, etc., the justification was that the hog was taken damage feasant; to which the plaintiff replied specially, acknowledging the justification, and averring that the defendant afterwards converted the hog to his own use. This was held to be good pleading; because it alleged a new fact, different from that which was justified in the bar. And in the case of Oystead v. Shed, 12 Mass. 506, the doctrine relied upon by the counsel for the defendant rests upon the same principle, viz., that the breaking of the outer door was a new fact, not relied upon in the declaration, except by way of aggravation; and therefore, as the trespass, as alleged in the declaration, was justified, the plaintiff, in order to take advantage of this, ought to have replied it specially. And to this effect are all the other authorities cited for the defendant.

Now if the case before us cannot be distinguished from those which have been cited, the pleading in this case was wrong for the plaintiff's purpose, and the whole practice of the state has been wrong. But we think it is clearly distinguishable. In the plea of moderate castigavit, the defendant must not only make out his authority, and the cause of the beating, but must also show that the beating was, in fact, moderate; so that if, by his own evidence, it should appear that he had abused his authority, and inflicted blows unnecessary for the purpose, or cruel in the degree, the issue would fail him entirely; and it would be of his own wrong, and without the cause set forth in his plea; and this not upon the ground of his being a trespasser ab initio, so much as because he shows no right at all to inflict any beating, in the manner and to the degree which the evidence would prove; and he therefore falsifies his own plea.

If the plaintiff intended to rely upon another beating, different in point of time from that which was justified in the plea, he should have replied specially, and set forth such different beating; but if there were but one, as in the present case, and the answer to the justification was intended to be, that the very beating was immoderate, and therefore not justified, the general traverse is right. And so are the authorities, as will be found in Franks v. Morris, 10 East, 81, note (a), and more at large in 1 Saund. 299, note (6), by Sergeant Williams, which were referred to in the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff.

The truth is, the plaintiff had no new cause to assign. The beating which he complained of was the same with that attempted to be justified; and by his replication de injuria sua, etc., he denies the justification. He does not show that afterwards, viz., after the moderate chastisement averred in the plea, there was a further excessive beating, but that the beating itself, alleged to be moderate, was excessive, and so defeated the justification; and thus, we think, the uninterrupted practice is reconcilable with the authorities.

There is an old case reported in Siderfin, 246, and Keble, 884, which was an action for an assault and battery; and wounding and mayhem, by breaking the arm, were alleged. Upon a plea of son assault demesne the plaintiff demurred, stating, as the ground of his demurrer, that as a heinous battery and a mayhem were alleged, the plea ought to have shown an assault sufficient to justify such a battery. But it was holden that the plea was good; because the degree and proportion of the beating to the assault was matter of evidence. If it was not proportionable, the issue would be for the plaintiff, notwithstanding he made the first assault; otherwise, for the defendant. The same principle is applicable to the case before us. The degree and proportion between the offence and the punishment was matter of evidence; and being found disproportioned, the issue was rightly found for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the matter set forth in the plea.

Judgment on the verdict.[71]

Compare the remark in 2 Phillips on Evidence, 204 (7th London Ed.): "It seems to be the better opinion that, when the trespass is alleged in the declaration in general terms, and it is justified in the like terms, if the defendant has inflicted a greater injury on the plaintiff than he ought to have done, the excess is properly the subject of a special replication." 2 Phill. 204, 7th Lond. (G) Safety of Plaintiff

A private person may, without an express warrant, confine a person disordered in his mind, who seems disposed to do mischief to himself, or to any other person.

Bacon's Abridg. Trespass, (D).

LOOK v. DEAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1871. 108 Mass. 116, 11 Am. Rep. 323.)

Tort for unlawfully arresting and imprisoning the plaintiff. In justification of an admitted restraint, the defendant pleaded:

That the plaintiff at the time and place aforesaid was insane, and incapable of taking care of himself, and was conducting himself in a wild and irrational manner, and the defendant prevailed upon him to cease from such disorderly conduct and to retire to a place of quiet; and if in so doing he in any manner restrained the plaintiff of his liberty, he did so without malice towards the plaintiff, and because the plaintiff, by reason of his insanity, was incapable of taking care of himself; and the defendant did only what was, as he believed, for the welfare and safety of the plaintiff.

On the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant brings exceptions.

CHAPMAN, C. J. The question which this case presents arises upon the defendant's request for instructions, and the instructions that were actually given. The defendant asked the court to rule that if the plaintiff was insane, and the defendant, honestly believing that the welfare of the plaintiff demanded that he should go from the crowd, to which he was talking, to a place of quiet near by, took him forcibly to such place, using no more force than was necessary for the purpose, and acting from no other motive than a desire to assist and protect the plaintiff, such act would not be an assault nor an unlawful arrest or imprisonment. The court declined to give this instruction, but instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff was insane, the officer had a right to arrest him, but it would in such case be his duty immediately to take proper steps to have him committed to a lunatic hospital, and if he failed to do so he would be liable from the beginning for the arrest.

Both the request and the instructions assume that he was neither dangerously insane, nor disturbing the peace, but was merely insane. The defendant was a deputy of the state constable, but his office gave him no authority over the plaintiff. He had only such authority as any private person would have. The right which every citizen has to enjoy personal liberty is necessarily subject to some exceptions. Most of these exceptions are enumerated in Colby v. Jackson, 12 N. H. 526, and the authorities there cited. Among them, are the right to restrain a person who is fighting, or doing mischief, or disturbing a congregation, or has fallen in a fit, or is so sick as to be helpless, or is unconsciously going into great danger, or is drunk, or has delirium tremens, or is so insane as to be dangerous to himself or others. In such cases, the right to restrain persons has its foundation in a reasonable necessity, and ceases with the necessity. As to insane persons who are not dangerous, they are not liable to be thus arrested or restrained by strangers. Bac. Ab. Trespass, D; Anderdon v. Burrows, 4 C. & P. 210; Scott v. Wakem, 3 Fost. & Finl. 328; Fletcher v. Fletcher, 28 L. J. N. S. (Q. B.) 134; In re Oakes, 8 Law Reporter, 122. There is no reason why they should be thus liable; for it is well known that many persons who are insane, and especially monomaniacs, are as harmless as any other persons, and are not deemed proper subjects for treatment in a hospital. The request for instructions was properly refused.

We need not in this case discuss the question whether the defendant would have had the right, as stated in the instructions given, to take up the plaintiff, he not being a dangerous person, provided he had taken the proper steps to have him committed to a lunatic hospital; for he took no such steps. There was no legal justification for the acts of the defendant.

It is elementary law that one who would justify himself under a statute must pursue the statute. The question put to the defendant as a witness, by his counsel, whether he was acting under the direction of any superior officer, was properly ruled to be inadmissible, because he did not proceed under the statutes, but merely held the plaintiff for a while, and then released him. A superior officer could not authorize this course.

The question whether in his opinion the mind of the plaintiff, at the time of the arrest, was in a normal or abnormal condition, and whether the plaintiff was sane or insane, was also inadmissible, because the fact itself was immaterial, it not being pretended that the defendant was acting under the statutes.

The subsequent commitment of the plaintiff to the hospital by another constable was a separate matter, and could not have justified the defendant, even if it had been legal.

[72] The statement of the case is abridged.

"In Fletcher v. Fletcher (1859) 1 E. & E. 420, [28 L. J. Q. B. 134], the Court used general language which might seem to convey the notion that the mere fact of lunacy justified the confinement of the sufferer. The judges did not, it is conceived, mean this. The distinction between harmless and dangerous lunatics was not material for them to consider." Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 211, note e. Accord: Keleher v. Putnam (1880) 60 N. H. 30, 49 Am. Rep. 304: "The plaintiff was mildly insane, and the defendant without process arrested and detained her."

On the limits of the excuse, see Colby v. Jackson (1842) 12 N. H. 526 (no one has a right to confine an insane person for an indefinite time, until he shall be restored to reason, but upon compliance with the formalities of the law); Paetz v. Dain (1872) Wils. (Ind.) 148.

HOFFMAN v. EPPERS.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1876. 41 Wis. 251.)

The action was to recover damages for an assault and battery alleged to have been committed by the defendant upon the plaintiff. The evidence, admitted under a general denial, tended to show that the parties came from a neighboring town to the city of Kenosha to attend a lawsuit as witnesses; that they were together there, and drank with each other several times, and both became intoxicated; that the friends of the plaintiff took him to a hotel and put him to bed; that when the time for the suit to be called had nearly arrived, the defendant went to the room where the plaintiff was, aroused him, took him down stairs and into the street, and started with him in the direction of the court. After the defendant got the plaintiff into the street, the latter was arrested and locked up in jail until the next morning, when he was taken before a magistrate and fined for being drunk and disorderly in the streets of the city.

The jury found for the defendant; a new trial was denied; and from a judgment entered pursuant to the verdict, the plaintiff appealed.

Wiesmann and Quarles, for the appellant: * * * The statute does not punish the act of intoxication, but the act of being found in a public place in such a state of intoxication as to disturb others. To speak of the plaintiff, therefore, as having been arrested for being intoxicated, was to misstate the law and mislead the jury. The arrest, imprisonment and fine of the plaintiff were the direct and immediate result of the defendant's unlawful acts. Plaintiff was sleeping soundly when defendant intruded upon him, and would not of his own accord have violated the law. He was punished for being where the defendant carried him against his will. * * *

LYON, J. * * * It was certainly lawful for the defendant to arouse the plaintiff from his drunken stupor, and to endeavor to assist him to the court where he was required as a witness; and if the defendant did this as a friendly act, in a gentle and friendly manner, with an honest purpose to do the plaintiff no injury, but only to aid him to reach the court, he is not liable to respond in damages for such acts. As we understand the charge of the learned circuit judge, he substantially so stated the law to the jury; and there is sufficient testimony tending to show that such was the motive and purpose of the defendant's conduct, to render the instructions applicable to the case. * * *

[73] The statement of the case is abridged, and only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point.

On the principle involved, compare Richmond v. Fisk (1893) 160 Mass. 34, 35 N. E. 103, given ante, p. 77; and see in general, ante, Section 2—Elements of a Prima Facie Cause in Trespass.

LUKA v. LOWRIE.

Action by Charles Luka, by next friend, against Lowrie and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error.

The plaintiff, a boy 15 years of age, while crossing the Michigan Central Railroad track, was knocked down by an engine and in some manner, not clearly shown, was thrown under the wheels of a car. His left foot was mangled and crushed. Shortly after his injury, plaintiff was removed to Harper Hospital in an ambulance. He was partially conscious upon his arrival and was able to communicate his name and the name of the street upon which he lived to the attending surgeons. Within 10 or 15 minutes after his arrival, he lapsed into a comatose condition, and later into complete unconsciousness. Efforts to revive him by injections of strychnine and infusion of a saline solution were made, but he remained unconscious until after the operation. Soon after his arrival at the hospital, at 10:15 a. m., plaintiff's foot was examined by four house physicians connected with the hospital. They concluded that prompt surgical treatment was necessary and telephoned to defendant, who is assistant surgeon of the Michigan Central Railroad. Defendant arrived at the hospital at 10:45 a. m. Upon examining the plaintiff, he found him unconscious, with a weak pulse and dilated pupils. The foot was found to be cold and dead, the circulation having been interrupted. Defendant testified that he learned from the house surgeon the boy's name and residence street. With reference to the residence, he knew the distance from Harper Hospital and the time it would take to get from there to the hospital; that he inquired of the house surgeon if any one, any relatives, were present, and was informed that no person was present whatever. After a consultation with the four house physicians, it was agreed by all that an immediate amputation was necessary to save the plaintiff's life. The foot was amputated, and the plaintiff recovered. It is the plaintiff's claim that his foot should not have been amputated at all, and particularly that it should not have been amputated without first obtaining his consent or the consent of his parents, who went to the hospital as soon as possible after learning of the accident. A verdict having been directed in favor of defendant, the case is brought here for review upon writ of error.

BROOKE, J. * * * There is nothing in this record to indicate that, had the parents of plaintiff been present at the operating table, they would have refused their consent to the operation. Indeed, it is inconceivable that such consent would have been withheld in the face of the determination of five duly qualified physicians and surgeons that it was necessary to save the plaintiff's life. But defendant testifies, and in this he is not contradicted, that he made inquiry for relatives of the plaintiff and was told that none were in the hospital. Suppose that his informant was in error (which is not certain), the defendant had a right to rely upon the information and to act in the emergency upon the theory that to obtain consent was impracticable. In Pratt v. Davis, 224 Ill. 309, 79 N. E. 565, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609, 8 Ann. Cas. 197, it was said: "In such event a surgeon may lawfully, and it is his duty to, perform such operation as good surgery demands without such consent." Upon the question involved in this case a valuable collection of authorities will be found in Gillette v. Tucker, 93 Am. St. Rep. 657, note. See, also, 6 Cyc. 675; 30 Cyc. 1587.

The fact that surgeons are called upon daily, in all our large cities, to operate instantly in emergency cases in order that life may be preserved, should be considered. Many small children are injured upon the streets in large cities. To hold that a surgeon must wait until perhaps he may be able to secure the consent of the parents before giving to the injured one the benefit of his skill and learning, to the end that life may be preserved, would, we believe, result in the loss of many lives which might otherwise be saved. It is not to be presumed that competent surgeons will wantonly operate, nor that they will fail to obtain the consent of parents to operations where such consent may be reasonably obtained in view of the exigency. Their work, however, is highly humane and very largely charitable in character, and no rule should be announced which would tend in the slightest degree to deprive sufferers of the benefit of their services.

The judgment is affirmed.[74]

[74] Compare Rolater v. Strain (1913) 39 Okl. 572, 137 Pac. 96, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880: P. stepped on a nail which penetrated the great toe of her right foot. The wound did not heal, and D., a surgeon, was consulted. He advised an operation, to drain the wound. P. consented, but on condition that no bone should be removed. P. was placed under an anæsthetic, but in performing the operation D. removed a sesamoid bone. Contending that she did not consent to the removal of this bone, P. sued for assault and battery. It was not claimed that the operation was unskillfully performed. D. contended that even if the contract was made, still the removal of the bone, under the circumstances, was not a violation of it, since the facts show this to be an emergency case, as this bone was found in an unusual place, and was unexpected, and when it was discovered, the patient being under the influence of the anæsthetic, it was unsafe to stop the operation at the time and allow her come out from under the influence of the anæsthetic so as to have obtained her consent to its removal, and that he was justified under the circumstances in removing the bone. Held, P. may recover.

SECTION 4.—TRESPASS AB INITIO

THE SIX CARPENTERS' CASE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1610. 8 Co. Rep. 146 a, 77 Reprint, 695.)

In trespass brought by John Vaux against Thomas Newman, carpenter, and five other carpenters, for breaking his house, and for an assault and battery, 1 Sept. 7 Jac. in London, in the parish of St. Giles extra Cripplegate, in the ward of Cripplegate, etc., and upon the new assignment, the plaintiff assigned the trespass in a house called the Queen's Head. The defendants to all the trespass præter fractionem domus pleaded not guilty; and as to the breaking of the house said, that the house præd' tempore quo, etc., et diu antea et postea, was a common wine tavern, of the said John Vaux, with a common sign at the door of the said house fixed, etc., by force whereof the defendants, præd' tempore quo, etc., viz. hora quarta post meridiem into the said house, the door thereof being open, did enter, and did there buy and drink a quart of wine, and there paid for the same, etc. The plaintiff, by way of replication, did confess, that the said house was a common tavern, and that they entered into it, and bought and drank a quart of wine, and paid for it: but further said, that one John Ridding, servant of the said John Vaux, at the request of the said defendants, did there then deliver them another quart of wine, and a pennyworth of bread, amounting to 8d. and then they there did drink the said wine, and eat the bread, and upon request did refuse to pay for the same: upon which the defendants did demur in law: and the only point in this case was, if the denying to pay for the wine, or the nonpayment, which is all one (for every nonpayment upon request, is a denying in law) makes the entry into the tavern tortious.

And first it was resolved when an entry, authority, or license, is given to any one by the law, and he doth abuse it, he shall be a trespasser ab initio:[75] but where an entry, authority, or license is given by

[75] On this distinction between nonfeasance and misfeasance in the law of trespass ab initio, see the remarks of Coke, C. J., in Isaack v. Clark (1615) 2 Bulstrode, 306, 312: "If a man findes goods, an action upon the case lieth, for his ill and negligent keeping of them, but no trover and conversion, because it is but a non feasans, and so in the Six Carpenters Case, he shall not be punished in trespass, for not paying for his wine, being but non feasans; but if a distress taken be abused, he shall then be punished in trespass, and so the difference is, that mis-fesans but not non-fesans, shall make one a trespasser."

See, also, the remark of Mr. Justice Holmes in Commonwealth v. Rubin (1896) 165 Mass. 453, 43 N. E. 200: "The rule that if a man abuse an authority given him by the law, he becomes a trespasser ab initio, although now it looks like a rule of substantive law and is limited to a certain class of cases, in its origin was only a rule of evidence by which, when such rules were few and rude, the original intent was presumed conclusively from the subsequent conduct."

Compare the remarks of Professor Ames on "the origin of the familiar distinction in the law of trespass ab initio between the abuse of an authority given the party, and he abuses it, there he must be punished for his abuse, but shall not be a trespasser ab initio. And the reason of this difference is, that in the case of a general authority or license of law, the law adjudges by the subsequent act, quo animo, or to what intent, he entered; for acta exteriora indicant interiora secreta. Vide 11 H. 4, 75 b. But when the party gives an authority or license himself to do anything, he cannot, for any subsequent cause, punish that which is done by his own authority or license, and therefore the law gives authority to enter into a common inn, or tavern, so to the lord to distrain; to the owner of the ground to distrain damage-feasant; to him in reversion to see if waste be done; to the commoner to enter upon the land to see his cattle, and such like. Vide 12 E. 4, 8 b. 21 E. 4, 19 b. 5 H. 7, 11 a. 9 H. 6, 29 b. 11 H. 4, 75 b. 3 H. 7, 15 b. 28 H. 6, 5 b. But if he who enters into the inn or tavern doth a trespass, as if he carries away any thing; or if the lord who distrains for rent, or the owner for damage-feasant, works or kills the distress; or if he who enters to see waste breaks the house, or stays there all night; or if the commoner cuts down a tree, in these and the like cases, the law adjudges that he entered for that purpose; and because the act which demonstrates it is a trespass, he shall be trespasser ab initio as it appears in the said books. So if a purveyor takes my cattle by force of a commission, for the King's house, it is lawful; but if he sells them in the market, now the first taking is wrongful; and therewith agrees 18 H. 6, 19 b. Et sic de similibus.

It was resolved per totam Curiam, that not doing cannot make the party who has authority or license by the law a trespasser ab initio, because not doing is no trespass, and, therefore, if the lessor distrains for his rent, and thereupon the lessee tenders him the rent and arrears, etc., and requires his beasts again, and he will not deliver them, this not doing cannot make him a trespasser ab initio; and therewith agrees 33 H. 6, 47 a. So if a man takes cattle damage-feasant, and the other offers sufficient amends and he refuses to redeliver them, now if he sues a replevin, he shall recover damages only for the detaining of them, and not for the taking, for that was lawful; and therewith agrees F. N. B. 69, g. temp. E. 1. Replevin 27. 27 E. 3. 88. 45 E. 3, 9. So in the case at Bar, for not paying for the wine, the defendants shall not be trespassers, for the denying to pay for it is no trespass, and therefore they cannot be trespassers ab initio; and therewith agrees directly in the point 12 Edw. 4, 9 b. For there Pigot, Serjeant, puts this very case, if one comes into a tavern to drink, and when he has drunk he goes away, and will not pay the taverner, the taverner shall have an action of trespass against him by the law and the abuse of an authority given by the party, the abuse making one a trespasser ab initio in the one case, but not in the other." 11 Harv. Law Review 276, 287–289; 3 Legal Essays 418, 428–430; Lectures on Legal History, 61.

for his entry. To which BRIAN, Chief Justice, said, the said case which Pigot has put, is not law, for it is no trespass, but the taverner shall have an action of debt. * * *[76]

GARGRAVE v. SMITH.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1691. Salk. 221, 91 Reprint, 196.)

Trespass for breaking his house, and taking and carrying away his goods; the defendant justified the taking and carrying away nomine districtionis for damage-feasant; plaintiff replied quod post districtionem præd. viz. eodem die, etc., he converted them to his own use. On demurrer it was urged, that the replication was a departure, for it does not make good the plaintiff's declaration in trespass, but shews rather that the plaintiff's should have brought trover and conversion: Sed non allocatur; he that abuses a distress, is a trespasser ab initio, and therefore if in trespass the defendant justifies nomine districtionis, the plaintiff may shew an abuse, and it is no departure, but makes good his declaration; and so it does in this case, for the converting is a trespass or trover at election, and the matter disclosed in the replication makes good his election, for it proves it a trespass as well as a trover.

ALLEN v. CROFOOT.

(Supreme Court of Judicature of New York, 1830. 5 Wend. 506.)

Crofoot sued Allen in a justice's court, and declared against him in trespass for entering his house in his absence and obtaining copies of papers for the purpose of commencing a suit against him. The defendant pleaded the general issue and license to enter the house. The cause was tried by a jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff for $50, for which sum the justice gave judgment. The defendant appealed to the Cortland Common Pleas, where the court charged the jury that if they should be of the opinion that the defendant had acted unfairly or improperly in obtaining copies of the papers, and had gone to the plaintiff's house with the intention of fraudulently obtaining such copies, though he had leave to enter the house, they should find for the plaintiff; but if he acted correctly and openly, and had leave to enter the house, they should find for the defendant. The defendant excepted to this charge, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with $75 damages. The defendant sued out a writ of error.[77]

SAVAGE, C. J. * * * It is also urged by the plaintiff in error that the court below erred in charging the jury that the action was sustainable, if they should find the defendant entered the plaintiff's house fraudulently, to obtain improperly copies of papers in the absence of the plaintiff. It was decided in the Six Carpenters' Case that where an authority to enter upon the premises of another is given by law, and it is subsequently abused, the party becomes a trespasser ab initio; but where such authority or license is given by the party, and it is subsequently abused, the party guilty of the abuse may be punished, but he is not a trespasser;[78] and the reason of the difference is said to be that in case of a license by law the subsequent tortious act shows quo animo he entered; and having entered with an intent to abuse the authority given by law, the entry is unlawful; but where the authority or license is given by the party, he cannot punish for that which was done by his own authority.

Whether this is not a distinction without a difference of principle, is not necessary to inquire. A better reason is given for it in Bac. Abr. tit. "Trespass," B. Where the law has given an authority, it is reasonable that it should make void everything done by the abuse of that authority, and leave the abuser as if he had done everything without authority. But where a man who was under no necessity to give an authority does so, and the person receiving the authority abuses it, there is no reason why the law should interpose to make void everything done by such abuse, because it was the man's folly to trust another with an authority who was not fit to be trusted therewith. It is contended that the license, being obtained by fraud, was void. The defendant knocked on the door and was told to walk in;[79] he was found copying certain papers; but how he obtained them, on what representation, or from whom, the evidence does not disclose. One witness does indeed testify that he said he would not have got the copies, if he had not practiced a deception on the wife and brother-in-law of the plaintiff. If this declaration should be considered evidence of his having made improper representations to obtain the papers, then the question arises: Does he thereby become a trespasser ab initio?

[78] On the origin of this distinction in the law of trespass ab initio, see Professor Ames' Article on "The History of Trover," 11 Harv. Law Rev. 276, 287–289; 3 Legal Essays, 418, 428–430.

[79] Compare: Moore v. Duke (1911) 84 Vt. 401, 80 Atl. 194: Duke, a constable with a writ of replevin for a chattel in the possession of Moore, entered Moore's lot and knocked at the door of his dwelling. Moore opened the door and invited Duke to enter. "This," said Powers, J., delivering the opinion, "is said to have amounted to a license in fact. But the breaking of the close described in the second count preceded this. It was complete when the officer stepped across the imaginary line which divided the lot from the street. * * * As evidence that Duke did not come upon the premises under a license from the plaintiff, either express or implied, it was permissible to show that he came there for the sole purpose of serving this writ." In this case, Moore's declaration against Duke was framed in two counts, one charging a trespass to the plaintiff's dwelling house, the other a trespass to the lot on which the dwelling stood.

It has been decided that to enter a dwelling-house without license is in law a trespass, Adams v. Freeman, 12 Johns. 408, 7 Am. Dec. 327, and that possession of property obtained fraudulently confers no title. Under such circumstances no change of property takes place, Woodworth v. Kissam, 15 Johns. 186; and it is argued that, as fraud vitiates everything into which it enters, a license to enter the house fraudulently obtained is void, and is no license. The principle of relation has never been applied to such a case, nor is it necessary for the purposes of justice to extend it further than to cases where the person enters under a license given him by law. In such cases, as the party injured had not the power to prevent the injury, it seems reasonable that he should be restored to all his remedies.

The judgment must be reversed without costs, and a venire de novo awarded by Cortland, C. P.

ADAMS v. RIVERS.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1851. 11 Barb. 390.)

This action was brought in a justice's court. The plaintiff declared, for that he was in possession of premises bounded by streets on two sides, and also in constructive possession to the center of each street, subject only to a public easement; that the defendant wrongfully came upon the sidewalk of the plaintiff, and there remained, using offensive, vulgar and vile language towards the plaintiff and refusing to depart. The answer pleaded a license to be upon the sidewalk. There was a verdict for the plaintiff for $20 damages, and judgment thereon. The defendant appealed to the county court, which reversed the judgment, upon the ground that evidence was admitted of the language of the defendant while on the sidewalk of a public street, and that no action for such a cause could be maintained. The plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court.[80]

WILLARD, P. J. * * * This brings us to the main question in the case, whether the defendant, by using abusive and insulting language to the plaintiff, became a trespasser from the beginning. The testimony authorized the jury to find that the defendant came on to the premises of the plaintiff, covered by the street, not in the legitimate use of the highway as a place of travel, but for the express purpose of abusing him. The opprobrious language used by the defendant was not actionable as slanderous. It was highly provoking and tended directly to a breach of the peace. It was received in evidence merely to show that the defendant was a trespasser, having forfeited his privilege by a gross abuse of it; and not indirectly to recover damages before the justice, for actionable words. It is conceded that the justice had no jurisdiction of an action of slander.

The general doctrine as laid down in the Six Carpenters' Case, 8 Co. 146, a, is that when an entry, authority or license is given to any one by the law, and he doth abuse it, he shall be a trespasser ab initio; but when an entry, authority or license is given by the party, and he abuses it, then he must be punished for the abuse, but shall not be a trespasser ab initio. * * * In all the cases put by Coke, the acts complained of as abuses of the power were distinct acts of trespass. And it seems to be the better opinion that a man cannot become a trespasser ab initio, by any act of omission, which would not itself, if not protected by a license, be the subject of trespass. * * * No case has been cited showing that a man will forfeit a license granted by law, by the use of vituperative language; and none such has fallen under my notice. In all the cases, except Adams v. Adams, and Bond v. Wilder,[81] some positive act, such as if done without authority would be a trespass, has been held essential to make the party a trespasser ab initio. These cases may have been decided upon local statutes. It is quite clear that uttering abusive language was not an act for which the plaintiff could maintain trespass against the defendant. * * *

"A highway," says Swift, Justice, in Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 132, 6 Am. Dec. 216, "is nothing but an easement, comprehending merely the right of all the individuals in the community to pass and repass, with the incidental right in the public to do all the acts necessary to keep it in repair. This easement does not comprehend any interest in the soil, nor give the public the legal possession of it." In this state, since the adoption of the Revised Statutes, the public under certain circumstances, may have a qualified right of pasturage, by certain animals at certain seasons. Griffin v. Martin, 7 Barb. 297. The use of the highway, by any person for any purpose other than to pass and repass, is a trespass upon the person who owns the fee of the road. Makepeace v. Worden, 1 N. H. 16; Babcock v. Lamb, 1 Cow. 238; Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447, 8 Am. Dec. 263. But no act will amount to a trespass unless the same act would be a trespass if committed on any other land of the plaintiff. Language, however licentious and abusive, is not a trespass, within the appropriate meaning of that term. Nor can a party be made a trespasser upon the freehold of the adjoining owners of the soil, by the uttering of abusive language as he passes along the road. A person who disturbs the public peace as he passes along the road, by singing obscene songs and using boisterous and obscene language, may be liable to be punished at the suit of the public, for a breach of the peace, but he is not liable in trespass at the suit of the adjoining owners. These acts, however censurable, are not acts of trespass.

[81] Adams v. Adams (1832) 13 Pick. (Mass.) 384, was to the effect that the omission of a distrainor to afford proper food and water to distrained cattle made the distrainor a trespasser from the beginning. In Bond v. Wilder (1844), 16 Vt. 394, it was held that if an officer levy upon property by virtue of an execution, and advertise the same for sale, and neglect to sell it upon execution, he becomes a trespasser ab initio.

The foregoing remarks show that if the action was sought to be maintained on the ground that the defendant became, while passing on the road, a trespasser from the beginning, by reason of his abusive language to the plaintiff, the action cannot be maintained. The county judge must have taken this view of the case; for one of the reasons for the reversal is that evidence was received by the justice, under objections, of the language and conversation of the defendant on the sidewalks of the public streets, and in his judgment no action could be maintained for that cause. It is presumed that the county judge supposed that the abusive language was proved, not as a substantive cause of action, but as showing that the defendant had forfeited his right to be in the highway on the plaintiff's premises; in short that he was a trespasser ab initio, by reason of his abusive conduct.

But there was another view of the case which seems to have been overlooked. * * * The defendant committed a trespass while standing on the sidewalk by the plaintiff's lot where he lived, and using towards him abusive language. While so engaged he was not using the highway for the purpose for which it was designed,[82] but was a trespasser. He stood there but about five minutes. It was not shewn that he stopped on the side walk for a justifiable cause; on the contrary it was rendered probable that it was for a base and wicked purpose. It was, therefore, a trespass. Suppose a strolling musician stops in front of a gentleman's house, and plays a tune or sings an obscene song under his window, can there be a doubt that he is liable in trespass? The tendency of the act is to disturb the peace, to draw together a crowd, and to obstruct the street. It would be no justification that the act was done in a public street. The public have no need of the highway but to pass and repass. If it is used for any other purpose not justified by law, the owners of the adjoining land are remitted to the same rights they possessed before the highway was made. They can protect themselves against such annoyances, by treating the intruders as trespassers.[83]

[82] Compare Moore v. Duke (1911) 84 Vt. 401, 80 Atl. 194: D. had entered P.'s dwelling to serve a writ of replevin. The question was whether D. had entered on P.'s implied invitation. It appeared that the dwelling was used in part as a village clerk's office. "But," said the court, "a public office like this is not public for all purposes or to all persons. It is only open to such as have legitimate business there, and this includes only such persons as have business to transact there of the kind for which the office is maintained and other matters reasonably incident thereto and in some circumstances persons whose business is merely social."

The action therefore was strictly supported by the evidence. The jury were not limited to mere compensatory damages, and the court could not have interfered, had the recovery been five times as much as it was. Merest v. Harvey, 5 Taunt. 442; Cook v. COLE v. DREW et ux.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1871. 44 Vt. 49, 8 Am. Rep. 363.)

Trespass, q. c. f. The defendant's wife, under the direction of the highway surveyor, cut the grass growing in the highway over the land of the plaintiff, that her children might go and come from school, without getting their clothes wet. She cut about fifteen or twenty pounds and carried it away and fed it to her husband's horse. The court ruled, at the trial, that the defendant was justified in cutting the grass in the highway, but that in carrying it away and feeding it to the horse, she became a trespasser ab initio; and that the rule "de minimis non curat lex" did not apply. Verdict for plaintiff for one cent damages. Defendants excepted.

Ross, J. * * * The owner of the soil over which a highway is located is entitled to the emblements growing thereon, and to the entire use of the land, except the right which the public have to use the land and the materials thereon for the purpose of building and maintaining a highway, suitable for the safe passage of travelers. This doctrine has been long established by numerous authorities. Goodtitle v. Alker, 1 Burr. 133; Holden v. Shattuck, 34 Vt. 336, 80 Am. Dec. 684; Perley v. Chandler, 6 Mass. 454, 4 Am. Dec. 159; Stackpole v. Healey, 16 Mass. 33, 8 Am. Dec. 121; Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 447, 8 Am. Dec. 263. These authorities fully establish that he may maintain trespass, or ejectment, for injuries to his rights as such owner of the soil. The public acquire only an easement in the land taken, consisting of the right to use the materials, in and upon the land taken, for building and maintaining a suitable way, and of using the way, when constructed, for passing and repassupon the highway solely for the purpose of interfering with D.'s shooting, and did there so interfere, by waving his handkerchief and opening and shutting his umbrella, and thus preventing grouse from flying toward D. On P.'s refusal to desist, D.'s servants held him down, using no more force than was necessary, until the shooting was over. P. sued for battery. D. pleaded that P. was a trespasser on his land.

Hickman v. Maisey (1900) 1 Q. B. 752: P. owned land crossed by a highway. S., a trainer of race horses, obtained from P. the right to use some of his land for the training and trial of race horses. D., the proprietor of a publication which gave accounts of the doings of race horses in training, spent an hour and a half walking backwards and forwards over a portion of the highway on P.'s land, observing with glasses and taking notes of the trials of the race horses. P. sued for a trespass on his land.

ing. The public and the highway surveyor, who is the agent of the public for certain purposes, have no right to appropriate any of the materials or emblements of the land taken to any other purpose. The defendant wife could exercise, under the authority of the highway surveyor, no greater right than those which the law has conferred on the surveyor.

The grass, though properly cut by Mrs. Drew, under the direction of the highway surveyor, because it interfered with the use of the land for the purposes of a highway, was, when cut, the property of the plaintiff. Mrs. Drew had no right to use it for feeding her husband's horse. By so doing she overstepped the license and authority which the law conferred upon the highway surveyor, and through him upon her, and made herself a trespasser ab initio. If a man abuse an authority or license given by the law he renders himself a trespasser ab initio, as it was resolved in the Six Carpenters' Case, 8 Coke, 146. She, under the authority and license given by the law to cut the grass, by feeding the grass to the horse clearly invaded a right still belonging to the plaintiff as owner of the soil. Such cutting and appropriation of the grass, under the claim of a right by the defendant for fifteen consecutive years, would furnish very strong, if not conclusive, evidence of the acquisition of the ownership of the soil, by the defendant, by adverse use. The right to take the herbage, or emblements, is about all that is left to the owner of soil burdened with the easement of a public highway. When one takes this right from him he appropriates generally the only remaining right of the owner of the soil. Such an invasion of a right, we think, always imports some damage, though no pecuniary loss results therefrom. We think Fullam v. Stearns, 30 Vt. 443, fully establishes that the maxim, "de minimis non curat lex," is never properly applied to an injury for the invasion of a right, and it does not apply to this case. The defendants insist that, under the pleadings, if the plaintiff would recover for the appropriation of the grass he should have new assigned. No such question appears to have been raised in the court below.

Judgment of the county court is affirmed.[84]

BOSTON & M. R. CO. v. SMALL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1893. 85 Me. 462, 27 Atl. 349, 35 Am. St. Rep. 379.)

The Boston & Maine Railroad Company brought an action of trespass against James W. Small, deputy sheriff, for breaking and entering one of the plaintiff's freight cars.

EMERY, J. The plaintiff corporation, as a common carrier, had in its possession, on one of its side tracks, in Biddeford, a box freight car laden with merchandise for various parties, and locked and sealed. While the car was in this situation and condition, the defendant, a deputy sheriff for York county, armed with a search warrant from the Biddeford municipal court under Rev. St. c. 27, § 40, broke the lock and door, and entered the car, in the nighttime—soon after midnight. His warrant commanded him to "therein search for intoxicating liquors, and if there found, to seize and safely keep the same, with the vessels in which they are contained, until final action and decision be had thereon." He did find in the car one barrel of intoxicating liquor, viz. a barrel of alcohol, but did not seize it, being of the opinion that it was not intended for unlawful sale. He, however, made upon the warrant the erroneous return that he searched the car, and found no intoxicating liquor. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action of trespass for the breaking into its car through the lock and door. The defendant has pleaded a justification under the warrant above described.

Assuming the complaint and warrant, and the search under them, to have been in other respects legal and regular, the question arises whether the intentional omission "to seize and safely keep," etc., the intoxicating liquors found in the car by the officer, invalidates his authority under the warrant, and leaves him a trespasser.

Though often obscured in earlier and ruder times, it is a distinctive feature of our common-law system of jurisprudence that it so jealously guards the liberty and property of the citizen against the capricious, arbitrary, or extra-legal acts of government officers, and at the same time insists upon the full performance of their legal duty. English history abounds with instances of the assertion of this principle. Two conspicuous instances are the beheading of one king for overstepping the law, and the expulsion some 50 years later of another king, partly for refusing to execute certain laws. The principle is now imbedded in the fundamental law of our republic.

Imbued with this spirit, our law requires of every ministerial officer, assuming to execute a statute or legal process against the person or property of the citizen, a strict observance of every provision of the statute, and of every lawful command in the process. The law permits to such an officer no discretion in this respect. If he once begin, he must execute the process, the whole process, and nothing but the process. Many extracts from judicial opinions could be quoted, stating this rule as strongly and comprehensively. One distinguished jurist has used judicially the following language: "A man who seizes the property or arrests the person of another, by legal process, or other equivalent authority conferred upon him by law, can only justify himself by a strict compliance with the requirements of such process or authority. If he fails to execute or return the process as thereby required, he may not, perhaps, in the strictest sense, be said to become a trespasser ab initio; but he is often called such, for his whole justification fails, and he stands as if he never had any authority to take the property, and therefore appears to have been a trespasser from the beginning." Gray, J., in Brock v. Stimson, 108 Mass. 521, 11 Am. Rep. 390. By substituting the word "injure" for the word "seize" in the above quotation, the language of Justice Gray would be literally applicable to this case.

There would seem to be no difference in principle between civil and criminal processes in this respect, and hence illustrations may properly be taken from either class of cases. In Blanchard v. Dow, 32 Me. 557, a tax collector regularly sold cattle of the plaintiff upon a tax warrant. He omitted afterwards to render "an account in writing of the sale and charges," as required by the statute and his warrant. It was held that this omission deprived him of the protection of his warrant. In Carter v. Allen, 59 Me. 296, 8 Am. Rep. 420, a tax collector, under the same circumstances, did render the account in writing, and tender the surplus, but the statement of account proved to be incorrect. It was held that this error vitiated the officer's immunity. In Ross v. Philbrick, 39 Me. 29; Brackett v. Vining, 49 Me. 356; and Smith v. Gates, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 55—it was held that an omission by an officer to execute a command in the precept, at the precise time named therein, invalidated his authority, and made him liable as a trespasser to those with whose property he had interfered under his precept. In the last-named case (Smith v. Gates) there was a variation of only 20 minutes. In Tubbs v. Tukey, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 438, 50 Am. Dec. 744, an officer arrested the plaintiff on a criminal process on Sunday, and committed him to jail. On the following Monday morning, instead of taking the plaintiff before the police court, as required by law to do, the officer assumed to discharge the plaintiff from arrest. It was held that the omission to take the plaintiff before the court took away from the officer all justification for the arrest. In Russell v. Hanscomb, 15 Gray (Mass.) 166, a fish warden, as authorized by statute, took a seine which was illegally set. He did not, however, as required by statute, begin a legal proceeding for the forfeiture. In the words of Shaw, C. J., the court held that the warden's "failure to prosecute was a departure from his authority, and, in legal effect, deprived him of his justification." In Brock v. Stimson, 108 Mass. 520, 11 Am. Rep. 390, a police officer, by authority of a statute, arrested the plaintiff for being drunk and disorderly in a public place; but instead of taking him before the court for trial, as further required by statute, he released the plaintiff from arrest as soon as he recovered from his intoxication. It was held that this disobedience of the statute took away all protection under the statute. In Phillips v. Fadden, 125 Mass. 198, upon a similar state of facts, the proposition was again asserted that, if an officer fails to do all that the law requires him to do, his whole justification fails. It has also been held, and is a familiar principle, that the omission by the officer to obey the final and formal command to make return of the precept under which he assumes to act invalidates his authority under the precept, and renders him liable to an action for anything done under it. Williams v. Babbitt, 14 Gray (Mass.) 141, 74 Am. Dec. 670; Williams v. Ives, 25 Conn. 568; Dehm v. Hinman, 56 Conn. 320, 15 Atl. 741, 1 L. R. A. 374.

In the Six Carpenters' Case, 8 Coke, 146, in which the doctrine of trespass ab initio seems to have been first formally expounded, it was said that the reason for holding a person acting under authority of law to be a trespasser ab initio by any subsequent abuse of such authority, was that his subsequent illegality showed that he began with an unlawful intent. This dictum has been often repeated in various forms. It seems, however, to be artificial, and even fictitious. An officer may often, in fact, begin with the best and most lawful intent, and yet forfeit his protection by subsequent misconduct. The more solid and sure foundation for such a rule would seem to be public policy. It is inconsistent with both private security and public order that ministerial officers should assume to determine for themselves how far, and in what manner, they will enforce a statute, or execute a process. If the safety of the citizen requires that such officers shall do no act not authorized, the safety of the people equally requires that such officers shall omit no act that is commanded.

It was further resolved in the Six Carpenters' Case that "not doing cannot make the party who has authority or license by law a trespasser ab initio, because not doing is no trespass." This dictum, also, has been often repeated, and has at times influenced judicial decisions. The reasoning may seem plausible, but in reality it is a bit of sterile, verbal syllogization. It has borne no good fruit.

It is difficult to see any difference in principle between misfeasance and nonfeasance in a ministerial officer. In either case, he is forsworn; has disobeyed the statute or process he has sworn to execute faithfully. It is the disobedience, not the act, that deprives him of his authority. The disobedience is the fatal poison which paralyzes the protecting arm of the law, and this disobedience can come as well from acts of omission as commission.

The learned editor of the American Decisions, in the notes to Barrett v. White, 3 N. H. 210, 14 Am. Dec. 365, criticises this dictum of the Six Carpenters' Case. He says the distinction seems to be merely artificial, and should not be allowed to protect a disobedient officer. He cites many cases in which, he says, the distinction has been practically disregarded. Reference is made to those notes and citations, without further quotations from them here.

The courts of Maine and Massachusetts, while sometimes alluding to or quoting this dictum, have practically ignored it when dealing with cases like this one before us. Every case above cited from the decisions of those courts were cases of nonfeasance or omission. The tax collector simply omitted to do some particular thing, either entirely or at the specified time. The police officers simply omitted to do some act required. The failure to make return of the process is a simple omission. The New Hampshire court seems to uphold the distinction drawn in the Six Carpenters' Case, for in Ordway v. Ferrin, 3 N. H. 69, it held precisely the contrary of our decision in Brackett v. Vining, 49 Me. 356. Our stricter rule is firmly established in our law, and we think, upon grounds of public policy, it is the better and more reasonable rule. While, of course, in a given case, an officer may have a sufficient, lawful excuse for his omission, the general, plain, reasonable, and necessary proposition is that a ministerial officer must faithfully obey every lawful command in the statute or process, or he will be left without its protection in any suit against him for any acts done by him under color of such statute or process. The case of Hinks v. Hinks, 46 Me. 423, in no way conflicts with this proposition, for there the defendant was not an officer, and was only exercising a private right.

Referring now to the case before us, it is evident that the principal purpose of the statute (Rev. St. 1883, c. 27, § 40), and of the process issued under it was the seizure of whatever intoxicating liquors were found, and the bringing them before the court for determination whether they were intended for unlawful sale. The authority to enter the car, and there search, was given for that express purpose. The defendant officer exercised the authority to search, but he willfully and deliberately refused to seize the intoxicating liquors he found, and made a false return that he found none. He assumed to nullify the main command of the statute and of his process. He willfully defeated the very purpose of the search he assumed to make. Such a flagrant disobedience should, and we think does, destroy the protection he might otherwise have justly enjoyed.

The good faith of the defendant—his strong belief that the intoxicating liquor he found was not intended for unlawful sale—is no excuse, and does not mitigate the penalty. As said in Guptill v. Richardson, 62 Me. 262, the fact "that it [the liquor] was not liable to forfeiture would not excuse the officer for disobedience to his precept." The command to seize the liquors was plain. His duty was plain. He was given no discretion, no power to determine what intoxicating liquors he would or would not seize. He should not have arrogated to himself any such power.

It is urged that it may at times work a great hardship upon an innocent owner, if an officer must in every case seize whatever intoxicating liquors he finds under a search warrant, however evident it is they are not intended for unlawful sale. The policy of the law is that every owner or keeper of intoxicating liquors shall be prepared to defend them before the courts, and not before the officer, against the accusation that they are intended for unlawful sale. The convenience of such owner or keeper must give way to the good of the people, and to their undoubted right to protect themselves in this way against the consequences of the traffic in such articles. At any rate, the officer must obey the law and his lawful process.

It is urged that the omission to seize the liquors in this case caused this plaintiff no special injury, however much the public may have been harmed. The search, however, did the plaintiff an injury. The lock and door of its car were broken by the defendant. He might have made that breaking official and lawful by doing his whole official duty. He saw fit, however, to disregard his precept and abandon his duty. This abandonment of duty was also an abandonment of his authority, and left him amenable for all the damage done by him to the plaintiff corporation.

Defendant defaulted. Damages assessed at $10.[85]

[85] Compare Moore v. Duke (1911) 84 Vt. 401, 80 Atl. 194: The plaintiff was clerk of the incorporated village of Plainfield, and as such had the custody of its books of record, including one which contained, among other things, the record of building permits granted by the village. These records were kept by the plaintiff at his dwelling in a certain room which he used for an office. The defendant Duke was constable of the town of Plainfield. The other defendants, Ryan and Bruffee, were, respectively, bailiff and trustee of the village. Ryan was also street commissioner. Some controversy having arisen over the building operations of one Fortney, and it being claimed by the officials that he had violated the terms of his permit, it became necessary for Ryan and Bruffee to have the record of this permit or a copy of the same. On the morning of March 8, 1910, Bruffee called at the clerk's office, and asked the clerk to loan him the book containing this record. This the clerk refused to do. A little later, Bruffee and Ryan called at the office, and asked for and examined the book, but the clerk declined to allow them to take it away from the office. Thereupon, after some spirited discussion regarding the matter, Ryan went to Montpelier and arranged with an attorney to have the book replevied. Before leaving Plainfield, he notified the constable of his intentions, and asked him to be ready to serve the writ, which was to be sent him by mail. The writ came in due time, a bond was executed and taken, and the constable went to the plaintiff's house to serve the writ. He did serve the writ, took the book thereunder, and delivered it to the plaintiffs therein—Ryan and Bruffee. He indorsed his return on the back of the writ, and sent it by mail to the attorney who made it, but it was never entered in court. Said Powers, J., delivering the opinion: "Duke's entry, when made, was for a justifiable purpose, for his process was fair and his entry without actual force; nor did anything occur while he was upon the premises to change his situation. He proceeded according to the commands of the process in all respects but one. The one thing which remained for him to do—and which was absolutely essential to make all his previous acts regular and valid—he omitted."

CHAPTER II

ABSOLUTE TORTS OTHER THAN TRESPASSES

SECTION 1.—BEFORE THE STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER THE SECOND [1]

I. Historical

Meanwhile [2] the actions which came to be known as personal make their appearance. The oldest seems to be "Debt-Detinue," which appears already in Glanvill. I say "Debt-Detinue"—originally men see little distinction between the demand for a specific chattel and the demand for a certain sum of money. Gradually this action divides itself into two, Detinue for a specific chattel, Debt for a sum of money —this differentiation takes place early in the thirteenth century. As in Detinue the judgment given for the plaintiff awards him either the chattel itself, or its value; and, as the defendant thus has the option of giving back the chattel or paying its value, Bracton is led to make the important remark, that there is no real action for chattels—an important remark, for it is the foundation of all our talk about real and personal property. To Debt and Detinue we must now add Replevin, the action for goods unlawfully taken in distress. This action we are told was invented in John's reign—another tradition ascribed its invention to Glanvill. Covenant also has appeared, though during the first half of the thirteenth century it is seldom used except in cases of what we should call leases of land for terms of years. Gradually the judges came to the opinion that the only acceptable evidence of a covenant is a sealed writing, and one of the foundations of our law of contract is thus laid. Account appears in Henry III's reign; but it is very rare and seems only used against bailiffs of manors.

But the most important phenomenon is the appearance of Trespass —that fertile mother of actions. Instances of what we can not but call actions of trespass are found even in John's reign, but I think it clear that the writ of trespass did not become a writ of course until [1] 13 Edw. I, ch. 24 (1285). Its translation, in part, is given infra.

[2] The reference is to the development of English law after the death of Henry the Second, in 1189, and before the accession of Edward the First, in 1272.

very late in Henry III's reign. Now trespass is to start with a semi-criminal action. It has its roots in criminal law, and criminal procedure.

F. W. Maitland, Equity and Forms of Actions, 342 (1909).

In the reign of Edward the First the scope of the law of tort as administered in the royal courts was narrow. * * * There were remedies against personal violence, there were remedies against forcible seizure of property, there were remedies against various frauds and other offences which might come under the notice of a court which was trying a case. It is not till these frauds and other offences have become generally actionable wherever committed that we shall see clearly the outlines of our modern law of tort.

Of other personal actions brought in the royal courts the most common were detinue, debt, covenant, and account. The writ of detinue lay for the wrongful detention of a chattel which belonged to the plaintiff. It was generally brought against a bailee. Possibly at this period it could not be brought against any other person. A person who had parted with his goods involuntarily (i. e. otherwise than by a bailment) must sue either by the appeal of larceny or, omitting the words of felony, by an action for a res adirata. It is probably not till later that the action of detinue was gradually extended to such a case. The writ of debt was originally almost one with the writ of detinue. To the end their wording was almost identical. The plaintiff seeks the restoration of money. "It was in fact a general form in which any money claim was collected, except unliquidated claims for damages by force, for which there was established the equally general remedy of trespass."

Holdsworth's Hist. Eng. Law (1909) vol. 2, p. 309.

II. Detinue—Replevin

(A) Nature of the Cause in General

The appeal, trespass, and replevin were actions ex delicto. Detinue, on the other hand, in its original form, was an action ex contractu, in the same sense that debt was a contractual action. It was founded on a bailment; that is, upon a delivery of a chattel to be redelivered.

[3] "Adirata" means gone from his hand against his will—adextratus. P. & M. ii, 160, n. 2; cp. Bracton's Note Book, case 281; Y. B. 21, 22 Edw. I (R. S.) 468; Holmes, Common Law, 168, 169; vol. iii, App. I, B (2).

[1] The cases which follow under Detinue and Replevin develop its doctrine only so far as its differentiation from Trespass and Conversion appears to be important.

The bailment might be at will or for a fixed term, or upon condition, as in the case of a pledge. The contractual nature of the action is shown in several ways. * * *

In all the cases of detinue thus far considered the action was brought by a bailor, either against the bailee or some subsequent possessor. We have now to consider the extension of detinue to cases where there was no bailment. Legal proceedings for the recovery of chattels lost were taken, in the earliest reported cases, in the popular courts. The common case was doubtless that of an animal taken as an estray by the lord of a franchise. If the lord made due proclamation of the estray, and no one claimed it for a year and a day, the lord was entitled to it. But within the year and day the loser might claim it, and if he produced a sufficient secta, or body of witnesses, to swear to his ownership or loss of the animal, it was customary for the lord to give it up, upon the owner's paying him for its keep, and giving pledges to restore it in case of any claim for the same animal being made within the year and day. There is an interesting case of the year 1234, in which after the estray had been delivered to the claimant upon his making proof and giving pledges, another claimant appeared. It is to be inferred from the report that the second claimant finally won, as he produced the better secta. If the lord, or other person in whose hands the estray or other lost chattel was found, refused to give it up to the claimant, the latter might count against the possessor for his res adirata, or chose adirree, that is, his chattel gone from his hand without his consent; or he might bring an appeal of larceny.

James Barr Ames, "The History of Trover." [5]

We must not be wise above what is written or more precise than the lawyers of the age. Here is an elementary question that was debated in the year 1292: I bail a charter for safe custody to a married woman; her husband dies; can I bring an action of detinue against her, it being clear law that a married woman can not bind herself by contract? This is the way in which that question is discussed:

Huntingdon. Sir, our plaint is of a tortious detinue of a charter which this lady is now detaining from us. We crave judgment that she ought to answer for her tort.

Lowther. The cause of your action is the bailment; and at that time she could not bind herself. We crave judgment if she must now answer for a thing about which she could not bind herself.

Spigurnel. If you had bailed to the lady thirty marks for safe custody while she was coverte for return to you when you should demand them, would she be now bound to answer? I trow not. And so in this case.

[5] First published in 11 Harv. Law Rev. 375, 379 (1898); reprinted in 3 Anglo-American Legal Essays, 432, 437.

Howard. The cases are not similar; for in a writ of debt you shall say debet, while here you shall say iniuste detinet. And again, in this case an action arises from a tortious detainer and not from the bailment. We crave judgment.

Pollock and Maitland, Hist. of Eng. Law, vol. 2, p. 180.[6]

[6] "The nature of the action of Detinue has often been the subject of discussion by the courts. And even Parliament has at different times taken different views on the subject. But the truth appears to be that Detinue was a variety of the ancient action of Debt, which was itself originally in the nature of a real action, to recover specific chattels, but, owing partly to historical, partly to economic, causes, came early to be treated as a personal action, generally founded on contract. As a natural consequence of this origin, various anomalies attached to it; one being that, until 1833, a claim in Detinue could generally be met by the primitive defence known as 'wager of law,' a defence not available against the action of Trespass, or the more modern actions founded on the Statute of Westminster the Second ('Case'). Hence Detinue tended at one time to be superseded by Trover (ante, title II), which, in many cases, is equally applicable to the facts. But after the defence of 'wager of law' had been abolished by section 13 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, there was a revival of Detinue, and, naturally, with some misunderstanding as to its nature. The action is, in fact, useful in cases in which the defendant sets up no claim of ownership, and has not been guilty of trespass; for, on the latter point especially, it is clear that it was never necessary in Detinue to allege that the defendant's original acquisition was unlawful. The typical case was that in which a bailor sued his bailee to recover the goods bailed (detinue sur bailment), there being then no action founded on simple contract; and this long remained the formal assumption in every action of Detinue; though at an early date the allegation of bailment became a mere matter of form, which could not be denied or 'traversed.' (See Gledstane v. Hewitt, ubi sup.) But allegations of finding, and even of trespass, were also admitted (detinue sur trover, etc.); and thus, as was natural, the plea of 'not guilty' was recognized, in addition to the more correct plea of 'non detinet.' * * * The action of Detinue is now apparently treated as an action of Tort. Trotter v. Windham & Co. (1907) 23 T. L. R. 676." J. C. Miles, in Jenks' Digest of Eng. Civ. Law, § 882.

See also 3 Holdsworth's Hist. of Eng. Law, 274:

"The action of Detinue, it is thought, lay originally only against a bailee, i. e. it was available only to an owner who had voluntarily parted with the possession of his goods to another. Some words of Littleton in 1455, describing a count in trover as a 'new found haliday,' are taken to mean that the action of detinue was practically confined before that date to actions against bailees.

"It is, however, difficult to believe that the rights of owners of goods were so curtailed during the fourteenth century. No doubt the action of detinue was an action which was used chiefly against bailees; and some dicta perhaps would seem to imply that the action lay only against a bailee. But such dicta, if spoken in course of an action of detinue sur bailment, would not negative a possibility of bringing such an action against some one other than a bailee. We want a precise statement to the effect that the action lies against a bailee and no one else. To borrow the precise language of the pleaders, we must have, not only an averment that an action of detinue lies only against a bailee, but also an averment that it lies only against a bailee 'sans ceo que' it lies against any one else. It is just this averment which it would probably be difficult to find."

And see especially Professor Ames' article on the History of Trover, 11 Harv. Law Rev. 375–383; 3 Anglo-American Legal Essays, 432–442. As late as 1861 detinue was classed as an action of contract. See Danby v. Lamb, 11 C. B. N. S. 423, and the opinion of Byles, J., p. 427: "According to all the authorities from Brooke's Abridgment, Joinder in Accion, pl. 97, down to the case of Walker v. Needham, 4 Scott, N. R. 222, 1 Dowl. N. S. 220 (1841), detinue has always been considered to an action ex contractu." But in 1878, and

KETTLE v. BROMSALL.

(Common Pleas, 1738. Willes, 118, 125 Reprint, 1087.)

WILLES, Lord Chief Justice, gave the opinion of the Court as follows:

Detinue. The plaintiff declares in the first count that he was possessed of a handle of a knife with an old English inscription purporting it to be a deed of gift to the monastery of St. Albans, a ring with an antique stone with one of the Cæsars' heads upon it in basso relievo, and of several other things of the like nature, particularly specified in the declaration, and laid together to be of the value of £500. as of his own proper goods; and that being so possessed he casually lost the same, and that afterwards by finding they came unto the hands and possession of the defendant, by reason whereof an action accrued to the plaintiff to demand the same of the defendant.

In the second count he declares that he delivered to the defendant the same things, specifying them again, of the value together of £500. to be safely kept and to be delivered to the plaintiff when required; that nevertheless the defendant, though often requested, has not delivered the same or any part thereof to the plaintiff, but refused and still doth refuse to deliver the same and unjustly detains them; to the plaintiff's damage of £1000. * * *[7]

Serjt. Comyns for the defendant took three objections, two to the declaration and one to the replication. * * * [The second was:] That the first count is in trover, and the second in detinue; and that trover and detinue cannot be joined. That if the first be taken to be in trover, there is no conversion; and if in detinue, there is no demand; and consequently that it cannot be good in either. To shew that trover and detinue cannot be joined he cited 8 Co. 87b, Buckmere's case; because they require different pleas.[8]

But we are all of opinion that this objection will not hold; for that both counts are in detinue. Detinue will lie for things lost and found as well as for things delivered; so it is expressly laid down in Fitz.

apparently since then, in England, detinue is recognized as a cause in tort. See Bryant v. Herbert (1878) 3 C. P. D. 389, C. A.; Du Pasquier v. Cadbury Jones & Co. (1903) 1 K. B. 104, C. A.; Keates v. Woodward (1902) 1 K. B. 332, 336.

For the American doctrine see 14 Cyc. 241, and note 4; 16 Cent. Dig. "Detinue," § 1; Key-No. "Detinue," § 1.

[7] The pleadings terminated in a demurrer to the replication, and joinder therein. Only so much of the case is given as relates to the objection to the declaration.

[8] "Not only the pleas, but the judgments also, are different; in trover only damages can be recovered, but in detinue the things themselves, or their value, may be recovered. And two counts cannot be joined in the same declaration unless the same judgment may be given on both. Brown v. Dixon, D. & E. 276. See also Gilb. Hist. C. B. 6, 7."

In the principal case, the court takes it as established law that trover and detinue cannot be joined.—[Ed.

N. B. tit. "Detinue" (E), a book of the greatest authority. * * * And it would be very absurd if it were otherwise; for if so, a person might be greatly injured, and have no adequate remedy. For in trover only damages can be recovered; but the things lost may be of that sort, as medals, pictures, or other pieces of antiquity, (and this seems to be the present case,) that no damages can be an adequate satisfaction, but the party may desire to recover the things themselves, which can only be done in detinue. * * * [9]

As therefore we are of opinion that the objections would not hold either to the declaration or the replication, judgment was given for the plaintiff.[10] [9] "'Detinue,' this is a very old action. The defendant is charged with an unjust detainer (not, be it noted, an unjust taking)—injuste detinet. This action looks very like a real action. The writ originating it bears a close similarity with the writ of right (præcipe in capite), but in the first place the mesne process is not in rem, and in the second (and this is very important) the defendant when worsted is always allowed the option of surrendering the goods or paying assessed damages. The reason of this may perhaps be found partly in the perishable character of medieval movables, and the consequent feeling that the court could not accept the task of restoring them to their owners, and partly in the idea that all things had a 'legal price' which, if the plaintiff gets, is enough for him." F. W. Maitland, "Equity and Forms of Action," 355.

See also Phillips v. Jones (1850) 15 Q. B. 859, 867, and Somerset v. Cookson (1735) 3 P. Wms. 390: (P. brought an injunction to compel the delivery of an old altar-piece made of silver and remarkable for a Greek inscription and dedication to Hercules. The altar piece had been sold without right by S. to D., a goldsmith, who had notice of D.'s claim to it. D. insisted that P. could have adequate relief without detinue. P. insisted that "nothing can be more reasonable than that the man, who by wrong detains my property, shall be compelled to restore it to me again in specie: and the law being defective in this particular such defect is properly supplied in equity." Held, that an injunction might be granted.)

[10] "Detinue by a loser against a finder would probably have come into use much earlier but for the fact * * * that the loser might bring trespass against a finder who refused to restore the chattel on request. Indeed, in 1455, where a bailiff alleged simply his possession, and that the charters came to the defendant by finding, Prisot, C. J., while admitting that a bailor might have detinue against any possessor of goods lost by the bailee, expressed the opinion that where there was no bailment the loser should not bring detinue, but trespass, if, on demand, the finder refused to give up the goods. Littleton insisted that detinue would lie, and his view afterwards prevailed. It was in this case that Littleton, in an aside, said: 'This declaration per inventionem is a new-found Halliday; for the ancient declaration and entry has always been that the charters ad manus et possessionem devenerunt generally without showing how.' Littleton was quite right on this point. But the new fashion persisted, and detinue sur trover came to be the common mode of declaring wherever the plaintiff did not found the action upon a bailment to the defendant." Ames, History of Trover, 11 Harv. Law Rev. 375, 381; 3 Anglo-Am. Legal Essays, 439.

And see the note, 3 Anglo-Am. Leg. Essays, p. 440: "Littleton's remark seems to have been misapprehended in 2 Pollock & Maitland, 174. The innovation was not in allowing detinue where there was no bailment, but in describing the defendant as a finder."

MILLS v. GRAHAM.

(Common Pleas, 1804. 1 Bos. & Pul. [N. R.] 141, 127 Reprint, 413, 8 R. R. 767.)

The declaration was as follows:

The defendant was summoned to answer unto a plea, that he, the said defendant, render unto the said plaintiff certain goods and chattels, to the value of £300 of lawful money of Great Britain, which the defendant unjustly detains from the plaintiff; and thereupon the plaintiff, by R. H. his attorney, complains for that whereas the plaintiff, heretofore, to wit, on, etc., at, etc., delivered to the defendant the goods and chattels following, that is to say, 75 dozen of skins of the said plaintiff of a large value, to wit, of the value of £300, of lawful money of Great Britain, to be redelivered by the said defendant to the said plaintiff when he should be thereto requested; and nevertheless the said defendant, although thereto often requested, hath not yet delivered the said goods and chattels, or any of them, or any part thereof, to the said plaintiff, but hath hitherto refused and still doth refuse to deliver the same to the said plaintiff, to wit, at, etc. And whereas the said plaintiff heretofore, to wit, on, etc., at, etc., was lawfully possessed of divers other goods and chattels, to wit, 75 dozen of other skins of a large value, to wit, of the value of £300 of like lawful money, and being so thereof possessed, the said plaintiff afterwards, to wit, on, etc., at, etc., casually lost the said last-mentioned goods and chattels out of his hands and possession, and the same then and there came to the hands and possession of the said defendant, who found the same; nevertheless the said defendant, well knowing the said last-mentioned goods and chattels to be the goods and chattels of the said plaintiff, and to him of right to belong and appertain, had not as yet delivered the said last-mentioned goods and chattels, or any of them, or any part thereof, to the said plaintiff, although often requested so to do, but hath hitherto refused, and still doth refuse to deliver the same to the said plaintiff, and now unjustly detains the same from the said plaintiff, to wit, at, etc., whereupon the said plaintiff saith he is injured, and hath sustained damage to the amount of £300 and therefore he brings his suit, etc.

On the trial, before Sir James Mansfield, C. J., after a plea of non detinet, it appeared that the defendant, being desirous of purchasing some skins, applied to the plaintiff to sell him some, which the latter declined, but agreed to let him have skins to the amount of £275. to finish, for the finishing of which the plaintiff was to pay; that the skins having been delivered accordingly, the plaintiff afterwards applied to the defendant to return them, offering to pay anything that might be due; that the defendant refused to return them, and again wished to purchase them, offering to pay the price by instalments of £5. a month; that the plaintiff still refusing to sell them, the defendant declared that he would contest the matter at law, as he was under age, which was the case.

His Lordship was of opinion that the first count of the declaration, which stated a bailment of goods to be redelivered upon request, was not supported by evidence of a bailment for a special purpose, but held, that notwithstanding this infancy of the defendant, and an objection to the allegation on the second count, that the goods came to his hands by finding, the plaintiff was entitled to recover upon that count. Accordingly a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court. Afterwards a rule nisi for a nonsuit was obtained. * * *

CHAMBRE, J. The action of detinue is as old as any action known to the law, and yet it is rather extraordinary that the subject of objection in the present case has never been brought into question. Many cases might be put to which an action of detinue could not apply, unless this general mode of declaring were allowed. Only three modes of stating the inducement appear by the entries to have been used. One is on a bailment, another on finding, and a third on purchase. But the precedents do not comprehend half the cases which might arise. Suppose a bailment were made to A., and that the goods, after passing through several hands, come into the hands of B. Could it be necessary to trace the progress of the goods through all the hands into which they had passed? In this case, I believe that the practice has been to declare upon a finding, as has been done in the present case. I am not certain that the finding has not been literally proved in this case; for it is not clear that the word "finding" is to be confined to the sense of picking up a thing which has been casually lost. The form of proceeding in trover is very material on this point, and seems to warrant us in considering the finding merely as inducement. To the present day, no case has ever arisen in which it has been thought necessary, upon the plea of non detinet, to prove precisely the finding alleged. * * *[11] I entirely concur in thinking that sufficient proof has been given to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

Rule discharged.

REEVE v. PALMER.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1858. 5 C. B. [N. S.] 84, 141 Reprint, 33, 116 R. R. 573. Exchequer Chamber, 1859. 5 C. B. [N. S.] 91, 141 Reprint, 36, 116 R. R. 577.)

Detinue for title-deeds, with a count for money received. To the first count the defendant pleaded, amongst other pleas, non detinet, and that the deeds were not the plaintiff's; and to the second, never indebted and a set off. The facts appearing on the trial were as follows:

The defendant was an attorney at Cambridge. The deeds in respect of which the action was brought had been left in the defendant's custody as attorney for the plaintiff. At the trial, there was only one deed in contest [11] The argument of counsel, part of the opinion of Chambre, J., and the concurring opinions of Sir James Mansfield, C. J., and Heath and Rooke, JJ., are omitted. The statement is slightly abridged.

Compare Walker v. Jones (1834) 2 Cr. & M. 672: In an action of detinue "the defendant pleaded a plea traversing the delivery; to which there was a demurrer." On the argument Comyn, for the defendant, stated that the plea had been drawn from a precedent in Chitty (3 Chitty Pl. [4th Ed.] 1028), but that, after the case of Gledstone v. Hewitt (1831) 1 C. & J. 565, from which it appeared that the bailment in detinue was immaterial, he could not support the plea.

between the parties, the rest having been delivered up to the plaintiff after the commencement of the action. There was no evidence as to what had become of the missing deed, or how it was lost, except that the defendant stated that he had not seen it since the date of its execution in 1853. When the demand was made in 1857, the defendant claimed a certain sum for costs, which the plaintiff paid under protest.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on the second count, with £85. damages, and for the defendant upon the first count, the jury leaving it in doubt whether the loss of the deed occurred before or after the demand.

David Keane, for the plaintiff, obtained a rule calling upon the defendant to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff on the issues on the first count, for £15. damages, pursuant to leave reserved to him at the trial, on the grounds,—first, that the defendant, as the immediate bailee of the deed, was answerable in detinue though he had lost the deed.

WILLIAMS, J. * * * All the authorities, from the most ancient time, show that it is no answer to an action of detinue, when a demand is made for the re-delivery of the chattel, to say that the defendant is unable to comply with the demand by reason of his own breach of duty.[12] In the present case, the deed which is the subject of the demand in the first count was delivered to the defendant under circumstances which made it his duty to use ordinary care that it should be forthcoming when wanted. By the defendant's omission to perform that duty, the deed was not forthcoming when demanded. It clearly is no answer for the defendant to say he has lost it. The rule must be made absolute to enter the verdict for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed against this decision, and the case came on for argument in the Exchequer Chamber, before Pollock, C. B., Crompton, J., Martin, B., Bramwell, B., Watson, B., and Hill, J.[13]

[12] "Inability to redeliver was indeed urged in one case as an objection to the action, although the inability was due to the active misconduct of the defendant: 'Brown. If you bail to me a thing which is wastable, as a tun of wine, and I perchance drink it up with other good fellows, you cannot have detinue, inasmuch as the wine is no longer in rerum natura, but you may have account before auditors, and the value shall be found.' This, Newton, C. J., denied, saying detinue was the proper remedy. It may be urged that the detinue in this case was founded upon a tort. But in truth the gist of the action was the refusal to deliver on request." Ames, History of Trover, 11 Harv. Law Rev. 375; 3 Anglo-Am. Legal Essays, 433.

[13] The arguments of counsel and the opinion of Cockburn, C. J., with whom Williams and Willis, JJ., in the Common Pleas concurred, are omitted. In the Exchequer Chamber, the opinions of Pollock, C. B., Crompton, J., and Watson, B., are omitted.

And see Wilkinson v. Verity (1871) L. R. 6 C. P. 206: P. delivered to D. certain goods for safe-keeping. D. wrongfully sold them. More than six years after the date of the sale, P., being still in ignorance of this sale, demanded the goods of D., who refused to return them. Held, in an action of detinue for the goods, that the statute of limitations ran from the date of the demand and refusal, and not from the date of the sale. For the historical explanation of this, see Ames' History of Trover, 11 Harv. Law Rev. 376; 3 Anglo-Am. Leg. Essays, 433.

BRAMWELL, B. If there had been anything more important in dispute here than a mere question of costs, I should have liked to look into it a little more before deciding it. If the defendant has by his own default become dispossessed of or lost the deed, it may be that he may be considered as having wrongfully detained it. I am not prepared to say that there was sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. All that appears, is, that the deed was deposited with him by his client, and that it is lost. I must confess I have not information enough about the matter to say whether the judgment of the Court below was right or not.

HILL, J. It is conceded that detinue will lie against one who has parted with a deed which has been intrusted to him for safe custody. I am utterly at a loss to discover any difference between the case of an attorney who has lost a deed intrusted to him for safe custody, without any explanation as to the circumstances under which it was lost, and an attorney who has voluntarily parted with the deed to a third person. In Comyns's Digest, Pleader (2 X, 12), speaking of this form of action, where the deed has been lost, the Chief Baron says: "If detinue be for charters, the verdict must find some damages if the charters be lost," citing Fisher v. ———, Saville, 29. I think the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

NYBERG v. HANDELAAR.

(In the Court of Appeal [1892] 2 Q. B. 202.)

The action was brought to recover the value of a half-share in a gold enamel box jointly owned by the plaintiff and one Frankenheim, or a return of the box and damages for its detention. The plaintiff in the year 1889 purchased the box, and afterwards sold a half-share in it to Frankenheim, and it was agreed between them that the plaintiff should retain possession of the box until it should be sold. At a later period the box was entrusted by the plaintiff to Frankenheim for the purpose of being taken to Christie's Auction Rooms, where it was to be sold. Frankenheim owed the defendant money, and delivered the box to the defendant by way of security for the debt. On the trial, the jury found that Frankenheim pledged his half-share in the box with the defendant for value, and the learned judge on further consideration gave judgment for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed in trover or detinue, and that the special agreement that the plaintiff and not Frankenheim was to have possession of the box did not do away with the right of property which the latter passed to the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

LOPES, L. J. The law of detinue, in my opinion, is that a person entitled to possession of a personal chattel can maintain the action when he has a right to immediate possession arising out of an absolute or special property in the chattel. I have great difficulty in seeing how a person can have a right to the immediate possession of a chattel without having some special property in it. A joint owner of goods cannot maintain an action for the conversion of the goods against his co-owner in respect of any act of the latter consistent with his ownership. It follows that the plaintiff could not, in the absence of any agreement as to possession of the box, have recovered it from the defendant. But there was an agreement that he should be entitled to the possession of the box until such time as it might be sold. What happened was that the plaintiff entrusted Frankenheim with the box to take it to Christie's, where it was to have been sold. This Frankenheim did not do, but handed the box to the defendant as security for a debt of his own. This transaction amounted to a bailment to Frankenheim for a special purpose, which he did not carry out, and on failure of the trust the plaintiff's right to immediate possession accrued at once. I dissent, therefore, from the judgment of the Court below, and think the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.[14]

ANDERSON v. GOULDBERG.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1892. 51 Minn. 294, 53 N. W. 636.)

Replevin to recover certain logs. Verdict for plaintiff. The defendants appeal from an order denying a new trial.

MITCHELL, J. It is settled by the verdict of the jury that the logs in controversy were not cut upon the land of the defendants, and consequently that they were entire strangers to the property. For the purposes of this appeal, we must also assume the fact to be (as there was evidence from which the jury might have so found) that the plaintiffs obtained possession of the logs in the first instance by trespassing upon the land of some third party. Therefore the only question is whether bare possession of property, though wrongfully obtained, is sufficient title to enable the party enjoying it to maintain replevin against a mere stranger, who takes it from him. We had supposed that this was settled in the affirmative as long ago, at least, as the early case of Armory v. Delamirie,[15] so often cited on that point. When it is said that to maintain replevin the plaintiff's possession must have been lawful, it means merely that it must have been lawful as against the person who deprived him of it; and possession is good title against all the world except those having a better title. Counsel says that possession only raises a presumption of title, which, however, may be rebutted. Rightly understood, this is correct; but counsel misapplies it.

[14] The arguments of counsel are omitted. The concurring opinion of Fry, L. J., is omitted.

[15] 1 Strange, 504 (1722). As to the facts in this case, see infra, under Trover and Conversion.

One who takes property from the possession of another can only rebut this presumption by showing a superior title in himself, or in some way connecting himself with one who has. One who has acquired the possession of property, whether by finding, bailment, or by mere tort, has a right to retain that possession as against a mere wrongdoer who is a stranger to the property. Any other rule would lead to an endless series of unlawful seizures and reprisals in every case where property had once passed out of the possession of the rightful owner.

Order affirmed.

Error of a judgment in detinue in the Common Pleas. * * *

NIBLET v. SMITH.

(Court of King's Bench, 1792, 4 T. R. 504, 100 Reprint, 1144.)

This was a replevin for taking the goods and chattels, to wit, one lime-kiln, etc., of the plaintiff; to which there was an avowry for rent in arrear. The plaintiff, in his plea in bar, said, that the lime-kiln before and at the said time when, etc., was affixed to the freehold of the piece or parcel of ground on which, etc., and as such was by law exempt from any distress for the arrears of rent in the avowry mentioned, and ought not to have been distrained for the same, etc. To this plea the defendant demurred generally.

Holroyd in support of the demurrer. The lime-kiln being affixed to the freehold, no replevin will lie for it; for if the defendant should succeed, it could not be delivered to him under the writ of retorno habendo. In Co. Lit. 145b, it is said, that a replevin lies for goods and chattels only; and a lime-kiln is as much affixed to the freehold as doors, windows, or a furnace which are always considered as belonging to the freehold. Bro. Abr. "Chattels," pl. 7.

THE COURT were of opinion that the plea in bar could not be supported, because it was a departure from the declaration. That the declaration, treating the lime-kiln as a chattel, might possibly have been true, because lime may be burnt in a portable oven, and the kiln need not therefore necessarily be affixed to the freehold: but that, as the plea in bar stated it to be affixed to the freehold, it was inconsistent with the declaration.

MENNIE v. BLAKE.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1856. 6 El. & Bl. 842, 119 Reprint, 1078, 106 R. R. 822.)

Replevin. Plea: non cepit. Issue thereon.

The cause came on to be tried before Crowder, J., at the last Spring Assizes for Devon. The following account of the facts which then appeared in evidence is taken from the judgment of this Court.

"One Facey was indebted to the plaintiff. He brought him £15. towards payment of the debt, but requested and obtained permission to lay the money out in the purchase of a horse and cart, which were to be the property of the plaintiff, but of which Facey was to have the possession and the use, subject to such occasional use as plaintiff might require to have of them, and to their being given up to plaintiff when he should demand them. Accordingly Facey made the purchase: the possession and the use were substantially with him: he fed, stabled and took care of the horse: there was some evidence that his name was on the front of the cart; certainly plaintiff's was on the side; under what circumstances placed there the evidence was contradictory, the plaintiff alleging it to have been placed in the ordinary way as an evidence of property, the defendant insinuating that it was so placed in order to protect it from Facey's other creditors. It is not however material, because on the one hand the plaintiff's property we take to be indisputable, and on the other we do not think there is evidence enough to charge the defendant with fraud or collusion in the circumstances under which he obtained possession, and which we now proceed to state.

"Facey determined to emigrate; and the defendant knew of his intention; but the plaintiff did not. The horse and cart were used in transporting Facey's effects to the pier at which he was to embark; and the defendant, to whom he owed money for fodder supplied to the horse went with him to procure payment if he could: at parting Facey delivered the horse and cart to him, telling him to take them for the debt, but adding that he owed the plaintiff money also, and that, if he would discharge the debt due to the defendant, which was much less than their value, he was to give them up to him. In this manner the defendant acquired his possession. The plaintiff for some time remained in ignorance of what had passed; and afterwards, coming to the knowledge of it, demanded them; but the defendant refused to deliver them unless his debt were paid; whereupon the plaintiff proceeded to replevy the goods, and brought the present action."

Upon these facts the learned Judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendant or a nonsuit, if under such circumstances replevin did not lie.

[17] Accord: Ricketts v. Dorrel (1876) 55 Ind. 470: (Replevin to recover fence rails which D. has unlawfully taken from the possession of P. and used in the construction of a fence on D.'s land.)

Compare Silsbury v. McCoon (1850) 3 N. Y. 379, 53 Am. Dec. 307: (A quantity of corn was taken from the owner by a willful trespasser and by him converted into whisky.)

Montague Smith, in the ensuing term, obtained a rule nisi accordingly.

COLERIDGE, J. * * * The question raised is, whether there was any taking of the horse and cart from the plaintiff by the defendant? And we are of opinion, looking to the nature and purpose of the action of replevin, that there was no taking in the sense in which that word must be understood in this issue. The whole proceeding of replevin, at common law, is distinguished from that in trespass in this, among other things: that, while the latter is intended to procure a compensation in damages for goods wrongfully taken out of the actual or constructive possession of the plaintiff, the object of the former is to procure the restitution of the goods themselves; and this it effects by preliminary ex parte interference by the officer of the law with the possession. This being done, the action of replevin, apart from the replevin itself, is again distinguished from trespass by this, that, at the time of declaring, the supposed wrongful possession has been put an end to, and the litigation proceeds for the purpose of deciding whether he, who by the supposition was originally possessed, and out of whose possession the goods were taken, and to whom they have been restored, ought to retain that possession, or whether it ought to be restored to the defendant. Blackstone (3 Comm. 146), after observing that the Mirror ascribes the invention of this proceeding to Glanvil, says that it "obtains only in one instance of an unlawful taking, that of a wrongful distress." If by this expression he only meant that in practice it was not usual to have recourse to replevin except in the case of a distress alleged to be wrongful, he was probably justified by the fact. But there are not wanting authorities to shew that the remedy by replevin was not so confined; and in the case of Shannon v. Shannon, 1 Sch. & Lef. 324, 327, Lord Redesdale finds fault with this passage, saying that the definition is "too narrow," and that "many old authorities will be found in the books of replevin being brought where there was no distress." * * *

From a review of these and other authorities which might be added, it may appear not settled whether originally a replevy lay in case of other takings than by distress. Nor is it necessary to decide that question now; for, at all events, it seems clear that replevin is not maintainable unless in a case in which there has been first a taking out of the possession of the owner. This stands upon authority and the reason of the thing. We have referred already to a dictum of Lord Redesdale. Three cases are to be found—Ex parte Chamberlain, 1 Sch. & Lef. 320, In re Wilson's, 1 Sch. & Lef. 320, note (a), and Shannon v. Shannon, 1 Sch. & Lef. 324—in which the law is so laid down by Lord Redesdale. And these are cases of great authority; for that very learned Judge found the practice in Ireland the other way. He felt the inconvenience and injustice of it: he consulted with the Lord Chief Justice and obtained the opinion of the other Judges, and then pronounced the true rule, which, in one of these cases, In re Wilson's, 1 Sch. & Lef. 320, note (a), he thus states: The writ of replevin "is merely meant to apply to this case, viz. where A. takes goods wrongfully from B. and B. applies to have them redelivered to him upon giving security until it shall appear whether A. has taken them rightfully. But if A. be in possession of goods, in which B. claims a property, this is not the writ to try that right." In the course of these cases his Lordship points out how replevin proceeds against the general presumption of law in favour of possession; how it casts upon him who was in possession the burthen of first proving his right; and he puts (Ex parte Chamberlain, 1 Sch. & Lef. 322), as a reductio ad absurdum, a case not unlike the present. "Suppose," says he, "the case of a person having a lien on goods in his possession, and who insists on being paid before he delivers them up: I do not see on the principles insisted on, why a writ of replevin may not issue in that case." The reason of the thing is equally decisive: as a general rule it is just that a party in the peaceable possession of land or goods should remain undisturbed, either by the party claiming adversely or by the officers of the law, until the right be determined and the possession shewn to be unlawful. But, where, either by distress or merely by a strong hand, the peaceable possession has been disturbed, an exceptional case arises; and it may be just that, even before any determination of the right, the law should interpose to replace the parties in the condition in which they were before the act done, security being taken that the right shall be tried, and the goods be forthcoming to abide the decision. Whatever may be thought of Lord Coke's etymology, what he says of replegiare, while it shews his understanding of the law, gives a true account of what replevin is, a redelivery to the former possessor on pledges found. But this is applicable clearly to exceptional cases only. If, wherever a party asserts a right to goods in the peaceable possession of another, he has an election to take them from him by a replevin, it is obvious that the most crying injustice might not infrequently result. Now, in the present case, Facey was not the servant of the plaintiff; nor was his possession merely the possession of the plaintiff; he was the bailee of the plaintiff, and had a lawful possession from the delivery of the owner, which conferred on him a special property. This did not authorize him to transfer his possession to the defendant; nor could he give him a lien for his debt against the paramount right of the true owner the bailor: after a demand and refusal, upon the admitted facts in this case, the plaintiff could clearly have maintained trover against the defendant; but yet there was nothing wrongful in his accepting the possession from Facey; he acquired that possession neither by fraud nor violence; at least none is found, and we cannot presume either; and he retained the possession on a ground which might justify the retainer until the alleged ownership was proved. This therefore, in our opinion, was a case in which the plaintiff could not proceed by replevin, but should have proved his prior right in trover or detinue. * * *

The rule should be absolute, not to enter a verdict, but a nonsuit.[18]

MAXHAM v. DAY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1860. 16 Gray, 213, 77 Am. Dec. 409.)

Action of tort against a deputy sheriff for refusing to serve a writ of replevin, sued out by the plaintiff against George Spring, to recover possession of a diamond pin with gold settings.

At the trial in the superior court, it appeared that, when the officer was asked to serve the writ of replevin, Spring was wearing the pin as a personal ornament in the bosom of his shirt, with his coat buttoned over it so as to conceal it from sight, and threatened resistance if the officer should attempt to take it from him. Lord, J., ruled that these facts did not excuse the officer, and he alleged exceptions.

BIGELOW, C. J. Replevin at common law is founded on the wrongful taking of personal property; and is a remedy, by which the person, from whom goods or chattels are taken, may be restored to the possession of them until the question of title can be judicially tried and determined. * * *

In our practice it is often resorted to, instead of an action of trespass or trover, as a simple and convenient method of trying the title to goods and chattels. It is a purely personal action, which any party may commence, as of right, by suing out a writ, without preliminary oath or other formality, in like manner as other civil suits are brought. Its peculiar and distinguishing characteristic is, that it takes the property in controversy from him who by his possession of it is prima facie its owner, and places it in the hands of the plaintiff, substituting in its stead a personal security in the form of a bond to the defendant for its return if such shall be the final judgment of the court.

But although replevin is at common law a general remedy to recover property wrongfully taken, it does not follow that it is of universal application, so that it can be effectively used in all cases, whatever may be the condition or situation of the property. Remedies are always to be used and applied in subordination to the great principles of right, which it is the object of the law primarily to secure and protect. Re-

[18] Part of the opinion is omitted. See Ames, The History of Trover, 11 Harv. Law Rev. 374; 3 Anglo-Am. Legal Essays, 431. See also 34 Cyc. 1352–1354, 1359, notes 14 and 16, to the general effect that in many states of the Union, either with or without the aid of a statute, replevin has become concurrent with detinue.

That replevin now lies where trespass or trover can be maintained, see 34 Cyc. 1355. And, in general, 42 Cent. Dig. § 1, and 17 Dec. Dig. § 1; Key-No. "Replevin," § 1.

dress is not to be obtained by doing a wrong. A person cannot use the process of law in vindication of his own rights in such way as to invade those of another. To illustrate: A creditor can in certain cases arrest the body of his debtor; this is a clear legal right; but it cannot be exercised by a forcible entry of the debtor's dwelling, because such an act would infringe on another right equally clear, by which a man's house is made a place of shelter and repose, which no one armed only with civil process can break into or disturb. So a criminal is liable to arrest and to have his person and premises searched; the good order and safety of the community require that this right should be enforced; but it cannot be done without warrant under oath, specially designating the person and object of search and arrest, because that would be contrary to the right of every person to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures. The truth is, that in determining whether a particular remedy is applicable or appropriate in any case, it is not sufficient to consider whether it will be effectual to redress the grievance or vindicate the right of one party. An equally essential and necessary inquiry is to ascertain whether it can be employed without an infringement of the rights and privileges of the other party. If it cannot be, then it follows that the law will not sanction it. There are cases, no doubt, in which legal process, lawfully used, may cause inconvenience and hardship, and even operate oppressively on those against whom it is directed; but we know of no case in which it can be legitimately made the instrument of wrong, or the means by which private rights can be invaded or taken away.

It seems to us, on careful consideration, that this action cannot be maintained without coming in conflict with this plain and elementary principle. The proposition on which the plaintiff must rest his case amounts, when examined, to this: that on a process in its nature purely civil an officer is bound to seize and search the person of the defendant. The statement of such a proposition carries with it a sufficient refutation. Its practical recognition would lead to a palpable infraction of the cardinal principle by which, under our constitution and laws, the sanctity of the person is guarded from unfounded and groundless searches and arrests. There is nothing in the nature of a writ of replevin, which gives to it any efficiency or power over the person, superior to other civil process. It may be sued out at the will of any person who sees fit to assert a title to property in the possession of another; no oath or other sanction is required to prevent its misuse or abuse; even the right of property, which it seeks to establish, may on investigation prove to be wholly without foundation. How then can it be contended that it confers on an officer an authority, which cannot be exercised even under a criminal process, except when it is verified by oath and issued with the formalities required by the constitution and laws?

Certainly no precedent or authority has been cited, and none, we believe, can be found, that sustains the doctrine which the plaintiff must establish in order to maintain this action. In England, as we have already said, the process of replevin is used only in cases where property has been distrained, for the purpose of trying the legality of the seizure, and is confined chiefly, if not entirely, to beasts of the field and of the plough, implements of husbandry, household goods, and other chattels, not found or used on the person; and in Ireland, where the writ of replevin at common law is still a common remedy to try the title of goods and chattels in any way wrongfully taken, no case is found in which it has been used for the purpose of taking articles of clothing, or of personal use or adornment, from the person of the defendant. In a matter of this sort, relating, as it does, to the extent of the power conferred on an officer in the service of a process known to the common law from the earliest period, we regard the entire absence of authority in support of the right claimed by the plaintiff to be a strong argument against its existence. * * *

The exercise of such a power is not only contrary to right and unsupported by authority, but it is also inconsistent with sound policy. Practical jurisprudence looks, in the application of remedies, to the peace, good order and decorum of society. The evils which would flow from the unrestricted use of a civil process to search the person and to seize from it articles of dress or use or ornament are obvious and manifold. It would bring the officer of law in direct contact with the citizen, under circumstances well calculated to excite irritation and anger, and lead directly to breaches of the peace. It would place in the hands of wicked and evil disposed persons the means of annoyance and injury, and the power to interfere wantonly and without just cause with the most sacred rights of the person. If the right exists at all, it cannot be limited to particular articles of use or adornment, but must extend to every article of apparel worn by persons of either sex, and might be lawfully exercised at the sacrifice of decency and the proprieties of life. The reasons on which the restraint upon the power of taking articles from the person by distress or by attachment and execution is founded apply with equal force to the right to take them by replevin. Sunbolf v. Alford, 3 M. & W. 248; Mack v. Parks, 8 Gray, 517, 69 Am. Dec. 267.

Nor is there any necessity for giving such a remedy to recover property of this nature. A bill in equity under Rev. Sts. c. 81, § 8 (Gen. Sts. c. 113, § 2), to compel the redelivery of goods or chattels taken or detained from the owner and withheld so that the same cannot be replevied, would afford ample redress in all cases where the property is so situated that it cannot be taken without an interference with the person.

Exceptions sustained.

At a second trial in the superior court, the plaintiff conceded that, when the defendant was asked to serve the replevin writ, the pin was affixed to the bosom of Spring's shirt, in the manner in which breast-pins are usually worn; but offered to prove that Spring had placed it there, not as an article of wearing apparel or personal ornament, but for the sole purpose of keeping it out of the reach of legal process, knowing that he had no valid title to it; and that the defendant might have seized it. But Morton, J., excluded the evidence, and ruled that, under the circumstances conceded and offered to be proved, the defendant was excused from serving the writ of replevin. The plaintiff submitted to a verdict for the defendant, and alleged exceptions, which were argued at October term, 1861.

Hoar, for the plaintiff. The plaintiff refers to the authorities and suggestions at the first argument. The question now presented is whether any article small enough to be kept by a defendant on his person is irrepleviable. Can a landlord distrain his tenant's watch for rent, and by keeping it on his person prevent the legality of the distress from being tested? If a child, too young to be punished for larceny, seizes in a jeweller's shop a valuable diamond, is there no legal process by which the possession can be restored to the proper owner?

BIGELOW, C. J. The facts now offered to be proved in support of this action do not change the result at which we arrived in considering the case as presented at the former hearing. It was then determined that replevin did not lie at common law for articles of dress or personal adornment, alleged to have been unlawfully taken, and which were actually worn on the person at the time when the service of the writ of replevin was attempted. The necessity of securing immunity to the person from unreasonable searches and seizures, and the impolicy of allowing an unlimited power to an officer to take on civil process articles worn on the person, forbid the extension of the remedy by replevin to property so used and situated. A bill in equity for property unlawfully withheld affords an ample remedy to recover possession of property of such a nature.[19]

Exceptions overruled.

SAGER v. BLAIN.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1871. 44 N. Y. 445.)

Appeal from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, in the second district, granting a new trial and reversing an order of the City Court of Brooklyn, denying a new trial.

The action was replevin, to recover possession of certain United States treasury notes, particularly described in the complaint, "and also the sum of $9,112.19, delivered by Charles Meigs & Son to the defendant, with damages for the withholding thereof."

The testimony being closed, the court charged the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this action the $9,112.19 claimed in the complaint, and directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, Rhoda E. Blain, for that amount; to which charge and direction the plaintiff's counsel excepted.[20]

HUNT, C. The embarrassments of this case have arisen, chiefly, from the selection of an improper form of action. The plaintiff, claiming to have purchased from the defendant, Isaac W. Blain, several government bonds, and a balance of money theretofore paid by Messrs. Meigs & Co. to his wife, upon his order, commences an action of replevin, to obtain this property from Mrs. Blain. The government bonds are specific articles, distinguishable from all others of a like character by dates and numbers. As to these, an action of replevin for their recovery was well enough. The plaintiff desired to avail himself of the advantages which the law gives when the defendant improperly withholds property belonging to the plaintiff. One of these was the right of seizing the property in advance, and retaining it until the defendant shall give security for its return. The other is the right of imprisonment, in the event of not paying the judgment recovered. For the purpose of recovering the money, the remedy proposed and the advantages sought were entirely inapplicable. On the order of her husband, Meigs & Co. had given to Mrs. Blain their check for $9,000, on which she had drawn the money from the bank. Whether she obtained the bills of the bank, the notes of the government, or specie, does not appear. Whatever she obtained, she kept herself, and it was never under the control or in the possession of the plaintiff or his assignor, Mr. Blain.

The claim against Mrs. B., under such circumstances, was simply for money had and received. It was to be pursued in the ordinary manner for the collection of a debt. The extraordinary remedies given in prosecuting for a tort could not be invoked. If by attempting to use them the plaintiff has involved himself in difficulty, he must suffer the consequences.

When the proper action is brought, the rights of the parties will be determined without difficulty. If this money was given to Mrs. Blain by her husband, he being free from debt, I see no reason why she cannot hold it. If it was in her hands as the mere depositary of her husband, it was subject to his order and passed by the transfer to the plaintiff. This question has not been, and could not be, decided in this action. The action of replevin or trover is based upon an improper detention or conversion of the plaintiff's property. Proof of ownership will not of itself authorize a recovery. The plaintiff may prove undoubted ownership; but, unless he proves a conversion also, or a refusal to deliver, he cannot recover. There are many cases to this effect in the books. Packard v. Getman, 4 Wend. 613, 21 Am. Dec.

[20] The statement of facts is abridged. The concurring opinion of Leonard, C., is omitted.

166; Hallenbake v. Fish, 8 Wend. 547, 24 Am. Dec. 88. His action for the recovery of a specific $9,000, alleged to be detained from him, is no bar to an action for $9,000 of debt generally due to him from the defendant. As a debt merely it cannot be recovered in the present action. The record cannot, therefore, be a bar to an action for the recovery of the debts simply. Spalding v. Spalding, 3 How. Prac. 297; Seymour v. Van Curen, 18 How. Prac. 94.

The record does not show whether, in the present case, the plaintiff exercised the right of preliminary seizure, which the law authorizes in an action of replevin. It will illustrate the case if we assume that he did. Let us assume that Mrs. Blain drew this $9,000, upon the check of Meigs & Co., in legal tender notes. Assume, further, that she retained the notes in her possession, and that, by the aid of a friend within the garrison, the sheriff was able to take the notes into his possession upon the replevin papers in the suit. The defendant, Mrs. Blain, not being able to give security for their return, they remain in the plaintiff's possession at the time of the trial. Upon the trial it is held that, as to this money, an action of replevin will not lie; that, as to that portion of the demand, judgment must go against him. He has quite mistaken his remedy. Both parties must be restored to the statu quo ante bellum. The plaintiff must give back the money. Mrs. Blain is entitled to receive it. This is precisely what was done at the trial. In my judgment, the direction was right in form as well as in substance. It stated the rights of the parties in this suit and nothing more. If an ordinary action for money assigned to him shall hereafter be brought by the plaintiff against Mrs. Blain, there will be found nothing in this record to prevent its decision upon the merits. Should there be any doubt about the effect of this verdict, which I do not myself anticipate, the record is still open to amendment. No judgment has been entered upon the verdict, and it would be within the authority of the Special Term to direct the insertion of a statement of the ground of the judgment, viz., the improper form of action, or that the judgment be simply that the plaintiff cannot recover the $9,000.

Several questions of evidence were presented, but I see no error that requires our consideration.

The order of the General Term should be reversed, and judgment entered upon the verdict of the City Court.[21]

[21] Compare Graves v. Dudley (1859) 20 N. Y. 76, 79: "This action is brought to recover the possession of the bills, and it is insisted that such an action will not lie where the subject-matter is money. The authorities relied upon by the counsel, arose in the action of detinue, when that was the remedy provided by law for the recovery of personal property unlawfully detained. The cases are analogous to the action given by the Code to recover the possession of like property similarly detained, and the same principle should be applied to the latter action. Coke upon Littleton (286b), speaking of the writ of detinue, says: 'In this writ the plaintiff shall recover the thing detained, and therefore it must be so certain as it may be known, and for that cause it lyeth not for money out of a bag or chest: and so of corn out of a sack, and the like; these cannot be known from other.' This shows that money could be recov-

Detinue for "one lot of corn in the shuck, to wit, 76 bushels in defendant's crib nearest his dwelling, lately bought by plaintiff from defendant." On the trial the plaintiff testified that, the defendant being indebted to him, a settlement was made by his clerk, George Gray, by which the account "was paid by a credit for a gin, two mules, one horse, and 100 bushels of corn in the shuck at defendant's crib, at the rate of 60 cents per bushel, leaving a balance of $25 due the defendant, which he afterwards took out in plaintiff's store. * * * The corn at the crib was to be his property. He had never seen the corn. The trade was made by his clerk, who died last fall, but he and the defendant, in January, 1885, talked over the trade thus made with said Gray." The evidence as to the trade being made by said Gray was excluded. The plaintiff was then asked "whether the corn he bought of the defendant was 100 bushels to itself, or part of a large quantity." He replied that he did not personally know whether the corn was in a lot by itself; that the defendant told him, in January, 1885, that the corn was in his west crib, separated from his other corn, and that said Gray told him when he returned from making the trade that he bought the lot of corn in the west crib, and showed him the dimensions thereof. The court excluded what Gray said to the plaintiff. * * * There was a verdict for the defendant and the plaintiff appealed.

SOMERVILLE, J. 1. The principle is familiar that where there is a contract of sale of personal property, and anything remains to be done to individualize and identify the particular property intended to be sold, such as counting, weighing, measuring, or separating from a larger mass or bulk, no title passes to the purchaser, such as will maintain in his favor an action of detinue or trover. This is for the simple reason that the particular part of the property or chattels contracted to be sold and delivered cannot be ascertained by precise identification. Bank v. Fry, 69 Ala. 348, s. c., 75 Ala. 473; Shealy v. Edwards, 73 Ala. 175, 180, 49 Am. Rep. 43. The charge of the court, in reference to this phase of the case, was in harmony with this well-settled rule governing sales of personal property, and was free from error. * * *[22] ered in the action of detinue, the same as corn; that is where it could be identified. The same rule applies to all personal property, and to maintain an action for its recovery it must be identified so that delivery of the specific goods to which the party is entitled may be made." Per Grover, J.

[22] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point. The case was reversed on another point, and remanded.

SECTION 2.—AFTER THE STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER THE SECOND

I. Historical

Apparently, the inventiveness of the Chancellor and judges in the matter of making new writs had come to an end in the latter half of the thirteenth century. At any rate, there were complaints in Parliament of suitors being turned away empty-handed because there was no writ to suit their cases. Accordingly, the great Statute of Westminster the Second sought to provide a remedy by enacting that "whensoever from henceforth it shall fortune in the Chancery, that in one case a writ is found, and in like case falling under like law, and requiring like remedy, is found none, the Clerks of the Chancery shall agree in making a writ" (and, if they do not there is to be an appeal to Parliament).[23]

This enactment, though it appears only at the end of a chapter on special cases, seems to have been taken as a general authority for the expansion of legal remedies; and under it were formed many new writs on the analogy of the older writs found in the Register. These new writs were all grouped together under the name of "Case"; apparently from the words used in the Statute of Westminster the Sec-

[23] The Statute of Westminster the Second, made Anno 13 Edw. I, Stat. 1, and Anno. Dom. 1285.

"Whereas of late our Lord the King, in the Quinzim of Saint John Baptist, the Sixth Year of his Reign, calling together the Prelates, Earls, Barons, and his Council at Gloucester, and considering that divers of this Realm were disherited, by Reason that in many Cases, where Remedy should have been had, there was none provided by him nor his Predecessors, ordained certain Statutes right necessary and profitable for his Realm, whereby the People of England and Ireland, being Subjects unto his Power, have obtained more speedy Justice in their Oppressions, than they had before; and certain Cases, wherein the Law failed, did remain undetermined, and some remained to be enacted, that were for the Reformation of the Oppressions of the People: Our Lord the King in his Parliament, after the Feast of Easter, holden the Thirteenth Year of his Reign at Westminster, caused many Oppressions of the People, and Defaults of the Laws, for the accomplishment of the said Statutes of Gloucester, to be rehearsed, and thereupon did provide certain Acts, as shall appear here following: * * *

"Chap. xxiv. * * * 2. And whensoever from henceforth it shall happen in the Chancery that in one case a writ is found and in a like case [in consimili casu] falling under the same right and requiring a similar remedy [simili remedio] a writ is lacking, the clerks of the Chancery shall agree in making a writ, or adjourn the complainants to the next parliament, and they shall write out the cases in which they cannot agree and refer them to the next parliament, and let a writ be made with the consent of the learned in the law, lest it happen thereafter that the King's Court [Curia] be long deficient in doing justice to the complainants."

Stats. at Large (Pickering's Ed.) 1762, vol. 1, pp. 163, 197, with a few variations from the translation in Pickering.

ond—"in consimili casu." Another feature common to them all was that each was framed on the model of a specific older writ; enlarging its scope by omitting one or more of the technical requirements of the older document.[24]

Jenks, Short Hist. Eng. Law, 136.

[24] The Statute of Westminster the Second contains, in its twenty-fourth chapter, a clause of which lawyers have long recognized the importance, but which lay historians are too apt to regard as mere technical jargon. Carefully concealed under the guise of an administrative regulation, the Statute lays it down, that the chancery officials, through whose hands must pass every royal writ, which was then, and still is, the normal beginning of every action in the royal courts, need no longer be guided by a strict adherence to precedent in the issue of these documents. It is sufficient if the remedy sought and the circumstances of the case are like those for which writs have previously been issued. In other words, principle, not precedent, is henceforth to guide the Chancellor and his officials in the issue of writs.

To a layman, impatient of the intricacies of legal history, such a direction may seem the most obvious piece of official platitude. In truth, it covered a daring attempt at completing, by a master stroke, a revolution which had been gradually proceeding during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Once more it is necessary to remind the reader, that the conception of the Crown, as the sole fountain of justice, is a very modern conception in legal history. The Crown in the later Middle Ages was but one of many competitors for the profitable business of judicature. The Church, the feudal nobles, the chartered boroughs, the merchant guilds, the shire and hundred moots, were all rivals, more or less formidable. And any premature attempt on the part of the Crown to claim universal and exclusive jurisdiction would assuredly have led to the fiercest opposition, even if it had not resulted in the dissolution of the State. Time was on the side of the Crown; but the King had to walk warily, and to be content for a long time with small things. Bit by bit, as chances offered, the royal officials filched the business of their rivals; and, as each claim was established, it was carefully enshrined as a precedent in that Register of Writs, which was one of the most precious possessions of the royal chancery. If an intending litigant could bring his case within the terms of a registered writ, well and good. If not, the King's courts could do nothing for him. He might have the best case in the world from a moral, or even from a legal point of view. But his remedy, if any, lay elsewhere. With sorrowful hearts, for they disliked "turning away business," the chancery officials regretted that they could not supply the desired article. The officials knew that their path was beset with dangers. The bold assertion of Henry II, that no lawsuit touching the title to freehold could be commenced without a royal writ, had played no mean part in stirring the baronial rising under John; and the claim had been solemnly renounced in the Great Charter. Now, perhaps, we are in a position to understand something of the audacity of the consimilis casus clause of the Statute of Westminster the Second, which, if acted upon to its full extent, would have left it open to ingenious chancery officials to discover analogies of existing precedents in the case of every intending litigant. But its comparative failure is another signal proof that sound legislation is little more than the official consecration of enlightened public opinion, and that "fancy" or premature reforms are mere waste of words. The opposition to the full use of the clause came, not merely from feudal and clerical tribunals, but from the King's own judges, who refused to recognise as valid writs which, in their view, departed too widely from precedent, no less than from the Parliaments of the fourteenth century, profoundly jealous of a power which, under the form of mere official documents, was really a power to declare the law of the land. The final victory of the royal jurisdiction was won, by the skilful use of fictions, by the rise of the Court of Chancery, and, finally, by the Reformation, which crushed the independence of the Church courts. It could not be achieved by a single clause in the Statute of Westminster the Second.

Jenks, "Edward I: The English Justinian," 1 Anglo-Am. Legal Essays, 151–152.

As is well known, the Action on the Case was stretched to cover a large number of offences. It thus, in common speech, became the parent of many special actions; though these differed from the older actions in this important point, that, as they were all commenced by the same writ, the plaintiff could not, even before the abolition of forms of action, be non-suited for confusing one with the other. Thus we get the so-called "actions" of Trover, Nuisance, Assumpsit, Malicious Prosecution, Seduction, Defamation, and Deceit; some of which (e. g. Nuisance, Malicious Prosecution, and Deceit) have to be rather carefully distinguished from older remedies for similar offences, which had, for one reason or another, become obsolete or inconvenient. * * *

But elasticity was of the essence of the Action on the Case; and, all through its history, that action has been made to serve, very usefully, as a general formula under which any grievance for which no special definition existed, but which it was deemed desirable by the Courts to recognize, could be smuggled in.

[25] Published in 26 Law Quarterly Review (1910) 162, 164.

[26] "The explanation of this threefold meaning and application of the term nuisance [that is, nuisance as a species of criminal offense, nuisance as a disturbance of servitudes, and nuisance as the act of causing or allowing the escape of deleterious things into another's land] is that in its origin the term was merely a generic expression meaning wrongful harm, and that although it has now lost this wide signification it has failed to attain instead any single specific application. The term is derived, through the French, from the late Latin 'nocentia.' See Tertull. Apol. cap. 40: 'Deus innocentiæ magister nocentiæ judex.' Chaucer used it in this generic sense: 'Helpe me for to weye ageyne the feende. * * * Keepe us from his nusance.' (Mother of God, 1, 21.) Nuisance appears in the old Latin pleadings as 'nocumentum,' i. e., harm. The terms trespass and tort, though similarly generic in their original use, have been more successful in the process of specification." Salmond, Law of Torts (2d Ed.) 184.

there; that the defendant had made a ditch and erected a pale cross that way, whereby he had lost his passage, &c. The defendant pleaded not guilty; and * * * it was found for the plaintiff; and now moved, in arrest of judgment,[27] by Coke, Attorney General, that this action lies not for a private person; because it is a common nuisance, and is punishable in a court leet only, unless he can shew some special prejudice, as 27 Hen. 8, pl. 27, is; and so it was adjudged in this Court, in Serjeant Bendlows v. Kemp, that he might maintain an action upon some special prejudice. And at St. Alban's Term, in William v. Johns, it was adjudged, that where a chapel was within a manor, and the parson of the adjoining church used to read divine service every Sunday, for the lord and his tenants in the said chapel: and for that the parson had failed therein, the lord brought an action upon the case; and adjudged that it lay not; for so every one of the tenants might bring the like action, which would be inconvenient, that he should be liable to all their actions; but he ought to be punished by the Ordinary in this case. But, peradventure, where there is not any other remedy to be had than by action, there every one may have his action who is grieved. And therefore, in Westbury v. Powel, where the inhabitants of Southwark had a common watering place, and the defendant had stopped it, and the plaintiff, being an inhabitant there, brought his action upon the case, it was adjudged maintainable. But it is here punishable in the leet. Wherefore, &c.—And of that opinion were POPHAM, GAWDY, and FENNER, that without a special grief shewn by the plaintiff, the action lies not.—But CLENCH è contra; for the stopping of itself is a special prejudice to the plaintiff, that he cannot go that way. Wherefore it is reason he should maintain the action.[28] Sed adjournatur.

[27] A part of the case, on a question of venue, is omitted. The statement is slightly abridged.

[28] On the reason for the rule, see Coke, First Institute, 56a: "For if the way be a common way, if any man be disturbed to goe that way, or if a ditch be made overthwart the way so as he cannot goe, yet shall he not have an action upon his case: and this the law provided for avoyding of multiplicity of suites, for if any one man might have an action, all men might have the like. But the law for this common nuisance hath provided an apt remedy, and that is by presentment in the leete or in the torne, unlesse any man hath a particular damage."

See also Professor Jeremiah Smith's remark in 15 Columbia Law Review, 2 (1915): "It is now generally admitted that no private action can be maintained at common law, unless the plaintiff has sustained actual damage; meaning damage which involves appreciable pecuniary loss to him individually. The controversy is whether this goes far enough; or whether the law ought to further insist upon certain particular kinds of actual damage (upon certain exceptional classes of actual damage). Those who advocate the more stringent rule contend that, in the absence of these requirements, there is great danger of such a multiplicity of suits as would constitute an intolerable evil. The apprehension of such a result has exerted much influence upon courts: sometimes inducing a denial of recovery to a plaintiff who has suffered very substantial damage, but whose damage does not fall within certain exceptional classes."

FOWLER v. SANDERS.

Action upon the case, for laying in the highway in Coggeshall, leading from Coggeshall to Braintree, divers loads of logs, whereby they much straitened the highway; so as the plaintiff, upon the evening of such a day, riding on the said way; his horse stumbled upon those blocks, and much hurt him; for which, &c.

The defendant confesses it to be a highway; but he saith, that the town of Coggeshall is an ancient vill, wherein all the inhabitants there, having ancient houses, used time whereof, &c., to lay logs in waste places of the said way before their doors for their fuel, leaving sufficient passage for chariots, horsemen, and footmen; and that he was seised in fee of an ancient house, and laid logs for his fuel in the waste places of the highway, leaving sufficient for passage of chariots, horsemen, and footmen, &c., and the plaintiff riding by the highway improvide turned his horse upon the blocks and fell, &c.

Whereupon the plaintiff demurred: and without much argument it was adjudged—

First, that the action well lay for the plaintiff; because he having special damage had cause to bring that action, although the nuisance be a public nuisance. 27 Hen. 8, pl. 27. 5 Co. 73, a. Williams' case.[29]

Secondly, that the prescription to make a nuisance is not good; for it is against law to prescribe in such manner.

Thirdly, this prescription for the inhabitants is not good. Wherefore it was adjudged accordingly.

[29] Y. B. 27 Hen. viii, 27, pl. 10. Action on the case for stopping a highway whereby the plaintiff was unable to reach his close. Fitz Herbert: "I fully agree that every nuisance done in the King's highway is punishable in the Leet, and not by action unless it be where a man has a greater hurt, or annoyance, than anyone has, and there he who has greater inconvenience or hurt, can have an action to recover his damages which he has by reason of his special hurt. For example, if one digs a ditch across the highway and I come riding along the way in the night and I and my horse are thrown into the ditch so that I am greatly damaged and inconvenienced therein, I shall have an action in this case against him who made this ditch across the way because I am more damaged thereby than anyone else."

The right to a private action when the plaintiff, without fault on his part, has suffered damage through physical contact with the unlawful obstruction, appears to have been unquestioned since the days of the Year Books, "although, if such questions were to arise now for the first time, they might perhaps, be disputed by some courts." See Professor Jeremiah Smith's article on "Private Action for Obstruction to Public Right of Passage," 15 Columbia Law Rev. 147 (1915).

HART v. BASSET.

(Court of King's Bench, 1682. T. Jones, 156, 84 Reprint, 1194.)

The plaintiff declared that whereas he had the tithes of the parish of B. for such a year, and was possessed of a barn into which intendebat portare & ponere the tithes, and that the alta via Regia in B. was the direct way for the carrying of the tithes to the barn. The defendant had obstructed and stopped up the said way by a ditch and gate erected ex transverso viæ, whereby he could not carry his tithes by the said way, but was forced to carry them by a longer and more difficult way. Upon non cul' verdict was given for the plaintiff, and £5. damages. In arrest of judgment it was moved, that this way being a high way (as was alledged by the plaintiff himself) the obstruction was a common nusance. And this damage is not such for which an action will lie, for then every one who had occasion to go this way might have his action, which the law will not suffer for the multiplicity. And Williams's case, 1 Inst. 59, was cited for it. But resolved by the whole Court that the action lay. And it was said that the common rule, that no one shall have an action for that which every one suffers, ought not to be taken too largely.[30] But in this case the plaintiff had particular damage, for the labour and pains he was forced to take with his cattle and servants, by reason of this obstruction, may well be of more value than the loss of a horse, or such damage as is allowed to maintain an action in such a case. Judgment was given for the plaintiff.[31]

Dec. 56: (P. declared that D. had erected a dam across a navigable river below P.'s house, by which the navigation of the river was effectually obstructed, "and showed that the river had been in use for a long time by him and others for the transportation of produce, and that the obstruction was particularly detrimental to him, because he had for many years owned a shipyard, where he carried on the business of shipbuilding, which was made profitable to him because of the navigableness of said river.")

WILLARD v. CITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1862. 3 Allen, 574.)

Tort. The declaration alleged, in substance, that the city of Cambridge raised the draw and took up the planks of a drawbridge, which formed a part of a public highway which they were bound to keep in repair, and obstructed the travel over the same for sixteen days, whereby the plaintiff, who was a dealer in lumber, wood and coal at a wharf adjacent to the bridge, was injured in his business, and his customers were unable to come to his wharf, and he lost the sale of lumber, wood and coal, and was subjected to increased trouble and expense in delivering what he had already sold and promised to deliver, and in getting in his crops, and his houses occupied by tenants were rendered less desirable, and he was obliged to abate from his rents in order to keep his tenants. The defendants filed a demurrer, assigning for cause that no legal cause of action was set forth; and the case was reserved, by Dewey, J., for the determination of the whole court.

BIGELOW, C. J. We cannot distinguish this case from those in which it has been determined by this court that no action at law can be maintained to recover damages for the obstruction of a highway, unless a party can prove that he has sustained some special and peculiar damage thereby, different in kind, and not merely in degree, from that which is occasioned to other persons by the alleged nuisance.[32]

No doubt the annoyance and injury to the plaintiff by the acts alleged in the declaration were much greater in amount than those which were caused to any other person having occasion to use the same highway. But it was a similar sort or species of damage. His near proximity to the bridge and the nature of the business in which he was engaged did not change the kind of damage to which he was subjected,

Compare the remark of Brown, D. J., in Piscataqua Nav. Co. v. New York, etc., R. Co. (D. C. 1898) 89 Fed. 362, 363: "In each of these cases, there was only detention, and not physical injury, to person or goods. In each of these cases, as in the present case, the plaintiffs were in the actual use of the way, and were subjected to actual obstruction, and to actual loss additional to that which, by presumption of law, attaches to each member of the public. This actual loss, proved as a matter of fact, is the gist of the private action."

but only increased the extent of the injury.[33] Every traveller having occasion to pass the bridge or to transport goods or merchandise across it incurred in some degree additional trouble and expense, as well as loss of time, by being compelled to seek another and more circuitous route. These elements of damage are the same as those claimed by the plaintiff, and are not special or peculiar to him so as to furnish a good cause of action. The same is true of the alleged loss of rents. Every person owning property on the highway leading to the bridge, near to or remote from the place of the alleged obstruction, sustained a similar injury. Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 257. The case of Stetson v. Faxon, 19 Pick. 147, 31 Am. Dec. 123, is distinguishable from the case at bar by the leading fact that there the nuisance causing the obstruction to the plaintiff's premises was erected directly against and abutting on the estate of the plaintiff, and diverted travel therefrom, and it did not appear that any other person sustained a similar injury.[34]

Demurrer sustained.

[33] Compare Chancellor Walworth's dictum in Lansing v. Smith (1829) 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 25, 21 Am. Dec. 89: "If the defendants had erected these temporary bridges, and were not authorized to do so, they might be indicted for a common nuisance. But the bridges might also be more injurious to some persons than to others. In such a case, if a person has sustained actual damage by the erection of the nuisance, whether direct or consequential, I am not prepared to say he cannot maintain an action against the wrongdoer. If he sustains no damage but that which the law presumes every citizen to sustain, because it is a common nuisance, no action will lie. But the opinion I have formed on this point is that every individual who receives actual damage from a nuisance may maintain a private suit for his own injury, although there may be many others in the same situation. The punishment of the wrong-doer by a criminal prosecution will not compensate for the individual injury; and a party who has done a criminal act cannot defend himself against a private suit by alleging that he has injured many others in the same way, and that he will be ruined if he is compelled to make compensation to all."

Dec. 123: A warehouse erected by D. projected several feet into a public street, and beyond P.'s warehouse, standing on the street line; because of this P.'s warehouse was obscured from the view of passers-by, and travel was diverted so that P.'s warehouse became less eligible as a place of business, his tenants left, and he was obliged to reduce his rents. City of Fall River (1873) 113 Mass. 218, 18 Am. Rep. 470: A city constructed a system of sewers which carried the dirt of unpaved streets into a tidal creek, and obstructed its navigation. "If the effect of the defendant's acts had been merely to create a bar across the mouth of the creek, so as to destroy or injure its navigability, the plaintiff could not maintain an action because it was thereby rendered more difficult and expensive to reach his wharf, or because his wharf was rendered less valuable. Those would be injuries of the same kind sustained by all other persons who have occasion to use the creek, or who owned land bordering upon it. But in this case the evidence tended to show that the effect of the sewers had been to fill up the creek directly in front of and adjoining the plaintiff's wharf, so that his vessels which he was accustomed to employ to bring grain to his wharf and elevator could not lie at the wharf on account of the diminished depth of water." Action on the case for the obstruction of a right of way. The declaration alleged that at the time of the committing the grievance by the defendants there was a thoroughfare leading from the Adelphi along divers streets and courts into Craven Court, and thence along other streets and courts into Whitehall, and thence back again, for all persons at all times; that the plaintiff was possessed of a messuage adjoining the said thoroughfare, in which he carried on the business of a bookseller, and made great gains by the sale of books to persons passing along the thoroughfare; that the defendants wrongfully kept the thoroughfare closed an unreasonable length of time, and during that time thereby prevented the plaintiff from carrying on his business in as beneficial a manner as he otherwise would have done, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of divers gains which would otherwise have accrued to him. The jury have found that the defendants did continue the obstruction to the plaintiff's right of way an unnecessary length of time.[35]

TINDAL, C. J. * * * The next question is, whether this is such a peculiar and private damage to the plaintiff beyond that suffered by the rest of his Majesty's subjects, as to enable him to sustain an action against the defendants. And I think, in conformity with the greater number of decisions, that it was. The injury to the subjects in general, is, that they cannot walk in the same track as before; and for that cause alone an action on the case would not lie: but the injury to the plaintiff is, the loss of a trade, which but for this obstruction to the general right of way he would have enjoyed; and the law has structed is universally held to be specially and peculiarly injured, though he may have other access to his lot: but many of the cases draw an arbitrary line at this point, and maintain that when the plaintiff's lot fronts upon another part of the street no such injury is shown. Certainly the distinction is illogical. The man whose lot fronts upon the next block may be fully as deeply injured in the decreased value, rentability, and desirability of his lot as the man whose lot fronts on the block which is closed. One may suffer as great damage in his estate as the other. True, there may be many such individual owners, but that cannot affect individual rights. There may be 20 or there may be 50 of them, but, if each has suffered great damage to his estate by the unlawful closing of a street, why shall not each have his action? Neither 20 men nor 50 men constitute the general public. The general public is composed of the great mass of individuals who own no property in the vicinity, and who may wish to pass over the street or not, and who, if they do, simply suffer the trifling inconvenience of being obliged to make a circuitous trip. The man who owns a lot in the next block, and whose lot has lost a great part of its value by reason of the closing of the street, manifestly suffers some injury different in its nature from the mere inconvenience suffered by the general public."

said, from the Year Books downwards, that if a party has sustained any peculiar injury, beyond that which affects the public at large, an action will lie for redress. Is the injury in the present case of that character or not? The plaintiff, in addition to a right of way which he enjoyed in common with others, had a shop on the roadside, the business of which was supported by those who passed: all who passed had the right of way; but all had not shops: that is the observation made in Baker v. Moore, cited in Ivison v. Moore, 1 Ld. Raymd. 486, which was an action for stopping a way and preventing the carriage of coals. In Baker v. Moore the refusal of the plaintiff's tenants to remain on the premises was considered a damage sufficiently peculiar and private to entitle the plaintiff to sue the defendant for having erected a wall across a common way used by the tenants. Indeed, for the most part the only question is, whether the injury to the individual is such as to be the direct, necessary, natural, and immediate consequence of the wrongful act. Hubert v. Groves, 1 Esp. 148, has been relied on on the part of the defendants: but the gravamen there was one which applied equally to all his Majesty's subjects, namely, that they were obliged to go in a more circuitous track, and not one which affected the plaintiff above others: unless that be a sufficient distinction between Hubert v. Groves and the present case,[36] I must yield to the greater authority of the other decisions.

Discharged as to entering a nonsuit.

[36] The case of Wilkes v. Hungerford Market Co. "is commonly considered as having been overruled by the House of Lords in Ricket v. Metropolitan Rly. Co. (1867) 2 H. L. 175. It is to be remarked, however, that there is nothing in the decision of the House of Lords in this case which is inconsistent with the Hungerford Market Case, and that the observations made upon the latter case are dicta unnecessary to the matter in hand. Ricket's Case decides merely that on the true interpretation of the Lands Clauses Act and the Railways Clauses Act claims to compensation under these acts are limited to damage done to the property affected and do not extend to damage done to the goodwill of a business. It is submitted, therefore, that the question still remains open, and that it is worthy of serious consideration whether damage done to the plaintiff in his trade by the illegal obstruction of a highway is not an actionable wrong." SOLTAU v. DE HELD.

(High Court of Chancery, 1851. 2 Sim. [N. S.] 133, 61 Reprint, 291.)

The plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the ringing of the bells of a church near the plaintiff's house.

The bill alleged, among other things, that when a peal of the church bells was rung, the noise was so great that it was impossible for the plaintiff, or the members of his family, to read, write or converse in his house; that the ringing of the chapel bell and church bells was an intolerable nuisance to the plaintiff, and, if the said bell or bells was or were permitted to be rung in the manner in which the same were so rung as aforesaid, it would be impossible for the plaintiff to reside any longer in his house; that, in consequence of the before-mentioned grievance, the plaintiff applied to the defendant to desist from the ringing the said bells or any of them, so as to occasion any annoyance to the plaintiff, and, the defendant having refused to comply with that application, the plaintiff, in June 1851, commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages for the nuisance committed to him by means or in consequence of the before-mentioned ringing of the said bell or bells; that the action was tried on the 13th of August, 1851, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with forty shillings damages and costs; that, on the 10th November, 1851, judgment in the action was signed, and it remained unreversed.

The defendants put in a general demurrer to the bill.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR (Sir R. T. KINDERSLEY). * * *[37] The demurrer is a general demurrer for want of equity; and, of course, by that demurrer, the defendant undertakes to shew that, upon the statements contained in the bill, the plaintiff would not be entitled to any relief at the hearing of the cause.

The first ground of demurrer to this bill is that the nuisance complained of is a public nuisance; and, therefore, the suit should have been instituted by the Attorney-General; and that it is not competent to the plaintiff to file a bill respecting it. * * *[38]

[37] The statement of the case is abridged; only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point.

[38] In an omitted portion of his opinion, the Vice Chancellor suggested this as the test of a public nuisance: "I conceive that, to constitute a public nuisance, the thing must be such as, in its nature or its consequences, is a nuisance—an injury or a damage, to all persons who come within the sphere of its operation, though it may be so in a greater degree to some than it is to others. For example, take the case of the operations of a manufactory, in the course of which operations volumes of noxious smoke, or of poisonous effluvia, are emitted. To all persons who are at all within the reach of those operations it is more or less objectionable, more or less a nuisance in the popular sense of the term. It is true that to those who are nearer to it it may be a greater nuisance, a greater inconvenience than it is to those who are more remote from it: but, still, to all who are at all within the reach of it, it is more or less a nuisance or an inconvenience. Take another ordinary case, perhaps the most ordinary case of a public

In my further observations on this ground of demurrer, I will proceed on the assumption that it is a public nuisance; that is to say, that the defendant is right in his contention that it is a public nuisance, and let us see what the consequence will be if it be so. Now, in the case of a public nuisance, the remedy at law is indictment; the remedy in equity is information at the suit of the Attorney-General. In the case of private nuisance the remedy at law is action; the remedy in equity is bill. And this is the distinction which is pointed out in those passages cited by Mr. Campbell from the third volume of Blackstone's Commentaries and from Mitford's Treatise on Pleading. But it is clear that that which is a public nuisance may be also a private nuisance to a particular individual, by inflicting on him some special or particular damage; and, if it be both, that is, if it be in its nature a public nuisance, and, at the same time, does inflict on a particular individual a special and particular damage, may not that individual have his private remedy at law by action, or in equity by bill? That is the question which is to be determined with respect to this ground of demurrer. The defendant's counsel insist that he cannot; and several cases were cited in support of that proposition. But, on referring to those cases, it appears to me that they do not support that proposition. * * *

Several cases have been referred to on the part of the plaintiff; such as Spencer v. The London and Birmingham Railway Company, 8 Sim. 193, Sampson v. Smith, 8 Sim. 272, Haines v. Taylor, 2 Beav. 75, and Walter v. Selfe, 15 Jurist, 416, in all of which it was held that, nuisance, the stopping of the king's highway; that is a nuisance to all who may have occasion to travel that highway. It may be a much greater nuisance to a person who has to travel it every day of his life than it is to a person who has to travel it only once a year, or once in five years; but it is more or less a nuisance to everyone who has occasion to use it. If, however, the thing complained of is such that it is a great nuisance to those who are more immediately within the sphere of its operations, but is no nuisance or inconvenience whatever, or is even advantageous or pleasurable to those who are more removed from it, there, I conceive, it does not come within the meaning of the term public nuisance. The case before me is a case in point. A peal of bells may be, and no doubt is, an extreme nuisance, and, perhaps, an intolerable nuisance to a person who lives within a very few feet or yards of them; but, to a person who lives at a distance from them, although he is within the reach of their sound, so far from its being a nuisance or an inconvenience, it may be a positive pleasure; for I cannot assent to the proposition of the plaintiff's counsel that, in all circumstances and under all conditions, the sound of bells must be a nuisance. And it is rather curious that one of the witnesses who was examined on the trial on the part of the plaintiff, and who deposed strongly to the bells being an intolerable nuisance when he was in Mr. Soltau's house, says: "But where I live at Clapham, which is about a furlong from the bells and with the intervention of trees, so far from their being a nuisance to me, they are a positive gratification; and I confess I should be extremely sorry if they were done away with." I mention that only by way of illustrating that, in this case, to some persons who live within the sound of these bells they may be no nuisance at all; and, no doubt, are none; and, therefore, I very much doubt, indeed, my opinion is, that the nuisance complained of in this case could not be indicted as a public nuisance." 2 Sim. (N. S.) 142-144.

if an individual sustains a special and particular damage from an act, he may have the interference of the Court on a bill, although the act complained of be, in its nature, a public nuisance. Two other cases were cited: The Attorney-General v. Forbes, 2 Myl. & C. 123, and the Attorney-General v. Johnson, 2 Wills. C. C. 87. Those cases shew only that there may be both an information and bill; that is, that the Attorney-General may file an information to restrain the act complained of as a public nuisance, and that an individual who sustains a particular injury may join as plaintiff as well as relator, and have the remedy for himself also in the same suit. I am of opinion, therefore, that the first ground of demurrer is not tenable. * * *

WESSON v. WASHBURN IRON CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1866. 13 Allen, 95, 90 Am. Dec. 181.)

Tort. The first count of the declaration alleged that the plaintiff was owner of a freehold estate in a messuage and dwelling-house in Worcester, contiguous to the land and buildings of the defendants, and occupied as a dwelling-house for the plaintiff's tenants; and the defendants wrongfully kept and continued certain buildings, called and used for a rolling mill and foundry, next easterly from the land of the plaintiff, and occupied by the defendants for the manufacture of railroad iron, and other articles made from iron and steel, and kept and used large stationary steam engines, trip-hammers, rolling mills, and other machinery and furnaces for the melting of iron, etc., by night as well as by day, and made large quantities of railroad iron, and other articles made from iron and steel, and thereby, and by the action and motion of the said engines, mills and machinery, the ground and dwelling-house of the plaintiff were greatly shaken and jarred, so that the house was greatly shaken to pieces and rendered uncomfortable and unfit for habitation and of no value.

The second count contained similar allegations in regard to another messuage and dwelling-house, known as the Wesson Tavern House, with additional averments that the defendants consumed large quantities of coal, by means of which large quantities of coal-dust, smoke and ashes, noisome and offensive, rose and issued from the defendants' buildings and entered into and diffused themselves over and through the plaintiffs' premises, rendering the same uncomfortable and unfit for habitation, and depriving her of the gains which she otherwise would have made.

The answer denied all wrongful acts on the part of the defendants, and all injury to the plaintiff.

At the trial * * * the plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury that if her dwelling-house was injured by jarring and shaking, and rendered unfit for habitation by smoke, cinders, dust and gas from the defendants' works, it was no defence to the action that many other houses in the neighborhood were affected in a similar way. But the judge declined so to rule, and instructed the jury, in accordance with the request of the defendants, that the plaintiff could not maintain this action if it appeared that the damage which the plaintiff had sustained in her estate was common to all others in the vicinity; but it must appear that she had sustained some special damage, differing in kind and degree from that common to all others in the neighborhood.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

BIGELOW, C. J. * * * There can be no doubt of the truth of the general principle stated by the court, that a nuisance may exist which occasions an injury to an individual, for which an action cannot be maintained in his favor, unless he can show some special damage in his person or property, differing in kind and degree from that which is sustained by other persons who are subjected to inconvenience and injury from the same cause. The difficulty lies in the application of this principle. The true limit, as we understand it, within which its operation is allowed, is to be found in the nature of the nuisance which is the subject of complaint. If the right invaded or impaired is a common and public one, which every subject of the state may exercise and enjoy, such as the use of a highway, or canal, or public landing place, or a common watering place on a stream or pond of water, in all such cases a mere deprivation or obstruction of the use which excludes or hinders all persons alike from the enjoyment of the common right, and which does not cause any special or peculiar damage to any one, furnishes no valid cause of action in favor of an individual, although he may suffer inconvenience or delay greater in degree than others from the alleged obstruction or hinderance. The private injury, in this class of cases, is said to be merged in the common nuisance and injury to all citizens, and the right is to be vindicated and the wrong punished by a public prosecution, and not by a multiplicity of separate actions in favor of private individuals. Several instances of the application of this rule are to be found in our own reports. Stetson v. Faxon, 19 Pick. 147, 31 Am. Dec. 123; Thayer v. Boston, 19 Pick. 511, 514, 31 Am. Dec. 157; Quincy Canal v. Newcomb, 7 Metc. 276, 283, 39 Am. Dec. 778; Holman v. Townsend, 13 Metc. 297, 299; Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254; Brainard v. Connecticut River Railroad, 7 Cush. 506; Blood v. Nashua & L. R. Corp., 2 Gray, 140, 61 Am. Dec. 444; Brightman v. Fairhaven, 7 Gray, 271; Harvard College v. Stearns, 15 Gray, 1; Willard v. Cambridge, 3 Allen, 574; Hartshorn v. South Reading, Id. 501; Fall River Iron Works Co. v. Old Colony & Fall River Railroad, 5 Allen, 224.

But it will be found that, in all these cases, and in others in which the same principle has been laid down, it has been applied to that class of nuisances which have caused a hindrance or obstruction in the exercise of a right which is common to every person in the community, and that it has never been extended to cases where the alleged wrong is done to private property, or the health of individuals is injured, or their peace and comfort in their dwellings is impaired by the carrying on of offensive trades and occupations which create noisome smells or disturbing noises, or cause other annoyances and injuries to persons and property in the vicinity, however numerous or extensive may be the instances of discomfort, inconvenience and injury to persons and property thereby occasioned. Where a public right or privilege common to every person in the community is interrupted or interfered with, a nuisance is created by the very act of interruption or interference, which subjects the party through whose agency it is done to a public prosecution, although no actual injury or damage may be thereby caused to any one. If, for example, a public way is obstructed, the existence of the obstruction is a nuisance, and punishable as such, even if no inconvenience or delay to public travel actually takes place. It would not be necessary, in a prosecution for such a nuisance, to show that any one had been delayed or turned aside. The offence would be complete, although during the continuance of the obstruction no one had had occasion to pass over the way. The wrong consists in doing an act inconsistent with and in derogation of the public or common right. It is in cases of this character that the law does not permit private actions to be maintained on proof merely of a disturbance in the enjoyment of the common right, unless special damage is also shown, distinct not only in degree but in kind from that which is done to the whole public by the nuisance.

But there is another class of cases in which the essence of the wrong consists in an invasion of private right, and in which the public offence is committed, not merely by doing an act which causes injury, annoyance and discomfort to one or several persons who may come within the sphere of its operation or influence, but by doing it in such place and in such manner that the aggregation of private injuries becomes so great and extensive as to constitute a public annoyance and inconvenience, and a wrong against the community, which may be properly the subject of a public prosecution. But it has never been held, so far as we know, that in cases of this character the injury to private property, or to the health and comfort of individuals, becomes merged in the public wrong, so as to take away from the persons injured the right which they would otherwise have to maintain actions to recover damages which each may have sustained in his person or estate from the wrongful act.

Nor would such a doctrine be consistent with sound principle. Carried out practically, it would deprive persons of all redress for injury to property or health, or for personal annoyance and discomfort, in all cases where the nuisance was so general and extensive as to be a legitimate subject of a public prosecution; so that in effect a wrongdoer would escape all liability to make indemnity for private injuries by carrying on an offensive trade or occupation in such place and manner as to cause injury and annoyance to a sufficient number of persons to create a common nuisance.

The real distinction would seem to be this: that when the wrongful act is of itself a disturbance or obstruction only to the exercise of a common and public right, the sole remedy is by public prosecution, unless special damage is caused to individuals. In such case the act of itself does no wrong to individuals distinct from that done to the whole community. But when the alleged nuisance would constitute a private wrong by injuring property or health, or creating personal inconvenience and annoyance, for which an action might be maintained in favor of a person injured, it is none the less actionable because the wrong is committed in a manner and under circumstances which would render the guilty party liable to indictment for a common nuisance. This we think is substantially the conclusion to be derived from a careful examination of the adjudged cases. The apparent conflict between them can be reconciled on the ground that an injury to private property, or to the health and comfort of an individual, is in its nature special and peculiar, and does not cause a damage which can properly be said to be common or public, however numerous may be the cases of similar damage arising from the same cause. Certainly multiplicity of actions affords no good reason for denying a person all remedy for actual loss and injury which he may sustain in his person or property by the unlawful acts of another, although it may be a valid ground for refusing redress to individuals for a mere invasion of a common and public right.

The rule of law is well settled and familiar, that every man is bound to use his own property in such manner as not to injure the property of another, or the reasonable and proper enjoyment of it; and that the carrying on of an offensive trade or business, which creates noisome smells and noxious vapors, or causes great and disturbing noises, or which otherwise renders the occupation of property in the vicinity inconvenient and uncomfortable, is a nuisance for which any person whose property is damaged or whose health is injured or whose reasonable enjoyment of his estate as a place of residence is impaired or destroyed thereby may well maintain an action to recover compensation for the injury. The limitations proper to be made in the application of this rule are accurately stated in Bamford v. Turnley, 3 Best & Smith, 66, and in Tipping v. St. Helen's Smelting Co., 6 Best & Smith, 608–616, s. c. 11 H. L. Cas. 642, and cases there cited. See, also, in addition to cases cited by the counsel for the plaintiff, Spencer v. London & Birmingham Railway, 8 Sim. 193; Soltau v. De Held, 9 Sim. (N. S.) 133.

The instructions given to the jury were stated in such form as to lead them to infer that this action could not be maintained, if it appeared that other owners of property in the neighborhood suffered injury and damage similar to that which was sustained by the plaintiff in her estate by the acts of the defendants. This, as applied to the facts in proof, was an error, and renders it necessary that the case should be tried anew.

Exceptions sustained.[39]

[39] A portion of the statement of facts, and of the opinion, on a point of evidence, is omitted.

See King v. Morris & Essex Railroad (1867) 18 N. J. Eq. 397. The defendant had placed upon its road sixteen new coal-burning engines, which threw out burning coals. The increase of fires along the line had been so great, since the use of the coal-burning locomotives, that some insurance companies had refused to take risks along the road at the usual rates, and some had refused altogether. The complainant, a manufacturer, sought to enjoin the use of such locomotives. Said the Chancellor: "The case is a proper one for the interference of this court by injunction. The defendants must be restrained from running any coal engines on their road, if the consequences are necessarily such as are shown by the proof in this case. * * * Nor is it necessary that the injunction or relief in this case should be applied for in the name of the state, or the Attorney General. This is not a public nuisance, although it may injure a great many persons. The injury is to the individual property of each. The nuisance is public when it affects the rights enjoyed by citizens as part of the public; as the right of navigating a river, or traveling on a public highway; rights to which every citizen is entitled."

See also the remarks of Brett, J., in Benjamin v. Storr (1874) L. R. 9 C. P. 400, 406: "There are three things which the plaintiff must substantiate, beyond the existence of the mere public nuisance, before he can be entitled to recover. In the first place, he must shew a particular injury to himself beyond that which is suffered by the rest of the public. It is not enough for him to shew that he suffers the same inconvenience in the use of the highway as other people do, if the alleged nuisance be the obstruction of a highway. The case of Hubert v. Groves, 1 Esp. 148, seems to me to prove that proposition. There the plaintiff's business was injured by the obstruction of a highway, but no greater injury resulted to him therefrom than to any one else, and therefore it was held that the action would not lie. Winterbottom v. Lord Derby, Law Rep. 2 Ex. 316, was decided upon the same ground: the plaintiff failed because he was unable to shew that he had sustained any injury other and different from that which was common to all the rest of the public. Other cases shew that the injury to the individual must be direct, and not a mere consequential injury, as, where one is obstructed, but another (though possibly a less convenient one) is left open; in such a case the private and particular injury has been held not to be sufficiently direct to give a cause of action. Further, the injury must be shewn to be of a substantial character, not fleeting or evanescent. If these propositions be correct, in order to entitle a person to maintain an action for damage caused by that which is a public nuisance, the damage must be particular, direct, and substantial. The question then is, whether the plaintiff here has brought himself within the rule so laid down. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff shewed that from the too long standing of horses and wagons of the defendants in the highway opposite his house, the free passage of light and air to his premises was obstructed, and the plaintiff was in consequence obliged to burn gas nearly all day, and so to incur expense. I think that brings the case within all the requirements I have pointed out; it was a particular, a direct, and a substantial damage. As to the bad smell, that also was a particular injury to the plaintiff, and a direct and substantial one. So, if by reason of the access to his premises being obstructed for an unreasonable time and in an unreasonable manner, the plaintiff's customers were prevented from coming to his coffee-shop, and he suffered a material

COOK v. MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF BATH.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendants from building in such a way as to obstruct a lane called Cross Back Lane, and later, White Hart Lane, in the city of Bath.

The plaintiff was the owner in fee of a messuage, No. 14, Bath Street, which was bounded at the back by Cross Back Lane, leading into Stall Street, and it appeared that from 1793, when this house was erected, there had been a back-door leading into Cross Back Lane, through which the plaintiff had access through Cross Back Lane to Stall Street. About forty years ago the then occupier of the house closed and bricked up this back-door, leaving the jambs in the wall, and keeping the old door in his cellar, but in the spring of 1864 the present plaintiff re-opened the door, and restored it as much as possible to its former position.

In 1867 the defendants, having purchased the house at the corner of the lane and Stall Street, were proceeding to erect buildings in such a way as, it was admitted, would permanently block up all access from White Hart Lane into Stall Street, and thereupon the plaintiff filed his bill for an injunction to restrain them from so doing. * * *

SIR R. MALINS, V. C. * * * Thus far I have dealt with the case on the assumption of the lane being subject to a private right of way; but, in truth, the evidence goes far to shew that White Hart Lane was a public way. On this view the defendants have contended that the Attorney-General must sue. But the cases cited are conclusive as to the plaintiff's remedy. In Spencer v. London and Birmingham Railway Company, 8 Sim. 193, s. c. 1 Railw. Cas. 159, a very similar case to the present, Vice-Chancellor Shadwell laid down the rule to be, that where there was a public nuisance by obstructing a highway which caused a particular private injury, a bill would lie for diminution of trade, that might be a particular, a direct, and a substantial damage."

Compare Baltzeger v. Carolina Midland Ry. Co. (1899) 54 S. C. 242, 32 S. E. 358, 71 Am. St. Rep. 789: A railway company had created a public nuisance by obstructing the flow of surface water and causing its accumulation. This nuisance rendered the plaintiff's dwelling unhealthy and dangerous to live in, and caused sickness and suffering in his family. A demurrer to the complaint showing these facts was sustained by the trial court. "The injury," said the Supreme Court, "must be particular—as some of the cases express it, special or peculiar; must result directly from the obstruction, and not as a secondary consequence thereof; and must differ in kind, and not merely in extent or degree, from that which the general public sustains. The plaintiff relies upon the allegations contained in the fourth paragraph of his complaint to show that his injury was special or peculiar. One of the requirements of the rule is that the damages must differ in kind as well as degree from those which, it may reasonably be expected, will be sustained by the public generally. The allegations of the complaint show that the causes which led to the plaintiff's injury might reasonably be expected to affect others in the neighborhood, and therefore his injury was not special."

the private injury, and granted an injunction; and on the appeal Lord Cottenham did not dissent from this view.

In this case I am of opinion that there has been a wholly unjustifiable stopping up of a public or private way, it matters not which; if it is a public way the Attorney-General might have sued in respect of the public nuisance, and the plaintiff may also sue in respect of his individual injury; and therefore, on any view of the evidence, the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction. * * * [40]

(b) Nuisance Distinguished from Other Torts

WESHBOURN AND MORDANT'S CASE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1589. 2 Leon. 103, 74 Reprint, 394.)

In an action upon the case, the plaintiff declared, that whereas he was possessed of a parcel of land called the Parsonage, lying adjoyning to a certain river, from the 29 of May, 29 Eliz. untill the day of the bringing of this writ, the defendant had the said twentieth day of May stopt the said river with certain loads of earth, and so it continued untill the fourteenth day of February, by which his land was drowned, and so he had lost the profit of it by that time.

And it was moved in arrest of judgment, that upon the declaration there doth not appear any cause of action, for the plaintiff hath made title to the land drowned from the twentieth of May, so as that day is excluded, and the nusance is said to be made the twentieth day, and so it appeareth the nusance was before the possession of the plaintiff; and if it were so, then cannot he complain of any wrong done before his time: to which it was answered, that although the stopping was made before his possession, yet the continuance of the same is after, and a new wrong, for which an action lieth: as 5 H. 7, 4. It was presented, that an abbat had not cleansed his ditch, &c. by reason of which the highway is stopt: the successor shall be put to answer the said indictment, by reason of the continuance of it: and see, that continuation of a nusance is as it were a new nusance, 14 and 15 Eliz. 320. And it may be that the plaintiff was not dammified untill long time after the twentieth day of May (scil.) after the stopping: and the words of the writ here are satisfied and true: and afterwards judgment was given for the plaintiff.[41]

[40] Part of the statement of facts and part of the opinion are omitted.

[41] Compare the Case of the Farmers of Hampstead-Water (1701) 12 Mod. 519: Trespass for digging a hole in the plaintiff's soil, whereby his land was overflown, continuando transgressionem for nine months: "And it was insisted, that they might give evidence of a consequential damage after the nine months, as well as in a nusance which continues for nine months." But Holt, C. J., said "he was not satisfied that the parity would hold, for the git of the action in a nusance is the damage; and therefore as long as there are damages there is ground for an action; but trespass is one entire act, and the very tort is the git of the action."

CODMAN v. EVANS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1863. 7 Allen, 431.)

Tort. The declaration was as follows:

"And the plaintiffs say that whereas they before and at the time of the committing of the grievance hereinafter mentioned, were and from thence hitherto have been and still are lawfully possessed of a certain close, abutting on Tremont Street, so called, in said Boston, situate between the messuages now numbered 175 and 176 on said street, and bounded westerly by said street; northerly by land of the defendant, to him conveyed by one Rice; easterly by a passage way running northerly, and leading to Mason Street, so called; and southerly by the northerly wall of the said messuage now numbered 176, on said Tremont Street, yet the said defendant, well knowing the premises, wrongfully and injuriously kept and continued, from and upon the southerly wall of his messuage numbered 175 as aforesaid, a certain building projecting and overhanging the plaintiff's said close, and before then wrongfully erected and built, projecting as aforesaid, for a long space of time, to wit, from the first of May last past hitherto."

After it had been determined that the plaintiffs should prevail in this action, 5 Allen, 308, 81 Am. Dec. 748, they moved in the superior court for judgment that the building mentioned in the declaration be abated and removed, in so far as it overhangs their land described therein, and that a warrant be issued to the proper officer requiring him to abate and remove the same at the expense of the defendant, in like manner as public and common nuisances are removed; and it was thereupon considered and adjudged by the court that the building or bay-windows, overhanging the plaintiff's close, be abated and removed.[42] The defendant appealed.

Bigelow, C. J. The only question open on this appeal is, whether there is anything on the record from which it appears that the judgment for an abatement of the nuisance rendered by the court below is erroneous in law. * * *

On reference to the declaration in the present case, it is clear that it may properly be regarded as in the nature of an action on the case for consequential injuries to the plaintiff's estate. It has not the peculiar characteristics of an action of trespass to real property, either at common law or under the forms appended to the practice act. Gen. St. c. 129. There is no allegation that the wrong or injury was committed "with force and arms" or "forcibly." 1 Chit. Pl. (6th Amer. Ed.) 144. It may be that an action of trespass might have been brought for the erection and continuance of the structure described in the declaration, and that, on proof of the plaintiffs' title, and of the facts and circumstances connected with the alleged wrongful act of the defendant, such action would be the only appropriate and proper remedy. But that is not the question before us on this record. We are not called on to decide a question of variance between allegations and proofs, but only to determine the nature of the action in which the judgment appealed from was rendered. It seems to us that on this point there can be no doubt. According to the strictness of the ancient forms of pleading, the declaration in this action would have been a good count in an action on the case. This clearly appears by reference to Baten's Case, 9 Co. 53b, in which it will be found that the declaration, mutatis mutandis, is almost identical with that in the case at bar. The same is true of the declaration in the recent case of Fay v. Prentice, 1 C. B. 828. It is true that in this last case there was an allegation of special damage in its nature consequential, but it was expressly held that the action might be maintained for other damage which was not alleged. And in Baten's Case, ubi supra, it was adjudged that the plaintiff need not assign in a count in case for a nuisance any special nuisance. It is sufficient if it appears from the declaration that the nature of the structure is such that consequential damage would be occasioned by the flow or dropping of water therefrom, and that other similar injuries might ensue to the plaintiffs' property.

Compare Pollock's remark, Indian Civil Wrongs Bill, § 55, note (g): "It will not escape observation that to some extent the definition of nuisance overlaps that of trespass (e. g. the overhanging eaves in Illustration 2 seem to constitute a continuing trespass). This is so in England and all common-law jurisdictions, and it does not produce any difficulty or inconvenience that I know of." Illustration 2 is as follows: "If Z. has a house whose eaves overhang A.'s land, or if the branches of a tree growing on Z.'s land project over A.'s land, this is a nuisance to A., inasmuch as it interferes with his powers of control and enjoyment on his own property, and also tends to discharge rain-water on A.'s land."

The error of the defendant consists in supposing that we can travel out of the record, and that, by reference to the proceedings in the former action between these parties, and to the questions heretofore determined in this suit, we can judicially ascertain that this action can be supported by the plaintiffs only as an action of trespass.[43] But this we cannot do. The objection that the facts did not support the [43] On the distinction between trespass and nuisance see also 21 Halsbury's Laws of England, 506, note "k": "The following acts have been held to be trespass: The actual pouring of water on to a neighbor's land (Preston v. Mercer [1656] Hard. 60, as explained in Reynolds v. Clarke, supra); injuring a person on the highway by throwing logs at him (Reynolds v. Clarke, supra). On the other hand the following acts were held or considered to be nuisance and not trespass: Overburdening a floor, whereby it fell and did damage to the goods of another in his cellar beneath (Edwards v. Halinder [1594] Poph. 46); diverting the water of a river by digging trenches in the defendant's own ground (Levridge v. Hoskins [1709] 11 Mod. Rep. 257); fixing a spout to defendant's house whereby water was poured on to the plaintiff's land (Reynolds v. Clarke [1725] 1 Stra. 634); so working a mine as to cause water to flow through other mines into those of the plaintiff (Haward v. Bankes [1760] 2 Burr. 1113); logs left by one party to lie in the highway to the personal injury of another (Reynolds v. Clarke, supra, per Fortescue, J., at p. 635)."

And see Frazier v. Pennypack Trap Rock Co. (1901) 17 Montg. Co. (Pa.) 105, where the throwing of rocks upon adjoining premises by the discharge of a blast, being an actual physical invasion, was declared to be a trespass, while concussions, produced at the same time, were declared to be a nuisance.

declaration should have been taken at an earlier stage of the case. It is now too late to raise it. It is sufficient to warrant the judgment for abatement, that the declaration is in form an action of tort for a nuisance.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. POMEROY COAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1882. 37 Ohio St. 583.)

Prior to January 30, 1868, one Nahum Ward owned in fee lot 1223, on the Ohio river, in Meigs county, and at the same time one Philip Hondesheldt was the owner in fee of lot 1222, and V. B. Horton was the owner in fee of lot 301, and the latter had a lease from Hondesheldt granting the right to mine all the coal under the south half of lot 1222. On August 10, 1858, Mr. Horton conveyed to the Pomeroy Coal Company, by his lease of that date duly executed, his right to mine and take away the coal under said two tracts of land. By the terms of said lease the Pomeroy Coal Company bound itself to "quit and surrender the premises" at the end of ten years, to wit, by August 10, 1868. The defendant entered upon the premises, and as early as 1862 had mined all the available coal thereon, and did, in that year, abandon the said lease, with the consent of said Horton, and turned over to him the abandoned mines on said premises. The defendants, while excavating the coal on lot 1222, mined over on the adjoining lot 1223, from thirty-six to thirty-nine feet. In 1864 the plaintiff bought lot 1223 of said Nahum Ward, and began operating the mines thereon. In June, 1868, the workmen engaged in said plaintiff's mine tapped the water which had accumulated in the abandoned mine, and it flooded the mine of plaintiff. The working over on lot 1223 was done as early as 1861, but was not known to the plaintiff until the water flowed into his mine as above stated.

A judgment in the common pleas, on a verdict for the defendant, was affirmed, on error, by the district court. A petition in error is prosecuted to reverse these judgments.

WHITE, J. The decision of this case depends upon what constituted the cause of action against the defendant, and when it accrued. The claim of the plaintiff is that the cause of action consists of a private nuisance caused by the excavation made by the defendant on lot 1223 when removing the coal under his lease from the south half of lot 1222, and that the cause of action is a continuing one and first accrued when the water from the abandoned mine flowed over into the mine of the plaintiff. On the other hand, the claim of the defendant is that the cause of action consisted of the trespass committed in making the excavation, and was completed when the work was done and the mine abandoned. In the first place, it may be observed that this is not a case where the defendant has wrongfully entered upon the lands of the plaintiff and erected and maintained structures thereon. Nor is it a case where structures have been erected and maintained on the lands of the defendant or of another, to the nuisance or injury of the plaintiff's premises. In these cases the wrong may, by the lapse of time, ripen into a right under the statute of limitations or by prescription. In speaking to this point in Clegg v. Dearden, 12 Ad. & Ellis (N. S.) 601, Lord Denman uses the following language: "The gist of the action, as stated in the declaration, is the keeping open and unfilled up an aperture and excavation made by the defendant into the plaintiff's mine. By the custom, the defendant was entitled to excavate up to the boundary of his mine, without leaving any barrier, and the cause of action, therefore, is the not filling up the excavation made by him on the plaintiff's side of the boundary and within their mine. It is not, as in the case of Holmes v. Wilson, 10 A. & E. 503, a continuing of something wrongfully placed by the defendant upon the premises of the plaintiff; nor is it a continuing of something placed upon the land of a third person to the nuisance of the plaintiff, as in the case of Thompson v. Gibson, 7 Mees. & W. 456. There is a legal obligation to discontinue a trespass or remove a nuisance; but no such obligation upon a trespasser to replace what he has pulled down or destroyed upon the land of another, though he is liable in an action of trespass to compensate in damage for the loss sustained. The defendant, having made an excavation and aperture in the plaintiff's land, was liable to an action of trespass; but no cause of action arises from his omitting to reenter the plaintiff's land and fill up the excavation. Such an omission is neither a continuation of a trespass, nor a nuisance; nor is it a breach of any legal duty."

The defendant in the present case had no estate or interest in lot 1222 further than the right to mine the coal therefrom. This he accomplished in 1862, and surrendered the premises. He had no authority from the owner of the fee, nor from Horton, his immediate lessor, to mine over into lot 1223; and at the time of the flowage of water from the abandoned mine into the mine of the plaintiff, he had for more than five years ceased to have any interest in lot 1222 or any right of entry thereon.

If the claim of the defendant as to what constituted the cause of action is correct, the action clearly cannot be maintained. 1. For the reason that at the time of the commission of the trespass, the plaintiff was not the owner of the land upon which the trespass was committed; and, 2, if he had been such owner, the action would be barred by the statute of limitations.

There is no distinction in the application of the statute of limitations between trespasses under ground and upon the surface; nor whether the cause of action is known or unknown to the plaintiff within the time limited by the statute. Hawk v. Minnich, 19 Ohio St. 466, 2 Am. Rep. 413; Hunter v. Gibbons, 1 Hurl. & Nor. 459.

The question therefore is, whether the defendant, in addition to the liability for the trespass, is also liable for creating and continuing a nuisance. If he is so liable a recovery for the trespass would be no bar to subsequent actions for continuing the nuisance.

In Stephen's Commentaries (vol. 3, 499), a private nuisance is defined to be "anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another, and not amounting to a trespass."

Here the only thing done by the defendant was the making of the excavation upon the plaintiff's land, which did amount to a trespass.

Plaintiff's counsel claim that the action is brought to recover consequential damages resulting from the wrongful acts of the defendant. Be it so. But with what wrongful acts is the defendant chargeable except those constituting the trespass? We see none. And a recovery for the trespass or the bar of an action brought for it, is a bar to a recovery for the consequences resulting from such trespass. True, this is not the ground upon which the jury were charged, but the error in the charge was in favor of the plaintiff, and is no ground for reversal.[44]

Judgment affirmed.

HAYES v. BROOKLYN HEIGHTS R. CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1910. 200 N. Y. 183, 93 N. E. 469.)

Appeal, by permission, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, which affirmed an interlocutory judgment of Special Term sustaining a demurrer to a separate defense set forth in the answer. The following questions were certified:

"1. Does the complaint herein state a cause of action for the maintenance of a nuisance?

"2. Does the complaint herein state a cause of action for negligence?

"3. Should the demurrer to that part of the defendant's answer setting up the three years' Statute of Limitations be sustained?"

[44] Accord: National Copper Co. v. Minnesota Min. Co. (1885) 57 Mich. 83, 96, 23 N. W. 781, 787 (58 Am. Rep. 333): "Neither party was under obligation to keep its mine pumped out for the benefit of its neighbor. Either was at liberty to discontinue its operations and abandon its mine whenever its interest should seem to require it. And had the plaintiff brought an action within two years from the time of trespass, its recovery would necessarily have been had with this undoubted right of abandonment in view. But a jury could not have awarded damages for any exercise of a right, and they could not, therefore, have given damages for a possible injury to flow from such an abandonment. This is on the plain principle that the mere exercise of a right cannot be a legal wrong to another, and if damage shall happen, it is damnum absque injuria." Per Cooley, C. J.

Compare Lemmon v. Webb (1894) 3 Ch. 1: For more than twenty years the branches of a number of large old oaks and elms on D.'s land have overhung P.'s boundary. Smith v. Giddy (1904) 2 K. B. 448: P. claims damages because certain elm and ash trees on D.'s land overhang P.'s premises and interfere with the growth of his fruit trees.

HAIGHT, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have occurred on the 12th day of March, 1902, on Second avenue, in the borough of Brooklyn, by reason of his stepping into a hole or rut while crossing the avenue. The complaint alleges that the defendant was operating a street surface railroad upon the avenue in question and that it was its duty to keep in repair that portion thereof between the rails of its tracks and two feet in width outside of its tracks and that for a long time prior thereto the defendant suffered that portion of Second avenue to become and continue out of repair and a rut or hole to be formed therein and to become rough and uneven; and further that the suffering and loss of earning power and income of the plaintiff by reason of his injury "were due solely to the wrongful and unlawful conduct of the defendant, its agents and servants, in suffering said hole or rut to be and remain in the street near its tracks." The separate defense interposed by the defendant to which the plaintiff demurred is "that the cause of action upon which a recovery is herein sought did not accrue within three years next before the commencement thereof." The Special Term sustained the demurrer and from the interlocutory judgment entered thereon an appeal was taken to the Appellate Division, which affirmed the same by a divided court. This action was commenced on the 11th day of March, 1908.

The question presented is as to whether the action is based upon a nuisance or negligence. It will be observed that the complaint fails to allege that there existed a nuisance or that the defendant was negligent. Under the statute of limitations it is provided that an action to recover damages for a personal injury, "except in a case where a different period is expressly prescribed in this chapter," shall be brought within six years; and it is further provided that an action to recover damages for a personal injury resulting from negligence shall be brought within three years. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 383. If, therefore, the action alleged in the complaint resulted from negligence, the separate defense set forth in the answer was good, and the demurrer should not have been sustained. If, however, it did not result from negligence, then the demurrer was properly sustained.

A public nuisance, in so far as it applies to the case under consideration, consists in unlawfully doing an act or omitting to perform a duty, which act or omission endangers the safety of any considerable number of persons, or unlawfully interferes with, or tends to render dangerous, a public park, square, street, or highway. Under the railroad law the duty is imposed upon street surface railroads of keeping the space between their tracks and two feet on either side thereof in good and safe condition. Consol. Laws, c. 49, § 178. The duty, therefore, of municipalities of keeping their streets and highways in good and safe condition, is, to the extent specified by the statute, also devolved upon the railroad corporations, whose duty with reference thereto becomes the same as that which rests upon the municipality.

It will be observed that, under section 382, above referred to, the six-year statute of limitations has no application in a case where a different period is expressly prescribed, and under section 383 a different period is prescribed where the injury results from negligence. The question, therefore, arises as to whether the alleged injury in this case was the result of negligence on the part of the defendant. If a municipality or a railroad company should dig a pit or place a dangerous obstruction in or upon a public street, which it was obligated to keep in repair, it would be the creation of a public nuisance, and unquestionably the party creating the nuisance would be liable to a person suffering injuries by reason thereof. So, also, an individual maintaining a coal hole in the sidewalk in front of his premises with an insufficient cover, or who constructs a water pipe which receives the water collected from the roof of his building, and discharges it on the surface of the sidewalk, from which ice forms as the water flows across it to the gutter, becomes liable therefor as the creator of the nuisance irrespective of any question of negligence. Clifford v. Dam, 81 N. Y. 52; Tremblay v. Harmony Mills, 171 N. Y. 598, 64 N. E. 501.

But where the obstruction to a public street has resulted from other causes, or from the acts of others than that of the municipality, a different rule obtains with reference to its liability. In such cases the municipality is not the creator of the nuisance; but it becomes its duty to abate and remove the same, to the end that the public may pass safely over the public street. It is not called upon to abate and remove until it has notice of the existence of the obstruction, or such time has elapsed after the existence of the obstruction as will raise a presumption that the municipality or its officers had notice, or in the exercise of due diligence should have had such notice. In such cases the failure to abate or remove the obstacle involves a question of negligence; for, if it proceeds with reasonable diligence to remove the same, no recovery can be had against the municipality. But if it unreasonably suffers the nuisance to exist, it does so by reason of its negligence, and such becomes the basis of its liability.*

*Accord: McCluskey v. Wile (1911) 144 App. Div. 470, 129 N. Y. Supp. 455: The complaint alleged that the defendant, the owner of an apartment house in which the plaintiff resided, "unlawfully, negligently, and carelessly permitted a certain dog, the property of one of the tenants in said premises, to lie and remain about the hallways, lobbies, and staircases of said premises, so as to be dangerous to the life and limb of persons traversing the said hallways, lobbies, and staircases, and to become a nuisance, as the defendant well knew," that the defendant omitted to light the hallway, and that the plaintiff, without fault on her part, tripped on the said dog, which she could not see because of the defendant's failure to light the stairway, and was thereby injured. If the cause asserted is for negligence, it is barred by the statute; if it is for nuisance it is not barred. "The plaintiff undertakes to distinguish the case from Hayes v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 200 N. Y. 183, 93 N. E. 469, by the distinction between the words 'suffer' and 'permit.'"

Accordingly, in the case of Dickinson v. Mayor, etc., of N. Y., 92 N. Y. 584, where ice or snow had been suffered to remain upon a crosswalk of a street, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff sustained injuries for which he sought damages, it was held that the action was one for negligence, and not for a positive wrong committed by the defendant, and, therefore, the three-year statute of limitations ran against it.

We do not understand the case of Robinson v. Chamberlain, 34 N. Y. 389, 90 Am. Dec. 713, to be in conflict with our views as above expressed. True, it was held that a failure to keep a public highway in repair by those who have assumed that duty from the state, so that it is unsafe to travel over, is a public nuisance, making the party bound to repair liable in an action by a person who has sustained special damages by reason thereof; but that action was for negligence. It was prosecuted by the plaintiff against Chamberlain, a contractor who had undertaken to keep the state canal in repair. An injury was sustained by the plaintiff's canal boat in consequence of the defendant's neglect to perform his duties, and he was held liable for the injury by reason of his careless and negligent omission to perform his duties.

Our attention has been called to numerous other decisions bearing upon the question but we do not deem it necessary to specifically refer to them. We do not understand them to be in conflict with the distinction which we have made with reference to the two classes of cases discussed. We have referred to the liability of municipal corporations for the reason that such cases are more numerous and have been more generally under consideration in this court. In view of the fact, however, that the liability of a railroad company is the same as that of the municipality they become our guide in determining the questions involved in this case.

We entertain the view that the complaint alleges a cause of action based upon negligence, and consequently the demurrer to the separate defense set forth in the answer should be overruled. It follows that the interlocutory judgment of the Appellate Division and Special Term should be reversed and judgment ordered for defendant on demurrer, with costs in all courts, with leave to plaintiff to withdraw demurrer within twenty days on payment of such costs, and the second question certified answered in the affirmative, and the third question certified answered in the negative; the first question not answered. Judgment accordingly.

HALL et ux. v. GALLOWAY et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington, 1913. 76 Wash. 42, 135 Pac. 478.)

This was an action for damages, brought by Hall and his wife. The complaint set forth the following facts:

That the plaintiffs were husband and wife; that at the times mentioned in the complaint they were the owners and proprietors of a certain hotel which, at all the times mentioned, was a public house for the entertainment of travelers; that the plaintiffs were compelled to receive all travelers who properly apply for admission so long as there was room for them; that the plaintiffs conducted their house in an orderly manner and that they and their hotel bore a good reputation in the community; that about 9 o'clock p. m. on July 13, 1911, defendant Bannerman entered the hotel, placed upon the register the names of J. E. Henderson and wife and George H. Holmes and wife and asked for rooms, which were furnished to them; that the defendants and two females, unknown to the plaintiffs, entered the rooms, remained there for about two hours until expelled by the plaintiffs; that the defendants falsely represented themselves to be husbands of the females in question for the purpose of gaining admittance to the hotel and were unknown to the plaintiffs; that, soon after gaining admission to the hotel, the defendants and their consorts indulged in such lewd and disorderly conduct that the plaintiffs forcibly ejected them, the other guests being disturbed thereby; that by reason of this episode many guests of the hotel were led to believe it a place of ill repute; and that the plaintiffs were brought into public scorn and disgrace, whereby the patronage of their hotel was decreased, and as a consequence plaintiffs and each of them claimed to have been damaged in the sum of $5,000.

On motion the trial court ordered the plaintiffs to state as separate causes of action the alleged injury to Mr. Hall and the alleged injury to Mrs. Hall. The court also ordered, on a motion to make specific, that the plaintiffs set out the names of the guests and the names of others who were led to believe that the house was of ill repute, and also the amount of damages actually sustained by reason thereof. The court based this order on the ground that the alleged misconduct was not actionable per se, and that in order to be actionable it must result in actual loss to the plaintiffs, and that the rule in slander cases denying damages for repetitions of slander apply here, and that the guests at that time must be the ones who withdraw their patronage to the extent of causing loss, and that their names must be set forth. Attempting compliance with these orders, the plaintiffs filed their amended complaint, which was ordered stricken out for the reason that it did not set forth the names of the guests and others whose patronage was lost by reason of the alleged actions of the defendants. Thereupon the plaintiffs filed a second amended complaint to which a demurrer was sustained on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and that several causes of action were improperly united. The plaintiffs appeal from a judgment of dismissal.[45]

ELLIS, J. * * * The trial court, in sustaining the demurrer, held, in effect, that the law making certain words actionable per se is an exception to the general principles of the law of torts, and that such an exception should not prevail where the action is founded on slanderous conduct rather than slanderous words.

The trial court, in granting the several motions above referred to and in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint in its final form, dropped into a fundamental error which seems to have colored his view of the case throughout. This error consisted in a confusion of the law as to acts illegal in their nature, constituting a private nuisance injurious to the property of the plaintiffs as a community, with the rules of law relating to words spoken of individuals constituting slander, which is essentially a wrong personal to the individual slandered. While it is true that the two things in their nature partake somewhat of the same character, they are different in that the ultimate ground of recovery in the one case is for an injury to the property right alone, while in the other damages allowed are for an injury to personal character and the injury to the sensibilities resulting from the slanderous words. The one is, of course, an injury to all persons interested in the property affected by the illegal acts. The other is an injury only to the person of whom the slanderous words are spoken. As we view the original complaint, it stated every fact necessary to the allegation of the perpetration by the defendants of a private nuisance actionable per se in favor of the person whose property was injuriously affected. The statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 943), in defining actionable nuisances, included whatever is injurious to health, or indecent, or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to essentially interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life and property, and declares the same the subject of an action for damages and also for other and further relief. Section 944 specifically declares that any person whose property is injuriously affected or whose personal enjoyment is lessened by the nuisance may maintain the action. While the original complaint was inartificial in form, it stated every fact essential to a cause of action for a private nuisance so defined. * * *

(B) Elements of a Prima Facie Cause in Nuisance

(a) The Facts to be Pleaded, in an Action for Damages [46]

"Nuisance" is a good word to beg a question with. It is so comprehensive a term, and its content is so heterogeneous, that it scarcely does more than state a legal conclusion that for one or another of [46] Until a comparatively recent day, the standard declaration in trespass on the case in nuisance, like the standard declaration in trespass on the case in trover, beclouded the doctrine with immaterial matter. The following precedent, from 3 Chitty on Pleading, 433 (1816), is of this class:

"For that whereas the said A. B. on, etc., and long before was and con-widely varying reasons the thing stigmatized as a nuisance violates the rights of others.

LAFLIN & RAND POWDER CO. v. TEARNEY.

(Supreme Court of Illinois, 1890. 131 Ill. 322, 23 N. E. 390, 7 L. R. A. 262, 19 Am. St. Rep. 34.)

This was an action on the case, brought against the powder company, to recover for damage to buildings on the premises of the plaintiff, caused by the explosion of a powder magazine on the premises of the defendant. The declaration was not demurred to. Motions by the defendant for a verdict in its favor, for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment were all denied; and verdict and judgment were entered for the plaintiff. This judgment being affirmed in the Appellate Court, the defendant appeals.

MAGRUDER, J. * * * It is claimed by the appellant that the declaration does not set out a cause of action.

The first objection made to the declaration is that it does not charge the defendant with negligence. The objection is not well taken. The powder magazine kept by the defendant upon its premises was so situated with reference to the dwelling house of the plaintiff, that it was liable to inflict serious injury upon her person or her property in case of an explosion. It was a private nuisance, and, therefore, the defendant was liable whether the powder was carefully kept or not. As a tinually from thence hitherto hath been, and still is, lawfully possessed of and in a certain messuage or dwelling-house, with the appurtenances, situate and being at the parish of ———, in the county of ———, and by reason thereof, during all the time aforesaid, was and still is lawfully entitled to the use and enjoyment of a certain coach-walk or avenue, and of a certain footwalk or avenue there near adjoining and leading to the said messuage or dwelling-house, and to the shade, shelter, protection, and ornament of divers trees, to wit, ——— elm trees and ——— lime trees, during all the time aforesaid, growing and being in the said walks or avenues; yet the said C. D. well knowing the premises, but contriving and wrongfully intending to hurt, injure, and prejudice the said A. B. in this behalf, and to obstruct him in the use and enjoyment of the said walks and avenues, and to deprive him of the shade, shelter, protection, and ornament of the said trees there, whilst the said A. B. was so possessed and entitled as aforesaid, to wit, on the same day and year aforesaid, and on divers other days and times between that day and the day of exhibiting the bill of the said A. B. at, etc., aforesaid, wrongfully and injuriously cut, lopped, and topped the said trees, to wit, ——— of the said elm trees, and ——— of the said lime trees. By means whereof the said A. B. hath been greatly obstructed and prejudiced in the use and enjoyment of the said walks and avenues, and hath been and is greatly deprived of the shade, shelter, protection, and ornament of the said trees so lopped, topped, and cut as aforesaid, to wit, at, etc., aforesaid."

By the middle of the last century, however, the following form was recognized as a sufficient count in trespass on the case in nuisance:

"That the plaintiff was possessed of a dwelling-house in which he dwelt, and the defendant wrongfully built a brick kiln near thereto, and caused noxious and unwholesome smells, whereby the plaintiff's dwelling-house became unfit to live in." See 2 Chitty on Pleading (16th Am. Ed.) 584.

general rule, the question of care or want of care is not involved in an action for injuries resulting from a nuisance. If actual injury result from the keeping of gunpowder, the person keeping it will be liable therefor, even though the explosion is not chargeable to his personal negligence. Wood's Law of Nuisance (1st Ed.) §§ 73, 115, 130, 142; Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654; Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 213, 55 Am. Dec. 734; Stout v. McAdams, 2 Scam. (Ill.) 67, 33 Am. Dec. 441; Ottawa Gas Co. v. Thompson, 39 Ill. 600; Nevins v. City of Peoria, 41 Ill. 502, 89 Am. Dec. 392; Cooper v. Randall, 53 Ill. 24; Myers v. Malcolm, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 292, 41 Am. Dec. 744; Hay v. Cohoes Co., 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279; Phinizy v. Augusta, 47 Ga. 263; Burton v. McClellan, 2 Scam. (Ill.) 434; Wier's Appeal, 74 Pa. 230.

The second objection to the declaration is that it does not specifically aver the powder magazine to be a nuisance. It was not necessary to use the word "nuisance," if the facts alleged constituted a nuisance. The declaration avers, that it was the duty of the defendant to so use its premises as not to jeopardize the buildings of the plaintiff, and not to store upon its premises any dangerous substance whereby plaintiff's property might be destroyed in case of an explosion; that the defendant did keep upon its premises a magazine of gunpowder, dynamite, etc., and stored therein a large amount of gunpowder, dynamite, etc., that the gunpowder, dynamite, etc., so kept upon said premises, exploded, and that, by means of such explosion, "the material of which such magazine was constructed was then and there driven with great force and violence upon and against the property of the plaintiff hereinbefore described," and that "the following property of the plaintiff was, by means of such explosion, struck by flying missiles, rocks, and stones, and was wrecked and torn by means of the concussion of the air, then and there caused by said explosion, and was totally destroyed and lost, and was of great value—to wit: One two-story frame dwelling," etc.

"A private nuisance is defined to be anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements or hereditaments of another. 3 Bl. Com. 216. Any unwarrantable, unreasonable or unlawful use by a person of his own property, real or personal, to the injury of another, comes within the definition stated, and renders the owner or possessor liable for all damages arising from such use." Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579. The averments of the declaration bring the present case within the definition thus quoted. The fact that the magazine exploded shows that it was dangerous. The fact, that the explosion destroyed plaintiff's buildings, shows, that the keeping of gunpowder in the magazine, considered with reference to "the locality, the quantity and the surrounding circumstances," constituted a nuisance per se. Heeg v. Licht, supra; Wood's Law of Nuisance, § 142, supra. * * *

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.[47]

HOLMES v. CORTHELL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1888. 80 Me. 31, 12 Atl. 730.)

The action was for obstructing a public way by building a stone wall across it, whereby the plaintiff claimed to have suffered special damage.

HASKELL, J. * * * It is settled in this state that one who suffers special injury, no matter how inconsiderable, from a common nuisance, may recover damages in an action at law from the person creating it, (Rev. St. 1883, c. 17, § 12; Brown v. Watson, 47 Me. 161, 74 Am. Dec. 482; Dudley v. Kennedy, 63 Me. 465;) and from the person maintaining it after request to abate it, (Pillsbury v. Moore, 44 Me. 154, 69 Am. Dec. 91.) Three demurrers to the declaration have been filed, and two amendments of it have been allowed. To the sustaining of the last demurrer to the declaration, as finally amended, the plaintiff has taken exception. The declaration avers the existence of a public way, and the obstruction of it by the defendant in erecting a stone wall across it, whereby, on a given day and on divers other days and times, etc., the plaintiff in attempting to travel upon such way, was "hindered, obstructed, and prevented from passing" along it, and "incurred great danger and suffered great pain and inconvenience, in attempting to climb and pass over said wall," and thereby was injured in his comfort, property, and the enjoyment of his estate. The plaintiff avers that he was "hindered," etc., from passing along the way. Be it so. No averment shows any specific damage from this hindrance. It does not appear that upon any special occasion he was thereby compelled to make a longer detour to reach a particular place where he had need to go; nor that he lost any time or was put to any expense thereby. He may have incurred danger and suffered pain in trying to climb the wall, both of which may have resulted from his own careless or rash conduct, for which the defendant is not responsible. The plaintiff avers that certain of the work-people in his sardine factory "were hindered and prevented from going to and attending to their work, whereby he lost and was deprived of their services." Suppose this to be true, where is the injury to the plaintiff? He does not aver the loss of their service to be at his cost, nor that their services, if rendered, would have been of any value to him. Upon this score the plaintiff does not appear to have suffered any damage.

R. A. (N. S.) 714, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 67: "It is insisted that the complaint is defective because it contains no averment that the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, and no averment of facts showing that plaintiff could not have protected his property by exercising ordinary care. This theory is untenable. This is not an action for damages for negligence, but for damages for the maintenance of a nuisance, and to enjoin or abate it. Sections 291–293, Burns 1908; sections 289–291, R. S. 1881. In cases of this character, the rules governing the sufficiency of complaints for negligence have no application." Per Morris, C. J.

Hall v. Galloway (1913) 76 Wash. 42, 50, 135 Pac. 478, 481: "This case being an action for damages for the perpetration of a private nuisance injurious to the plaintiff's property, the complaint was not demurrable because of its failure to allege the specific items of damage claimed as would have been the case had the action been by a private person for special damages sustained by reason of the perpetration of a public nuisance."

Exceptions overruled.[48]

(b) Nature of the Plaintiff's Interest

WARREN v. WEBB.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1808. 1 Taunt. 379, 127 Reprint, 880.)

The plaintiff declared that he was possessed of a dwelling house in the parish of St. George the Martyr, in the county of Surrey, and that the defendant possessed a shop contiguous, and a wooden spout affixed thereon, for carrying off the rain water from the roof, which spout it belonged to the defendant to keep in such repair, that no injury should happen to the plaintiff's dwelling house; and alleged that the defendant suffered the spout to be out of repair, to wit, at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, whereby the rain water soaked through the spout, and penetrated and injured the plaintiff's wall, to wit, at Westminster, in the said county. The premises were proved to be in Surrey. At the trial of this cause at the Westminster sittings after last Easter term, before Mansfield, Ch. J., a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with liberty for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, upon the ground that this was a local action, and that the venue ought to have been laid in Surrey, where the nuisance was committed, whereas it was alleged to have happened in Middlesex. Accordingly, Cockell, Serjt., in Trinity term last, obtained a rule nisi to enter a nonsuit.

Mansfield, C. J. The objection taken in this case was that the plaintiff did not at the trial support his declaration. The defendant's counsel supposed that in the declaration the defendant's house was [48] The statement of facts is abridged and part of the opinion is omitted. Accord: Stone v. Wakeman (1608) Noy, 120: "Yet for another cause by the Court the plaintiff shall not have judgment (on a motion in arrest of judgment); because he hath not shewn how he hath suffered any particular damage or loss by that stopper." The action was in case "for stopping of a way." Sohn v. Cambern (1885) 106 Ind. 302, 6 N. E. 813: "The utmost that can be said of the facts stated in the special finding is, that they show that the appellee's route to her market town is interfered with by the obstruction placed in the highway, and this is not sufficient to entitle her to maintain this action. * * * It is true that the special finding states in general terms that the appellee has suffered special injury, but this is a mere statement of a legal conclusion, and is not the statement of a fact. Special findings, like special verdicts, must state facts, and not simply conclusions of law." Per Elliott, J. Van Buskirk v. Bond (1908) 52 Or. 234, 96 Pac. 1103: Suit by private parties to enjoin an alleged public nuisance. The statement of the plaintiff's damage was merely "that they are peculiarly and particularly injured by reason of the attempted closing of said roads by the defendant."

alleged to be in Middlesex, and the evidence was that the house was in Surrey. On reading the declaration it at first appeared to me that the videlicet in the county of Middlesex, as applied to a house or anything else in Surrey, in its nature local, is nonsense, and a contradiction in terms. And upon consideration the true sense appears to be this: It is a description of the house, a local object, which it states to be in Middlesex, and consequently the objection must prevail. If this is not a description of the place where the defendant's house is situated there is no description of it, and if no place is alleged in the declaration, it must be intended that the house lies in the county in which the nuisance is alleged to be committed, which is Middlesex. Therefore quacunque via data the declaration is not supported.[49]

Rule absolute.

MALONE v. LASKEY.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1907] 2 K. B. 141.)

Sir GORELL BARNES, President.[50] In this case the plaintiff sues the defendants for damages for injuries sustained by her under circumstances which I will state sufficiently fully to indicate the point that we have to decide. The premises on which the accident happened be-

[49] Compare Fitz. Ab. Accion sur le Cas, pl. 24, where it is said by Markham: "Si home leve un fosse ou molin a travers de mon chymin, j'avera assise de nusans et nul auter brief."

For the nature of the Assize of Nuisance, as a real action, see 3 Bl. Com. 221, Jenks' Short Hist. Eng. Law, 94; 2 Pollock and Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, 53: "To meet that troubling of possession which is caused by nuisances as distinguished from trespasses, that is, by things that are erected, made, or done, not on the soil possessed by the complainant but on neighbouring soil, there has all along been an 'assize of nuisance' which is a supplement for the novel disseisin. Law endeavours to protect the person who is seised of land, not merely in the possession of the land, but in the enjoyment of those rights against his neighbours which he would be entitled to were he seised under a good title." The scope of the assize was slightly extended by the Statute of Westminster II. "Indeed, the narrow scope of the assize is given as an illustration of the kind of evil the statute was meant to remedy." And so popular did the action in the case become that the older remedy of the assize, even where it was available, soon tended to disappear." 3 Holdsworth's Hist. Eng. Law, 8; Jenks' Shorter Hist. 94.

On the continuance of the local character of the cause for a private nuisance notwithstanding its development into a possible cause for damages merely, compare 40 Cyc. 20, 21, "Actions with a Local Source," and Watts v. Kinney (1843) 6 Hill (N. Y.) 82, 91. An analogous limitation appears in the doctrine as to the character of the cause to recover damages merely for a trespass to land. See 40 Cyc. 31, 72; but see Little v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (1896) 65 Minn. 48, 53, 67 N. W. 846, 33 L. R. A. 423, 60 Am. St. Rep. 421.

On both principle and authority an action to abate a nuisance should remain local. Compare 40 Cyc. 73; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. (1853) 15 How. (U. S.) 233, 244, 14 L. Ed. 674. And see Simmons v. Lillystone (1853) 8 Exch. 441.

[50] The reporter's statement of the case, the arguments of counsel, the concurring opinions of Fletcher Moulton and Kennedy, L. JJ., and so much of Sir Gorell Barnes' opinion as relates to the question of negligence, are omitted. As respects negligence in such a case, see infra.

long to the Birkbeck Building Society, and the defendants are the trustees for that society. A house which belonged to them was let by the defendants in 1899 to Witherby & Co., who in 1901 sub-let a portion to the Script Shorthand Company. Malone, the plaintiff's husband, was in that company's employ and occupied a part of the premises, apparently as part of the consideration for his services to his employers. There was a lavatory in the house, of which Malone and his family had the use and apparently the exclusive use; and in the lavatory there was flush cistern, which was fixed against the wall. About the end of 1904 the cistern was said to be in an unsafe condition, and a communication was made by the plaintiff or her husband to Witherby & Co. on the subject. On December 26 Witherby & Co. wrote to Priest, who was one of the staff employed by the defendants, saying that the cistern required to be replaced and was then in a dangerous condition. On January 6, 1905, the plaintiff wrote another letter of complaint to the representative of Witherby & Co., in which vibration was alluded to as a cause of the dangerous state of the cistern. The vibration to which that letter referred arose from the working of an electric light engine which was worked by the defendants on their premises close to this building, and its constant working is said to have affected the security of the cistern or tank. Some time in the same month the defendants, to whom the complaints had been handed on by Witherby & Co. sent two plumbers, who were the servants of the defendants and part of their permanent staff, to rectify the defect in the condition of the cistern. The plumbers placed an iron bracket under the cistern to support it, and were then apparently satisfied that they had left it secure. This unfortunately turned out not to be the fact. In May, 1905, while the plaintiff was in the lavatory, she was injured by the bracket falling on her and inflicting injuries, to recover damages for which she brought the present action. At the trial Darling, J., left certain questions to the jury, in answer to which they found that the bracket fell by reason of the working of the engine; that the working of the engine amounted to a nuisance; that the plaintiff's injuries were the consequence thereof; that the defendants put up the bracket in an improper and negligent manner, and left the apparatus in a dangerous condition, and that the plaintiff was injured in consequence; and they assessed the damages at £400. We are now asked to set aside the judgment for the plaintiff and enter judgment for the defendants, or to send the case back for a new trial, but the substantial point argued has been whether judgment should be entered for the defendants. There is one further fact which I ought perhaps to mention. The plaintiff said in cross-examination that she remembered that when the new bracket was put up she did not think it was safe, and that she wrote again about it. There is also some evidence given by the husband and daughter that the tank shook after the bracket was put up. No question, indeed, was put to the jury as to the knowledge of the plaintiff that the cistern was still unsafe, possibly because the plaintiff had been considerably injured by the accident, and her evidence was therefore kept as short as possible. Therefore any discussion of the question whether the plaintiff knew the risk, and accepted the position of acting as though the cistern were safe, must be conducted independently of any finding of the jury on the point.

The two main questions argued before us were (1) whether the plaintiff had a cause of action arising from the nuisance alleged, which question involves the consideration of the first three questions left to the jury; and (2) whether there was a cause of action based on the negligence of the defendants in undertaking to do the work and doing it in such an improper manner that injury resulted to the plaintiff. As to the first question, I must confess to feeling some doubt whether there was any substantial evidence that the fall of the bracket was due to the alleged vibration, but that would only affect the question of whether there should be a new trial. I doubt whether the findings of the jury can be correct; the plaintiff contended that the use of oil in the engine had made a change, but the defendants reverted from January to May to the use of coal; and further, as the engine had been working for years, it is not likely to have done this damage in three months. The main question, however, on this part of the case is whether the plaintiff can maintain this action on the ground of vibration causing the damage complained of, and in my opinion the plaintiff has no cause of action upon that ground. Many cases were cited in the course of the argument in which it had been held that actions for nuisance could be maintained where a person's rights of property had been affected by the nuisance, but no authority was cited, nor in my opinion can any principle of law be formulated, to the effect that a person who has no interest in property, no right of occupation in the proper sense of the term, can maintain an action for a nuisance arising from the vibration caused by the working of an engine in an adjoining house. On that point, therefore, I think that the plaintiff fails, and that she has no cause of action in respect of the alleged nuisance. * * * [51]

Judgment for defendants.

HOSMER v. REPUBLIC IRON & STEEL CO.

Action against the Steel Company. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals.

The facts made by the complaint are that, for a long time previous to the grievances herein complained of, plaintiff occupied and resided with his family, including intestate, who was his son, upon land near Greeley, Ala., and that, after plaintiff's residence and occupation upon said land had commenced, the defendant dammed up certain water, and thereby created a pond near plaintiff's residence; that defendant was engaged in the development of iron and other minerals, and had caused said pond to remain there for a long time, and had placed in said pond various substances, which caused said pond to give off foul and unwholesome and noxious air, and caused said premises on which plaintiff resided to become unhealthy, causing plaintiff's boy to become sick, so that he died. The demurrers were that the cause of action did not survive to the personal representative, and that the damages claimed did not survive; that there was nothing to show that plaintiff's intestate was the owner of the land, or had any possessory or leasehold interest therein; that the damages claimed are purely consequential; and that no right of action was shown.

SAYRE, J. The effect of the complaint is to aver that the death of plaintiff's intestate, on account of which he sues, was caused by an issue of foul, unwholesome, and noxious air from a pond which defendant corporation constructed in the neighborhood of his residence, where intestate, his minor child, lived with him. We are not required to know how plaintiff will prove the causation alleged; but, accepting the allegation as true and provable on demurrer, there will be no question but that it shows damage peculiar to intestate, not merely in degree but in kind. The only factor of the case presented which it is conceived may possibly be effective in denial of the cause of action asserted is that plaintiff's intestate owned no legal interest or estate in the land upon which he lived. To sustain his contention that the complaint is defective in this respect, appellee quotes Blackstone's definition of nuisance as "anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another." We have made approving use of that definition in several cases. On this occasion it is necessary to note that the hurt or annoyance of the definition is not necessarily a physical injury to the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, but may be an injury to the owner or possessor thereof in respect of his dealing with, possessing, or enjoying them. Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 1174.

At the old common law, a declaration in a suit brought for the physical abatement of a nuisance by the writ of nuisance was required to allege a freehold estate in the premises affected, but that was because the action was a real action. One modern way of abating a nuisance is by an action on the case for damages merely, in which case the declaration need only show that the plaintiff was rightfully in possession of the premises affected. 14 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 1113. This remedy, however, is not permitted to those who suffer only in common with the public; for otherwise, in the language of Chief Justice Shaw in Quincy Canal v. Newcomb, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 276, 39 Am. Dec. 778, where he was speaking of a public nuisance which had not become a private nuisance by reason of special damage to the plaintiff, that "would lead to such a multiplication of suits as to be itself an intolerable evil." But that is as far as the best considered cases have gone in the policy of repressing litigation on account of wrongs done and suffered through nuisances, and we apprehend it is as far as the courts ought to go or will. This court, in common with all others, has held that the fact that a nuisance may have deleteriously affected the property or personal well-being of others in the neighborhood does not alleviate any material and special injury done to the plaintiff, nor merge it in the public wrong for which the public may have a remedy in one way or another. Richards v. Daugherty, 133 Ala. 569, 31 South. 934. It is obvious that to maintain an action for an injury affecting the value of the freehold the plaintiff must have a legal estate. But if noxious vapors and the like cause sickness and death to one who has a lawful habitation in the neighborhood, no sufficient reason is to be found in the accepted definitions of nuisance, nor in that policy of the courts which would discourage vexatious litigation, nor in the inherent justice of the situation, as we see it, why the person injured, or his personal representative in case of death, should not have reparation in damages for any special injury he may have suffered, although he has no legal estate in the soil.[52] Certainly a child has the right to live under his father's roof—is a lawful occupant of his father's home—and in our opinion he should be accorded the same measure of protection against the construction of nuisances in the neighborhood which are so noxious and long-continued as to materially affect his physical well-being. Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Ry. v. Glenn, [52] On the widening theory of Nuisance compare the following:

(I) "Private nuisance is the using or authorizing the use of one's property, or of anything under one's control, so as to injuriously affect an owner or occupier of property (a) by diminishing the value of that property; (b) by continuously interfering with his power of control or enjoyment of that property; (c) by causing material disturbance or annoyance to him in his use or occupation of that property." Pollock's Draft of a Civil Wrongs Bill, for the Government of India (1886) § 55.

(II) "A nuisance consists in unlawfully doing an act or omitting to perform a duty, which act or omission either: (1) Annoys, injures or endangers the comfort, repose, health or safety of others; or (2) offends decency; or (3) unlawfully interferes with, or obstructs or tends to obstruct or renders dangerous for passage any lake or navigable river, bay, stream, canal or basin, or any public park, square, street, or highway; or (4) in any way renders other persons insecure in life or in the use of property." (III) "Whatever is injurious to health, or indecent or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as essentially to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property, is a nuisance, and the subject of an action." In that case may be found a discussion of most of the cases upon which appellee relies, and, while they have had due consideration by us, we have not felt obliged by duty or expediency to repeat what was there said. We have stated our concurring conclusion, and, in a general way, the reasons upon which we proceed. This must suffice.

The court erred in sustaining the demurrer as for any ground assigned, and the judgment will be reversed.[53]

ROBERTS et al. v. HARRISON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, 1897. 101 Ga. 773, 28 S. E. 995, 65 Am. St. Rep. 342.)

SIMMONS, C. J. A petition was filed by Roberts and five others, under section 4760 of the Civil Code, for the removal of a pond of water, which had collected upon the lands of W. O. Harrison. The jury returned a verdict finding the pond a nuisance, and the justices

Compare the remark of Powell, J., delivering the opinion in Towaliga Falls Power Co. v. Sims (1909) 6 Ga. App. 749, 65 S. E. 844: "At common law a nuisance was regarded only as in injury to some interest in land. Blackstone's definition of a private nuisance is 'anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements or hereditaments of another.' The definition adopted in our Code is broader: 'A nuisance is anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage to another.' Civ. Code 1895, § 3861. An examination of the authorities will show that the modern tendency of the American courts is to break away from so much of the common-law rule as confined redress on account of nuisances to the damage done to some interest in real property, and as gave remedy only to persons having interests in lands. An interesting case on the subject is that of Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Ry. Co. v. Glenn, 97 Tex. 586, 80 S. W. 992, 65 L. R. A. 818, 104 Am. St. Rep. 894 [1 Ann. Cas. 270]. It is hardly consistent with the modern idea of legal rights, wrongs, and remedies that a husband living in a house, the title to which is in his wife, should not have a cause of action against one who erects near by a nuisance which sickens him, and causes him other great losses—and yet some courts go to this extent. Under our Code we think the rule is not so rigid; but that one who has been specially endamaged by a nuisance can recover from the wrongdoer, though his damage consists in an injury to his purse or person, irrespective of whether he has had an interest in real estate damaged or not."

of the peace directed the sheriff or his deputy to enter upon the lands, "and abate the nuisance complained of by removing said pond in the most feasible manner." The defendant carried the case by certiorari to the superior court. There the certiorari was sustained, and the judgment of the justices set aside, on the ground that while, in a sense, the pond complained of is a nuisance, it is not such a legal nuisance as the justices of the peace have jurisdiction to abate. The area of the pond in question varied from time to time, and the water, partially receding, would leave exposed to the sun portions of the land which had been submerged. In the processes of evaporation, and by the decay of large masses of vegetable matter, noxious and deleterious gases were emitted, which were injurious to the public health, and to the health of persons residing in the community. The accumulation of the water was due solely to natural causes, and the defendant did not, by his own act or negligence, contribute to bring about the alleged nuisance. At one time the land had been drained by a ditch which emptied into a creek, but in consequence of the filling in and choking up of either the ditch or the creek, or both, the water accumulated, and formed the pond. The defendant had done nothing to interfere with the natural drainage, and the pond was formed by the overflow of the creek, due entirely to causes over which the defendant had no control.

The presence of the pond and the attendant evils were doubtless annoying, and even injurious, to persons residing in the neighborhood, but we think that they do not constitute a nuisance for which the defendant can be held answerable, or which he can be compelled, under section 4760 of the Civil Code, to abate. This court has held that a person is not guilty of an actionable nuisance unless the injurious consequences complained of are the natural and proximate results of his own acts or failure of duty. Brimberry v. Railway Co., 78 Ga. 641, 3 S. E. 274, and the cases there cited and discussed. This doctrine, we think, is the true one, and it is recognized as such by all of the authorities on this point which we have examined. In 1 Wood, Nuis. 116, we find the rule thus stated: "Where water collects in low, marshy places, and, by reason of becoming stagnant, emits gases that are destructive to the health, and lives even, of the community, this is not a nuisance in the legal sense; and the owner of the land is not bound to drain it, nor can he be subjected to action or indictment therefor. The reason is that, in order to create a legal nuisance, the act of man must have contributed to its existence. Ill results, however extensive or serious, that flow from natural causes, cannot become a nuisance, even though the person upon whose premises the cause exists could remove it with little trouble and expense. * * * Thus it will be seen that a nuisance cannot arise from the neglect of one to remove that which exists or arises from purely natural causes." See, also, Giles v. Walker, 24 Q. B. Div. 656; Mohr v. Gault, 10 Wis. 513, 78 Am. Dec. 687; Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 166; State v. Rankin, 3 S. C. 438, 16 Am. Rep. 737; Peck v. Herrington, 109 Ill. 611, 50 Am. Rep. 627; Woodruff v. Fisher, 17 Barb. (N. Y.) 224. The facts of the present case place it within the principles announced in the cases above cited, and the judgment of the justices of the peace was erroneous. The certiorari of the defendant was properly sustained, and the judgment of the justices set aside. Judgment affirmed.[54]

(Supreme Court of New York, 1844. 6 Hill, 292, 41 Am. Dec. 744.)

Case. The action was brought to recover damages for an injury occasioned to the plaintiff by the explosion of a quantity of gunpowder belonging to the defendants. On the trial it appeared, among other things, that the defendants received about 600 pounds of powder in kegs, and placed it in the loft of a store in the village of Syracuse; that they were soon afterwards notified to remove it by the trustees of the village, and did so by depositing it in the upper story of a carpenter's shop; that the shop was built of wood, and was situated on the canal, within the limits of the corporation; that there was a lumber yard near the shop, and several wooden buildings, some of which were inhabited dwellings, and others were used as stables, etc.; and that the lower part of the shop was occupied during the day by a carpenter, but no fire was allowed in it, and it was locked up each night. It further appeared that the shop took fire on the night of August 20, 1841, about five days after the powder had been deposited in it, and that during the progress of the fire the powder exploded, killing several persons, and seriously wounding and injuring others, among whom was the plaintiff. * * *

NELSON, C. J. The charge of the circuit judge, as detailed in the bill of exceptions, is not very explicit, but we may fairly assume, I think, that the case was put to the jury on the question whether the conduct of the defendants, in regard to the manner of depositing the powder, was such as to render them guilty of a public nuisance; and if that point has been properly determined in favor of the plaintiff, then I apprehend his right to private damages must follow as a corollary. In this view, the question of negligence on the part of the defendants, except so far as it may be necessarily involved in the question of nuisance, has very little, if anything, to do with the case. But, on the other hand, if the defendants' conduct was not sufficient to render them chargeable with the offense mentioned, then the whole gist of the action lies in negligence, and the inquiry might arise whether this was so connected with the injury as to render the defendants liable. Perhaps evidence enough was given at the trial to have justified the judge in putting the case to the jury in either aspect; though the most satisfactory position for the plaintiff, I am inclined to think, and the one most difficult to be answered by the defendants, is the ground that the depositing and keeping of the powder in the exposed situation described by the witnesses, amounted to a public nuisance, and that any individual sustaining a special injury from the act, was entitled to his private damages.

It was not doubted in the case of People v. Sands, 1 Johns. 78, 3 Am. Dec. 296, that the act of carelessly keeping fifty barrels of gunpowder in a house in the village of Brooklyn was a nuisance at common law. The allegation in the indictment there was, that the defendants kept the barrels in a certain house near the dwelling houses of divers good citizens, and near a certain public street, without otherwise characterizing the manner of keeping the article; and upon the principle that nothing will be intended or inferred to support an indictment, the court said, for aught they could see, the house might have been one built and secured for the very purpose of keeping powder in such a way as not to expose the neighborhood. Spencer, J., dissented, holding that enough appeared to make the question one for the jury to settle, who could inquire into the various circumstances of place, quantity, exposed situation of the neighborhood, etc. In a case before Lord Holt, Anonymous, 12 Mod. 342, the defendant was indicted and convicted for keeping several barrels of gunpowder in a house in Brentford Town, sometimes two days and sometimes a week, till he could conveniently send them to London. And it was there resolved, "that though gunpowder be a necessary thing, and for defense of the kingdom, yet if it be kept in such a place as it is dangerous to the inhabitants, or passengers, it will be a nuisance." In Rex v. Taylor, 2 Str. 1167, the King's Bench granted an information against the defendant, for a nuisance, upon "affidavits of his keeping great quantities of gunpowder, to the endangering of the church and houses where he lived," or, as it should have been expressed, according to Burns, "to the endangering of the lives of His Majesty's subjects." 2 Burns, Just. 667, 668; 1 Russ. Cr. 297, and note "o."

I think the jury would have been well warranted in finding the defendants guilty of the offense, upon the facts disclosed in this case, as it cannot be doubted that the gunpowder was deposited in a building insufficiently secured and protected, and altogether unfit for the safe-keeping of so large a quantity of the article. The situation of the building in other respects, moreover, was such as to render the gunpowder dangerous to the lives of the citizens; for an explosion, either by accident or design, at any period of time after the deposit, would in all human probability have proved destructive to more or less of the inhabitants residing in the neighborhood.

Assuming that the jury were justified in coming to this conclusion, the authorities are abundant to show that the defendants were answerable to the plaintiff for the personal injury occasioned by the explosion. The principle is stated by Abbott, C. J., in Duncan v. Thwaites, 3 Barn. & C. 556. He there said: "I take it to be a general rule, that a party who sustains a special and particular injury by an act which is unlawful on the ground of public injury, may maintain an action for his own special injury." The following cases exemplify and apply the principle, viz.: Rose v. Miles, 4 Maule & S. 101; Henly v. Mayor, etc., of Lyme Regis, 5 Bing. 91; 3 Barn. & Ad. 77; s. c. in error, 1 Bing. N. (Supreme Court of Michigan, 1892. 90 Mich. 221, 51 N. W. 209, 15 L. R. A. 249, 30 Am. St. Rep. 426.)

The defendant shot and killed the plaintiff's dog. In an action in a justice's court, the defendant had judgment. The only question submitted to the jury on the trial in the circuit court was as to the value of the dog, which the jury found to be $25, and verdict and judgment were entered for that amount. Defendant brings error.[56]

LONG, J. On the trial the defendant introduced testimony tending to show justification for the killing. The court permitted the testimony to be introduced, but held that it did not amount to a justification. The only question raised in this court is whether the court should have submitted that branch of the case for the determination of the jury.

We think the court was in error in not so doing. It appeared that the defendant did not keep a dog; that he lived on Bagg street, city of Detroit, and for eight days prior to the shooting he and his family had been greatly annoyed by the congregation of a large number of dogs about his premises, barking, quarreling, and fighting there; that they came every night upon his lawn, about his house, when it became dark (on two occasions he counted 12 dogs), and that they kept up their cries all night at intervals; that he complained to the police on three different days prior to the killing, but without any relief, and he had driven them away on several nights; that the noise made by them kept the members of his family awake, and seriously annoyed them; that he did not know the owners; that on the night he killed plaintiff's dog he drove them away twice, but they returned; that he could not get near them, but they would return; that they became an intolerable nuisance, and finally, about 8 o'clock in the evening, he went out with his revolver, and shot among them, while on his lawn. He did not know who owned any of them, and did not shoot at any particular dog.

The defendant had a right to protect his family from such nuisance; and it was a question for the jury whether he used such means as were reasonable and necessary, under the circumstances, to rid himself of it.[57]

The judgment must be reversed, with costs, and a new trial ordered.

But because the portion of the water turned aside had not continual course or running, but was oftentimes stopped by the cock, and opened again at the pleasure of the wife toties quoties, that may be called in her a new diversion &c. And so she was found guilty, and damages £10. And so was the opinion of the justices in banc.

HUGHES et al. v. MUNG.

(General Court of Maryland, 1796. Court of Appeals, 1797. 3 Har. & McH. 441.)

This was an action on the case for diverting an ancient watercourse. By the bill of exceptions taken at the trial it appears the plaintiffs made title to the land in the declaration mentioned, called Penny Pack Pond, under a patent granted to Peter Rench in March, 1753, and by him conveyed by deed of bargain and sale, duly executed and recorded, bearing date on the 13th November, 1781. And to support their action the plaintiffs offered evidence to prove that the water, for the diversion of which this action is brought, formerly ran through the land above mentioned. That about 27 or 28 years ago, George Nicholas Mung, the father of the defendant, diverted the said stream of water from its ancient course, as located by the plaintiffs upon the plats returned in the cause, and turned it into the course in which it now runs, as located upon the said plats. The plaintiffs also offered evidence to prove that the said stream of water has, ever since the said diversion by George Nicholas Mung, run where it now runs as located on the plats returned, and still runs there; that the land through which the said stream now runs, is held and claimed by the defendant, Jacob Mung, and has been so held and claimed by him ever since the 1st of January, 1792: that the defendant ever since that time has continued, and still does continue, to use the said stream of water in the channel in which it now runs, by watering his stock therein, by enclosing it within his fences, and by throwing the water thereout occasionally upon his meadow.

The defendant's counsel prayed the opinion of the court, that this evidence was not sufficient in law to enable the plaintiffs to sustain their action.

THE COURT (CHASE and DUVALL, JJ.) were of opinion, and so directed the jury, that an action will lie for the diversion of the watercourse against the person who diverted it, and against any person who keeps up the obstruction which changed the watercourse; but no adventitious accidental advantages, derived from the use of the water running in its present course, will amount to a continuance of the nuisance, without some act done by the defendant to keep up the obstructions occasioning the diverting of the course of the stream, and that the present action cannot be supported without showing those acts were done since the title of the plaintiffs accrued to the lands called Penny Pack Pond.

To this opinion the plaintiffs excepted, and appealed to the Court of Appeals.

The Court of Appeals, at June term, 1797, affirmed the judgment.

LEAHAN v. COCHRAN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1901. 178 Mass. 566, 60 N. E. 382, 53 L. R. A. 891, 86 Am. St. Rep. 506.)

The evidence tended to show the following facts:

Affixed to the house of the defendant was a conductor, constructed and used for the purpose of carrying water from the roof to the public sidewalk adjoining; there was a groove in the sidewalk, extending from the end of the conductor to the outer edge of the sidewalk; the water from the conductor had frozen in and about the groove upon the sidewalk; and the plaintiff while traveling, in the exercise of due care, over the ice, was injured. The evidence warranted a finding that in the winter the natural and probable result of the situation would be the formation of ice upon the sidewalk, which would be dangerous to public travel, and therefore a public nuisance. At the time of the accident the defendant had been the owner of the house for several years, and there was no evidence that the defendant constructed the building, the conductor, the groove, or the sidewalk; and it appeared that the condition of the conductor at the time of the purchase was, and ever since had been, the same as at the time of the accident. There was no evidence that the defendant ever had been requested by the plaintiff, or by any other person, to reform the nuisance, or that the plaintiff ever complained of it to the defendant.

There was a judgment for the plaintiff and the defendant brought exceptions.

HAMMOND, J. The action is at common law and the question whether the notice requisite to the maintenance of an action, under Pub. St. c. 52, § 19, was given, is immaterial. It is not argued that the evidence did not warrant a finding that this conductor in its natural operation did create a nuisance in the highway. The only question presented is whether the court erred in declining to give the second and third rulings requested by the defendant. These requests raise the question whether, the situation being the same as at the time of the purchase by the defendant, she can be held answerable to the plaintiff, in the absence of any request made to her to reform the nuisance. There can be no doubt that in the case of a private nuisance the general doctrine in this country, following Penruddock's Case, 5 Coke, 100, is that the grantee of land upon which, at the time of the grant, there exists a nuisance created by his predecessors in title, is not responsible merely because he has become the owner of the land. His liability arises from his knowingly continuing the nuisance in its original state unless he has had notice to abate, or, at least, until he has had knowledge that it is a nuisance, and injurious to the rights of others; and, while there is some dissent from this doctrine (see opinion of Denio, J., in Brown v. Railroad Co., 12 N. Y. 486; of Strong, J., in Hubbard v. Russell, 24 Barb. [N. Y.] 404; and of Manning, J., in Caldwell v. Gale, 11 Mich. 77), still it must be regarded as the law of this commonwealth (McDonough v. Gilman, 3 Allen, 264, 80 Am. Dec. 72 and cases cited). The cases are numerous in which this doctrine has been applied to private nuisances, but with the exception of Woram v. Noble, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 398, we have seen no case where the doctrine has been directly applied to the case of a public nuisance, although in Wenzlick v. McCotter, 87 N. Y. 122, 41 Am. Rep. 358, and Dodge v. Stacy, 39 Vt. 558, the court seems to have failed to notice any difference in this respect between private and public nuisances.

We think the rule should not be extended to a public nuisance like that in this case. The reason generally given for the rule is that, in the absence of any notice to the contrary, the grantee has the right to assume that the structures upon the land are rightfully there, and that, even where they may seem to interfere with the usual rights appurtenant to other estates, he may properly assume that the right thus to interfere has been lawfully obtained, and it is said that it would be inequitable to subject him to damages until he has had notice that in maintaining the structure or work complained of he is infringing upon the rights of others. The reason of the rule is not applicable to a case like this. The conductor, in its natural and intended use, caused ice to form upon the sidewalk, which, being dangerous to public travel, was a public nuisance. No matter how often the ice was formed, the right thus to incumber the street could not be lawful. The right to create such a nuisance was not a matter of grant, nor could it have been acquired by prescription. City of Holyoke v. Hadley Water-Power Co., 174 Mass. 424, 426, 54 N. E. 889; Inhabitants of New Salem v. Eagle Mill Co., 138 Mass. 8. In so far as the conductor, by its natural operation, caused the formation of such ice, it created a nuisance. The defendant, as owner, must have known this, or must be presumed to have known it. In such a case, the reason for the requirement of notice does not exist, and we see no reason why the rule should be applied. See Matthews v. Railway Co., 26 Mo. App. 75. Exceptions overruled.

ROSEWELL v. PRIOR.

In an action upon the case, for that the plaintiff being seised of an ancient house and lights, the defendant had erected, etc., whereby they were stopped. There was a former recovery for this erection, and this action was for the continuance; and the case was, tenant for years erected a nuisance, and afterwards made an under-lease to J. S. The question was, whether, after a recovery against the first tenant for years for the erection, an action would lie against him for the continuance after he had made an under-lease?

Et PER CUR. It lies; for he transferred it with the original wrong, and his demise affirms the continuance of it: he hath also rent as a consideration for the continuance, and therefore ought to answer the damage it occasions. Vide Jones, 272. Receipt of rent is upholding 2 Cro. 372, 555. The action lies against either at the plaintiff's election.[59]

LAMBTON v. MELLISH.

LAMBTON v. COX.

(Chancery Division. [1894] 3 Ch. 163.)

The plaintiff moved against the defendant in each action for an injunction restraining him from playing any organ so as to cause a nuisance or injury to the plaintiff or his family or other occupiers of the plaintiff's property. The following facts were shown:

The plaintiff was the lessee and occupier of a house adjoining Ashstead Common in Surrey. The premises of the defendant Mellish were about 60 yards from the plaintiff's premises; those of the defendant Cox were about 120 yards from the plaintiff's premises and about 100 yards from those of the defendant Mellish, and were separated from both by a line of railway. During the summer months a large number of school treats and assemblages of that description took place on Ashstead Common. The defendants Mellish and Cox were rival refreshment contractors who catered for visitors and excursionists to the common, and both the defendants had merry-go-rounds on their premises, and were in the habit of using organs as an [59] See also Todd v. Flight (1860) 9 C. B. (N. S.) 377, 389.

In Plumer v. Harper (1824) 3 N. H. 88, 14 Am. Dec. 333, where the original creator of the nuisance had conveyed the property in fee, Richardson, C. J., remarks: "If the question which this case presents were now to be decided for the first time, it seems to us that it would be very difficult to find a good reason why the original wrongdoer should be discharged by conveying the land. The injury has no connection with the ownership of the land. If A. enter into the land of B., and there erect a dam, which causes the water to overflow B.'s land, there can be no doubt that he will be liable for any damage resulting from such overflowing. So if A. enters B.'s land and there erects a nuisance to the prejudice of C., it is clear that A. will be liable to C. When he who erects the nuisance conveys the land, he does not transfer the liability to his grantee. For it is agreed in all the books that the grantee is not liable until, upon request, he refuses to remove the nuisance. It does not make the original act less injurious because the grantee adopts it; and we are not aware that in any action against an individual for a tort it can be a good defense to show that a third person has assented to the wrong, and thus become liable."

accompaniment to the amusements. These organs for three months or more in the summer were played continuously together from about 10 a. m. till 6 p. m. and the noise caused by the two organs was "maddening."

The organ used by Mellish had been changed and it was alleged by him that the organ in use when the motion was made was a small portable hand-organ making comparatively little noise. That used by Cox was a much larger one provided with trumpet stops and emitting sounds which could be heard at the distance of one mile.

Whitehorne, Q. C., and Butcher, for the defendant Mellish: What Mellish is doing is in itself lawful, and no injunction will be granted to restrain a man from doing that which is lawful, and which if taken by itself is no nuisance. To obtain an injunction the plaintiff must shew that Mellish is acting in concert with Cox. It does not follow that if an injunction will lie against Cox it will necessarily lie against Mellish. Thorpe v. Brumfitt, Law Rep. 8 Ch. 650, has no application, as there the acts complained of were in themselves unlawful.

CHITTY, J. * * * [60] A man may tolerate a nuisance for a short period. A passer-by or a by-stander would not find any nuisance in these organs; but the case is very different when the noise has to be continuously endured: under such circumstances it is scarcely an exaggeration to term it "maddening," going on, as it does, hour after hour, day after day, and month after month. I consider that the noise made by each defendant, taken separately, amounts to a nuisance. But I go further. It was said for the defendant Mellish that two rights cannot make a wrong—by that it was meant that if one man makes a noise not of a kind, duration, or degree sufficient to constitute a nuisance, and another man, not acting in concert with the first, makes a similar noise at the same time, each is responsible only for the noise made by himself, and not also for that made by the other. If the two agreed and acted in combination each would be a wrongdoer. If a man shouts outside a house for most of the day, and another man, who is his rival (for it is to be remembered that these defendants are rivals), does the same, has the inhabitant of the house no remedy? It is said that that is only so much the worse for the inhabitant. On the ground of common sense it must be the other way. Each of the men is making a noise and each is adding his quantum until the whole constitutes a nuisance. Each hears the other, and is adding to the sum which makes up the nuisance. In my opinion each is separately liable, and I think it would be contrary to good sense, and, indeed, contrary to law, to hold otherwise. It would be contrary to common sense that the inhabitants of the house should be left without remedy at law. I think the point falls within the principle laid down by Lord Justice James in Thorpe v. Brumfitt, Law Rep. 8 Ch. 650. That was a case of obstructing a right of way, but such obstruction was a nuisance in the old phraseology of the law. * * *[61] There is in my opinion no distinction in these respects between the case of a right of way and the case, such as this is, of a nuisance by noise. If the acts of two persons, each being aware of what the other is doing, amount in the aggregate to what is an actionable wrong, each is amenable to the remedy against the aggregate cause of complaint. The defendants here are both responsible for the noise as a whole so far as it constitutes a nuisance affecting the plaintiff, and each must be restrained in respect of his own share in making the noise. I therefore grant an interim injunction in both the actions in the terms of the notices of motion.

RICH v. BASTERFIELD.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1847. 4 C. B. 783, 136 Reprint, 715, 72 R. R. 716.)

CRESSWELL, J.[62] This was an action on the case, in which the declaration alleged that the plaintiff had been and was possessed of a messuage, etc., which he and his family occupied; that the defendant was possessed of two messuages and yards near to the plaintiff's messuage; and that the defendant, contriving to injure the plaintiff and his family in their occupation etc., on, etc., erected certain shops and chimneys on the defendant's said yards, near to the plaintiff's house, and continued the same there, and lighted fires in the said shop, and caused smoke, etc., to issue from the said chimneys; whereby the plaintiff's messuage was rendered unhealthy, and he was compelled to keep his windows closed, to exclude the smoke, and was prevented obtaining fresh air, and the plaintiff and his family were annoyed and prejudiced in the occupation of his messuage, etc. The defendant pleaded—first, not guilty—secondly, that he, the defendant, was not possessed of the said yards and shops.

At the trial before my Brother Erle, at the sittings in Middlesex after Hilary term, 1846, it appeared in evidence that the plaintiff was possessed of a house, No. 10, and the defendant of two other houses, being Nos. 12 and 13, in the New Road, east of Tottenham Court Road; that the houses stand a considerable distance back from the road; that, in front of the defendant's houses, the defendant some time since erected two low buildings, which were let as shops; that he afterwards put a stove into one of the shops, from which the smoke was at first carried under ground into one of the chimneys of the house behind it; but, that plan not answering, that he afterwards erected a chimney; and that the shop, with the stove and chimney, was subsequently let to a tenant from week to week, who occupied it at the time when the nuisance to the plaintiff's house was said to have been committed, and by whom the fires complained of were made.

[62] The reporter's statement, the arguments of counsel, and a portion of the opinion are omitted.

A former occupier stated that he used to make fires in the stove, principally of coke, and that no smoke which could be at all injurious then issued from the chimney. The fires made by the present occupier caused a good deal of smoke to issue, which, when the wind blew towards the plaintiff's house, was driven to it, and compelled him to keep his windows shut.

Upon this evidence, it was contended, for the defendant, that he was entitled to a verdict on both issues; for, that the act of his tenant in making fires, could not be considered as his act, and therefore he was not guilty; and that, the tenant being in possession at the time when the nuisance was said to have been committed, the defendant was entitled to a verdict on the issue of not possessed, also,

The learned judge reserved to the defendant leave to move to enter a verdict in his favour, and left to the jury the question whether the defendant made a reasonable use of his rights in respect of the property in question in a reasonable place; and they found for the plaintiff. * * *

It was not contended, either at nisi prius, or on the argument, that the chimney erected by the defendant was itself a nuisance; and, unless used in a manner which caused smoke to issue, so as to prejudice the plaintiff in the occupation of his own premises, no complaint could have been made against it. The landlord, therefore, did not let the premises with any existing nuisance upon them; if he had, by letting and receiving rent for them in that condition, he would have been liable for continuing and upholding the nuisance, as in Rosewell v. Prior. Nor had he entered into any contract, express or implied, with the tenant, to make fires of any kind. The latter might have wholly abstained from making fires, without being subjected to any complaint by the landlord; or he might have made fires so that no inconvenience to the plaintiff would have ensued, by using coke, which was the course adopted by the former occupier, Shearman; or he might have abstained from making fires at all, when the wind was in such a direction as to carry the smoke to the plaintiff's house.

It being, therefore, quite possible for the tenant to occupy the shop without making fires, and quite optional on his part to make them or not, or to make them with certain times excepted, so as not to annoy the plaintiff, or in such a manner as not to create any quantity of smoke that could be deemed a nuisance,—it seems impossible to say that the tenant was, in any sense, the servant or agent of the defendant, in doing the acts complained of. The utmost that can be imputed to the defendant, is, that he enabled the tenant to make fires, if he pleased.

The case, then, resting, not upon the erection of the chimney, but upon the subsequent use of it by tenant, can the defendant, his landlord, be held to be guilty of the nuisance?

Several cases have occurred in which the owners of fixed property have been held liable for the consequences of acts done upon it by persons not strictly their servants or agents. But the principle on which those cases proceeded, and the limits within which they should be restrained, are clearly laid down by Littledale, J., in Laugher v. Pointer, 5 B. & C. 547, 8 D. & R. 556; which judgment is cited with much just approbation, and adopted by the Court of Exchequer, in Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499. The principle stated by Mr. Justice Littledale is that, where a man is in possession of fixed property, he must take care that his property is so used and managed that other persons are not injured; and that, whether his property be managed by his own immediate servants, or by contractors or their servants. * * *

For the reasons already given, we think that the verdict must be entered for the defendant on the plea of not guilty, as well as on the issue of not possessed, which refers to the time when the nuisance was created.

Rule accorded.[63]

HOGLE v. H. H. FRANKLIN MFG. CO.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1910. 199 N. Y. 388, 92 N. E. 794, 32 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1038.)

For several years prior to the 21st of August, 1906, the plaintiff resided with her husband in a house on West Marcellus street in the city of Syracuse, the lease from James Doheny, the owner, being in the husband's name as lessee. The lot upon which the house stands

[63] See Harris v. James (1876) 45 L. J. Q. B. 545, and Rex v. Pedley (1834) 1 Ad. & El. 822, for a different application of the principle when the occupation reasonably contemplated by a landlord is likely to produce a nuisance, or the landlord "lets a building which requires particular care to prevent the occupation from being a nuisance, and the nuisance occurs for want of such care on the part of the tenant."

Compare Barker v. Herbert, [1911] 2 K. B. 633, C. A.: (The defendant was the owner in possession of a vacant house in a street, with an area which adjoined the highway. One of the rails of the area railings had been broken away by boys playing football in the street, and, consequently, a gap had been created in the railings. The plaintiff, a child, got through this gap from the street, and was clambering along inside the railings, when he fell into the area, and sustained injuries through the fall. In an action brought on his behalf to recover damages from the defendant in respect of his injuries, the jury found, in answer to questions left to them, that the area was, when the accident happened, a nuisance, but that the defendant did not know, at the time of the accident, that the rail had been removed, that such a time had not elapsed after its removal that he would have known of it at the time of the accident, if he had used reasonable care, and that he had used reasonable care to prevent the premises from becoming dangerous to persons using the highway.)

is 34 by 100 feet, and the rear thereof adjoins the land of the defendant, upon which there is a large building several hundred feet long used for the manufacture of automobiles. Between the lot on which the defendant's factory stands and the lot occupied by the plaintiff and her husband, which for convenience will be called the plaintiff's lot, there is a vacant space ten feet wide which is not used for storage or dumping purposes, or for any purpose except the admission of light and air. At the rear of the plaintiff's lot is a tight board fence six feet high, and the space between the fence and her house, 20 by 34 feet, is used as a garden. Each floor of the factory has windows overlooking the plaintiff's premises, and on each of said floors are many mechanics and laborers in the employ of the defendant.

For eighteen months prior to the 21st of August, 1906, the employés of the defendant had habitually thrown small pieces of iron, such as nuts, the ends of bolts and the like, from the upper windows of its factory upon the rear of the plaintiff's lot. Mr. Hogle, who was not at home much in the daytime, saw such objects thrown from the third story of the factory at least a dozen times, some of which struck his house and others fell in the yard at the rear. This was after 6 o'clock in the evening, but when the men were still at work in the factory. He took a handful of the nuts and bolts collected from the garden to Mr. Franklin, the president of the defendant, stated the facts to him, and said he wanted the practice stopped, for he was afraid some one would get hurt. Mr. Franklin replied that he was glad to learn what had happened and would see that it was stopped. Mr. Doheny, the lessor of the plaintiff, complained on several occasions to the assistant manager of the defendant, who said he would do all he could to stop the annoyance.

The practice, however, continued and increased, although Mr. Franklin and his foreman forbade it and threatened to discharge any one who was seen to throw anything upon the plaintiff's lot. A little son of the plaintiff was hit by a nut when playing in the backyard. On another occasion a pail of dirty water was thrown upon him, and on still another tobacco spittle hit him on the head. Mrs. Hogle testified that she saw nuts, pieces of bolts, etc., thrown on her lot and at the children playing there on the average once a day from the spring of 1905 until in August, 1906. Once she saw a rattail file thrown from the window on the third floor and saw it pass over her little boy and strike the ground behind him. These objects, which for convenience counsel called missiles, came from the windows of defendant's factory and mainly from those on the third floor. She saw many of them when they were thrown by defendant's workmen from the windows of its factory.

On the 21st of August, 1906, she went out into her garden and looking up saw men at work and heard them talking by the windows of the third floor, which were open. As she was kneeling on one knee about ten feet from the rear of her lot to pull some radishes, she caught a side glance of some object coming from the direction of the third floor and at once was hit by a piece of iron upon her arm just below the shoulder. She produced the iron in court and the injury inflicted by it was somewhat severe.

Upon the first trial, when the complaint was based wholly on negligence, she had a verdict, which was set aside by the trial justice upon the ground that, as the acts of the defendant's workmen were not done within the scope of their employment, an action for negligence would not lie, but it was pointedly suggested in the opinion that an action for nuisance was the proper remedy. The complaint was thereupon so amended as to rest both on negligence and nuisance. Upon the second trial also the plaintiff had a verdict and the judgment entered thereon was affirmed by the Appellate Division, one of the justices dissenting. The defendant now appeals to this court.

VANN, J. * * * As the Appellate Division held, and as we think, the evidence warranted the jury in finding that the piece of iron which injured the plaintiff was maliciously thrown from a window of the defendant's factory by one of its workmen, and that for more than a year it had been the practice of its workmen, maliciously, or in a spirit of mischief, to throw similar objects from the windows of its factory upon the premises adjoining where plaintiff lived, with the knowledge of the defendant, but without its consent and in violation of its orders.

The defendant contends—and its motion for a nonsuit was based on the ground—"that there can be no recovery in this case unless the jury should find that this piece of iron was thrown upon plaintiff's premises as a necessary consequence of the work being carried on there or as an incident to it." The refusal to so hold is the main assignment of error on this appeal.

While we all think that the recovery should be sustained we differ somewhat as to the exact theory upon which it should be based. No request that the plaintiff should elect between the theory of nuisance and that of negligence was made at the trial, and the complaint was adapted to either. The trial judge did not name the action, but treated it as an action on the case. If the evidence established a cause of action for negligence in failing to take reasonable precautions to suppress the evil practice, such as closing the windows or screening them with wire netting or setting a watch upon the men or some other of like character, the defendant cannot complain. Such negligence would rest, not on the throwing of the missiles, as they were not thrown in furtherance of the master's business, but on not using reasonable care to prevent them from being thrown. In other words, it would rest on a relative, and not on an absolute, duty. If, on the other hand, the evidence established an action for nuisance, the rulings of the court were more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to, because the liability for injury from a nuisance is not relative, but absolute, and proof of negligence on the one hand and the absence thereof on the other is not required.

The line between protracted and habitual negligence and nuisance is not easily drawn, and facts may exist which call for damages on either theory when the pleadings are appropriate, as in this case, to either kind of relief. High authority is not wanting to sustain the judgment below on the ground of negligence pure and simple. Thus, in an important case, the plaintiff was a workman employed by the defendant railroad at its workshop in the city of Washington. When returning from his day's labor, he stopped at the intersection of two streets to enable a repair train to pass him. For a long time prior it had been the custom of the defendant to allow its workmen, who went out on a repair train in the morning, to bring back with them on their return in the evening sticks of refuse timber for their individual use as firewood, and these men were in the habit of throwing the sticks off the train while in motion at the points nearest their own homes; but they had been cautioned by the company not to injure any one in doing so. As the defendant's train passed the plaintiff, such a piece of refuse wood was thrown from it by one of the men and, striking the ground, rebounded, struck the plaintiff, and injured him seriously. Upon the trial of an action to recover damages, after proving these facts, the plaintiff rested, and defendant moved for a verdict in its favor, and the motion was granted. Upon appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia the judgment was affirmed; but upon further appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States it was reversed, on the ground that the jury could have found the defendant guilty of negligence. Fletcher v. Baltimore & Potomac R. R. Co., 168 U. S. 135, 18 Sup. Ct. 35, 42 L. Ed. 411. Mr. Justice Peckham, writing for all the judges, said: "Negligence on the part of the company is the basis of its liability, and the mere failure to prevent a single and dangerous act, as above stated, would not prove its existence. * * * If the act on the car were such as to permit the jury to find that it was one from which, as a result, injury to a person on the street might reasonably be feared, and if acts of a like nature had been and were habitually performed by those upon the car to the knowledge of the agents or servants of the defendant, who with such knowledge permitted their continuance, then in such case the jury might find the defendant guilty of negligence in having permitted the act and liable for the injury resulting therefrom, notwithstanding the act was that of an employé and beyond the scope of his employment and totally disconnected therewith. * * * It is not a question of scope of employment or that the act of the individual is performed by one who has ceased for the time being to be in the employment of the company. The question is: Does the company owe any duty whatever to the general public, or, in other words, to individuals who may be in the streets through which its railroad tracks are laid, to use reasonable diligence to see to it that those who are on its trains shall not be guilty of any act which might reasonably be called dangerous and liable to result in injuries to persons on the street, where such act could by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of the company have been prevented? We think the company does owe such a duty and if through and in consequence of its neglect of that duty an act is performed by a passenger or employé which is one of a series of the same kind of acts and which the company had knowledge of and had acquiesced in, and if the act be in its nature a dangerous one, and a person lawfully on the street is injured as a result of such an act, the company is liable. Any other rule would in our opinion be most disastrous, and would be founded upon no sound principle." See, also, Swinarton v. Le Boutillier, 7 Misc. Rep. 639, 28 N. Y. Supp. 53, affirmed 148 N. Y. 752, 43 N. E. 990; Dwyer v. D. & H. Canal Co., 17 App. Div. 623, 47 N. Y. Supp. 1135.

The defendant had reason to believe that missiles would be thrown from its premises upon those of the plaintiff in the future, as they had been continuously in the past, and that they might hurt some one. It took some precautions to prevent the evil; but they were not effective, and the defendant knew they were not. It could not remain quiet and let the practice go on. The jury could properly say that in the exercise of reasonable care in the management of its own property, so as to prevent an injury reasonably to be expected to its neighbor's property and person, it should have taken further precautions, and that it was negligent in not having done so. This would lead to an affirmance on the ground of negligence, the real ground upon which the case was sent to the jury. I am personally of the opinion, however, that the practice complained of was a nuisance as matter of fact, if the jury so found. "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas," is an old maxim of the law, which applies both to the use made and the use knowingly suffered to be made of one's own property while he is in full control thereof. It is a trespass for the owner of one lot to throw anything upon the adjoining lot of his neighbor. The defendant furnished the place from which and the means with which habitual trespasses, calculated to inflict personal injury, were committed on the adjoining premises of the plaintiff. The defendant knew of the practice and knew that it had existed a long time, and, while some efforts were made to prevent it, the evil continued and even grew worse. An occasional trespass of this kind committed by the defendant's workmen would not warrant a jury in finding it guilty of suffering or maintaining a nuisance; but, when the practice became habitual and the injury was direct, substantial, and well known, I think the duty of the defendant became absolute, and that it was guilty of suffering a nuisance to continue on its land if it did not prevent the evil.

In a recent case, without attempting a general definition of a nuisance, we said that: "If the natural tendency of the act complained of is to create danger and inflict injury upon person or property, it may properly be found a nuisance as matter of fact; but, if the act in its inherent nature is so hazardous as to make the danger extreme and serious injury so probable as to be almost a certainty, it should be held a nuisance as matter of law." Melker v. City of New York, 190 N. Y. 481, 488, 83 N. E. 565, 567, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 621, 13 Ann. Cas. 544. See, also, Sullivan v. Dunham, 161 N. Y. 290, 55 N. E. 923, 47 L. R. A. 715, 76 Am. St. Rep. 274; McCarty v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 189 N. Y. 40, 81 N. E. 549, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 465, 12 Ann. Cas. 840. While that definition implies that the act is that of the defendant, I think the same rule should apply when a series of acts extending over many months is committed by men in the employment of the defendant, to its knowledge, with its personal property and while standing on its premises, even if the acts are without the line of its business. Although the defendant did not commit the injuries nor sanction them, it suffered them to continue for so long a period as to make them its own, or so at least the jury could find. It is a nuisance for one to permit a crowd to habitually gather on his land and by boisterous singing, obscene language, and other disorderly conduct to seriously annoy his next-door neighbor. It is immaterial whether the acts are committed by his own workmen or by strangers, so long as they are committed on his land, constantly and with his knowledge.

It is the duty of the owner of premises to prevent them from being made a constant source of injury to others, and it is upon this principle that suffering a foul water closet to exist in a crowded neighborhood is held a nuisance. The decaying carcasses of animals, whether placed on his land by the owner or not, hogpens, cesspools, dangerous structures, explosives and the like, while all are dependent on the surrounding circumstances and on the degree of danger or annoyance, may be found nuisances in fact. Although the mere ownership of land may impose no liability for a nuisance thereon, or committed therefrom, still if the owner suffers his premises to become the stand point for the habitual infliction of injuries upon his neighbor, and such injuries could not be inflicted without standing on such land, he may be held liable by the jury as a principal. He suffers the evil to exist on his land, if, while in the full possession and control thereof, he knows that it exists thereon and he does not abate it within a reasonable time and under reasonable circumstances, both time and circumstances ordinarily being for the jury.

I think that upon the facts as they are presumed to have been found by the jury the defendant was guilty of suffering a nuisance to exist and continue on its premises, and that it is liable for the injury resulting therefrom to the plaintiff without proof of negligence or its incidents.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.[64]

(d) Kinds and Degrees of the Annoyance [65]

WALTER v. SELFE.

(High Court of Chancery, 1851. 4 De Gex. & Sm. 315, 64 Reprint, 849.)

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from so burning bricks on a strip of ground belonging to the defendant as to occasion annoyance to the plaintiffs or damage to the buildings or the trees and shrubbery on the plaintiffs' premises.[66]

The Vice-Chancellor (Sir J. L. Knight Bruce). * * * One of the plaintiffs sues as the owner, and the other as his tenant and the occupier, of a parcel of land at Surbiton, in Surrey, of which a dwelling-house, with outbuildings appurtenant to it, stands on part, and other part consists of a garden or pleasure-ground or both, also belonging to the house.

It is admitted that the house was built before the year 1829, and has been used and occupied as a dwelling-house from a time preceding that year. The land on its northwestern part adjoins a portion of a parcel of land, containing more than an acre, but less than two acres in the whole, which belongs to the defendant, and on which, in the spring or early in the summer of the year 1850, he began to manufacture bricks of the clay of the earth of the same land by burning, in what is, I believe, a common mode of manufacturing them,—by means of a clamp, that is to say, not a kiln. It does not appear that, before the year 1850, any manufacture or process of that sort, or of any offensive, objectionable or disagreeable kind, had been begun upon any portion of this parcel of land, or carried on there. * * *

The first point, disputed or not conceded, is the question whether, as between the defendant in his character of a person owning, using and occupying his parcel of land that has been mentioned on the one hand, and the plaintiffs in their characters of owner and occupier of the house, offices and garden occupied by the plaintiff, Mr. Pressly, on the other hand, Mr. Pressly is entitled to an untainted and unpolluted stream of air for the necessary supply and reasonable use of himself and his family there, or, in other words, to have there for the ordinary purposes of breath and life an unpolluted and untainted atmosphere; and there can, I think, be no doubt upon the facts and law but that this question must be answered in the affirmative, meaning, by "untainted" and "unpolluted," not necessarily air as fresh, free and pure as at the time of building the plaintiffs' house the atmosphere there was, but air not rendered to an important degree less compatible, or at least not rendered incompatible, with the physical comfort of human existence, a phrase to be understood of course with reference to the climate and habits of England.

[65] "It would be dangerous to attempt any exhaustive list of specific nuisances; for it is to be expected that, with changes in social and industrial habits, new examples will continually arise, and, possibly, old ones disappear from the list." Jenks' Digest of Eng. Civil Law, bk. II, pt. 3, p. 401 (1907), where 12 classes of well-known instances are mentioned. See also the 14 classes of "Nuisances in Respect of Particular Matters," in Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 21, pp. 513–546, the 10 classes in Salmond, Torts 184, 185, note (1910), and the 125 heads of nuisance in 29 Cyc. 1165–1184. A valuable collection of specific nuisances, within the doctrine of one state, can be found in Pepper & Lewis' Pennsylvania Digest, cc. 23938–24026.

[66] The statement of the case is abridged, and portions of the opinion are omitted.

It is next to be considered whether the defendant has interfered or purposes to interfere materially with this right of the plaintiffs, or of the plaintiff, Mr. Pressly.

That the process of manufacturing bricks by burning them on the defendant's land, in the manner begun and now intended by him, must communicate smoke, vapours and floating substances of some kinds to the air is certain. I think it plain also, from the relative positions of the two properties, that this smoke and these vapours and floating substances, the burning being to the westward of the defendant's own house, must wholly or to a great extent enter and become mixed with the air supplying the plaintiffs' house, and part at least of the garden or pleasure-ground belonging to it, and this without being previously so dispersed or attenuated as to become imperceptible, or be materially impaired or diminished in force. I conceive that the plaintiffs' house, and at least part of its pleasure-ground or garden, must generally or often, if the manufacture shall proceed, be subjected substantially, as far as the quality of the atmosphere is concerned, to the original and full strength of the mixture and dose thus produced. I speak without forgetting the trees that stand along the line of the boundary, and without assuming their continuance, or the contrary.

The question then arises whether this is or will be an inconvenience to the occupier of the plaintiffs' house as occupier of it, a question which must, I think, be answered in the affirmative; though, whether to the extent of being noxious to human health, to animal health, in any sense, or to vegetable health, I do not say nor deem it necessary to intimate an opinion;[67] for it is with a private not a public nuisance that the defendant is charged. And both on principle and authority the important point next for decision may properly, I conceive, be thus put: Ought this inconvenience to be considered in fact as more than fanciful, more than one of mere delicacy or fastidiousness, as an inconvenience materially interfering with the ordinary comfort physically of human existence, not merely according to elegant or dainty modes and habits of living, but according to plain and sober and simple notions among the English people?

[67] Compare Campbell v. Seaman (1876) 63 N. Y. 568, 20 Am. Rep. 567: D., a large manufacturer of bricks from clay upon his own land, used a process which caused each kiln to give out, for at least two days of its burning, a volume of sulphurous acid gas. While D. was thus making bricks, P. built a handsome residence on the adjoining property. The residence stood in some 40 acres of ornamental grounds. The gas from D.'s kilns destroys P.'s white and yellow pines and Norway spruces and damages his grape vines. P. seeks an injunction. Said Earl, J., delivering the opinion: "The plaintiffs had built a costly mansion and had laid out their grounds and planted them with ornamental and useful trees and vines, for their comfort and enjoyment. How can one be compensated in damages for the destruction of his ornamental trees, and the flowers and vines which surrounded his home? How can a jury estimate their value in dollars and cents? The fact that trees and vines are for ornament or luxury entitles them no less to the protection of the law. Every one has the right to surround himself with articles of luxury, and he will be no less protected than one who pro-

And I am of opinion that this point is against the defendant. As far as the human frame in an average state of health at least is concerned, mere insalubrity, mere unwholesomeness, may possibly, as I have said, be out of the case, but the same may perhaps be asserted of stied hogs, melting tallow, and other such inventions less sweet than useful. That does not decide the dispute; a smell may be sickening though not in a medical sense. Ingredients may, I believe, be mixed with air of such a nature as to affect the palate disagreeably and offensively, though not unwholesomely. A man's body may be in a state of chronic discomfort, still retaining its health, and perhaps even suffer more annoyance from nauseous or fetid air for being in a hale condition. Nor, I repeat, do I think it incumbent on the plaintiffs to èstablish that vegetable life or vegetable health, either universally or in particular instances, is noxiously affected by the contact of vapours and floating substances proceeding from burning bricks; for, as I said, they have I think established that the defendant's intended proceedings will, if prosecuted, abridge and diminish seriously and materially the ordinary comfort of existence to the occupier and inmates of the plaintiffs' house (whatever their rank or station, whatever their age, whatever their state of health). * * *[68] vides himself only with articles of necessity. The law will protect a flower or a vine as well as an oak. Cook v. Forbes [1867] L. R. 5 Eq. Ca. 166; Broadbent v. Imperial Gas Co. [1856] 7 De G., McN. & G. 436. These damages are irreparable, too, because the trees and vines cannot be replaced, and the law will not compel a person to take money rather than the objects of beauty and utility which he places around his dwelling to gratify his taste or to promote his comfort and his health.")

[68] Compare the remarks of the Chancellor (Zabriskie) in Cleveland v. Citizens' Gas Light Co. (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 201, 205: "To live comfortably is the chief and most reasonable object of men in acquiring property as the means of attaining it; and any interference with our neighbor in the comfortable enjoyment of life, is a wrong which the law will redress. The only question is what amounts to that discomfort from which the law will protect. The discomforts must be physical, not such as depend upon taste or imagination. But whatever is offensive physically to the senses, and by such offensiveness makes life uncomfortable, is a nuisance; and it is not the less so, because there may be persons whose habits and occupations have brought them to endure the same annoyances without discomfort. Other persons or classes of persons whose senses have not been so hardened, and who, by their education and habits of life, retain the sensitiveness of their natural organization, are entitled to enjoy life in comfort as they are constituted. The law knows no distinction of classes, and will protect any citizen or class of citizens, from wrongs and grievances that might perhaps be borne by others without suffering or much inconvenience. The complainants have houses

It appears to me that in the present instance, the defendant as well as the plaintiffs declining to go before a jury and asking a court of chancery to decide between them without assistance in any shape from a court of law I ought to grant an injunction.*

EVERETT et ux. v. PASCHALL.

This action was brought to enjoin the defendant from maintaining a tuberculosis sanitarium, with a capacity of ten patients, in a residential portion of the city of Seattle, on a lot separated from plaintiff's lot by an alleyway. The lower court denied an injunction, and the plaintiffs appealed.

CHADWICK, J. * * * The text of our decision has been aptly stated by counsel for appellant: "Can a tuberculosis hospital be maintained in a residential portion of a city where its maintenance depreciates the value of contiguous property from 33⅓ to 50 per cent., and where its existence detracts from the comfortable use of such residential property?"

In the evolution of the law of nuisance there has grown an element not clearly recognized at common law. Blackstone, 3 Com. 216, has defined a nuisance to be "anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage," reducing the nuisances which affect a man's dwelling to three: (1) Overhanging it; (2) stopping ancient lights; and (3) corrupting the air with smells. It will be seen that within these definitions the maintenance of a sanitarium conducted with due attention to sanitation is not a nuisance, for it creates no physical inconvenience whatever. But a new element in the law of nuisance has been developed, first, by judicial decisions, and, later, by declaratory statutes; built and held for the purpose of residences, by families of means and respectability, and anything that by producing physical discomfort would render them unfit for such residence, or drive such families from them, is a nuisance which the law will restrain. This, then, is the question before me: Whether the proposed works of the defendants would produce such annoyance as would render such families, composed of women and children, as well as men, uncomfortable; not whether men accustomed to follow their occupations in places where they are surrounded, and unavoidably, by much that is offensive, may not be so accustomed to odors of like nature as not to be annoyed by these."

Compare Adams v. Ursell, [1913] 1 Ch. 269: (Action to restrain an alleged nuisance caused by a fried fish shop, in premises adjoining the plaintiff's residence. "The frying of fish went on daily between 11:30 a. m. and 1:30 p. m., and between 6:30 and 10:30 p. m. The plaintiff gave evidence that the odour caused by frying the fish pervaded every room of his house and affected the flavour of butter in his larder; and that the vapour from the defendant's cooking stove appeared in the plaintiff's house like a fog or mist." But it appeared that this was not injurious to health.)

that is, the comfortable enjoyment of one's property. It is written in the statutes of this state: "Nuisance consists in unlawfully doing an act or omitting to perform a duty, which act or omission either annoys, injures or endangers the comfort, repose, health or safety of others, offends decency * * * or in any way renders other persons insecure in life, or in the use of property." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 8309. Respondent contends, and the court has found, that the property of respondent is not a nuisance per se, and that it is so conducted that it is not, and cannot be, a nuisance by reason of its use; that there is no real danger; that the fear or dread of the disease is, in the light of scientific investigation, unfounded, imaginary, and fanciful; and that the injury, if any, is damnum absque injuria. On the other hand, the appellants insist that the location of a sanitarium for the treatment of a disease, of which there is a positive dread which science has so far failed to combat, so robs them of that pleasure in, and comfortable enjoyment of, their home as to make it an actionable nuisance under the statute; and, furthermore, under the findings of the court, that the presence of the sanitarium in a district given over to residences, and which has depreciated property from 33 to 50 per cent., is such a deprivation of property as will warrant a decree in their favor under the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas."

Waiving for the present the substantial pecuniary damage which the court found to exist, and addressing ourselves to the principle underlying the lower court's decree—that is, that the danger being only in the apprehension of it, a fear unfounded and unsustained by science, a demon of the imagination—the courts will take no account of it: If dread of the disease and fear induced by the proximity of the sanitarium, in fact, disturb the comfortable enjoyment of the property of the appellants, we question our right to say that the fear is unfounded or unreasonable, when it is shared by the whole public to such an extent that property values are diminished. The question is, not whether the fear is founded in science, but whether it exists; not whether it is imaginary, but whether it is real, in that it affects the movements and conduct of men. Such fears are actual, and must be recognized by the courts as other emotions of the human mind. That fear is real in the sense indicated, and is the most essentially human of all emotions, there can be no doubt. * * *

Nuisance is a question of degree, depending upon varying circumstances. There must be more than a tendency to injury. There must be something appreciable. The cases generally say, "tangible, actual, measurable, or subsisting." But in all cases, in determining whether the injury charged comes within these general terms, resort should be had to sound common sense. Each case must be judged by itself. Joyce on Nuisances, 19. Regard should be had for the notions of comfort and convenience entertained by persons generally of ordinary tastes and susceptibilities. Columbus Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Freeland, 12 Ohio St. 392; Barnes v. Hathorn, 54 Me. 124. The nuisance and discomfort must affect the ordinary comfort of human existence as understood by the American people in their present state of enlightenment. Joyce on Nuisances, § 20. The theories and dogmas of scientific men, though provable by scientific reference, cannot be held to be controlling unless shared by the people generally. In Grover v. Zook, 44 Wash. 494, 87 Pac. 639, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 582, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1012, 12 Ann. Cas. 192, this court said: "That pulmonary tuberculosis is both contagious and hereditary, as these terms are understood (although not in a strictly technical and professional sense), as well as infectious, admits of little, if any, doubt." This principle applies with peculiar force in this case; for aside from the general dread of the disease, as found by the court, it is also shown that the security of the public depends upon proper precautions and sanitation, which may at any time be relaxed by incautious nurses or careless or ignorant patients.

Furthermore, the court found that the bacilla of the disease may be carried by house flies. Thus every house fly that might drone a summer afternoon in the drawing room or nursery is a constant reminder to plaintiffs of their neighbor, tending to disquiet the mind and render the enjoyment of their home uncomfortable. The only case we find holding that fear alone will not support a decree in this class of cases is Anonymous, 3 Atk. 750, where Lord Hardwicke said: "And the fears of mankind, though they may be reasonable ones, will not create a nuisance." Our statute modifies, if indeed it was not designed to change, this rule. Under the facts, we cannot say that the dread which is the disquieting element upon which plaintiffs' complaint is made to rest is unreal, imaginary, or fanciful. In so doing, we are not violating the settled principles of the law, but affirming them.

We conceive the case of Stotler v. Rochelle, 83 Kan. 86, 109 Pac. 788, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49, to be directly in point. There we find the same contentions made as here. The question was whether the fear of cancer was sustained in the light of medical authority. The court said: "In the present state of accurate knowledge on the subject, it is quite within bounds to say that, whether or not there is actual danger of the transmission of the disease under the conditions stated, the fear of it is not entirely unreasonable." The unusual feature of that case, in that judicial notice is taken of the fact that fear may be urged as a ground for injunctive relief, challenged the interest of the Honorable John D. Lawson, the learned editor of the American Law Review. He takes no issue with the rule. He says: "A hospital, said the court, is not a nuisance per se, or even prima facie, but it may be so located and conducted as to be a nuisance to people living close to it. The question was not whether the establishment of the hospital would place the occupants of the adjacent dwellings in actual danger of infection, but whether they would have reasonable ground to fear such a result, and whether, in view of the general dread inspired by the disease, the reasonable enjoyment of their property would not be materially interfered with by the bringing together of a considerable number of cancer patients in this place. However carefully the hospital might be conducted, and however worthy the institution might be, its mere presence, which would necessarily be manifested in various ways, would make the neighborhood less desirable for residence purposes, not to the oversensitive alone, but to persons of normal sensibilities. The court concluded that upon these considerations the injunction was rightfully granted. The plaintiff, as the owner and occupant of adjacent property, had such a peculiar interest in the relief sought as to enable him to maintain the action." 40 Am. Law Review, No. 5, p. 759.

In the case of Baltimore v. Fairfield Imp. Co., 87 Md. 352, 39 Atl. 1081, 40 L. R. A. 494, 67 Am. St. Rep. 344, an injunction against placing a leper in a residence neighborhood for care and restraint was justified upon the ground that the disease produced a terror and dread in the minds of the ordinary individual. In that case, the court said: "Leprosy is, and always has been, universally regarded with horror and loathing. * * * The horror of its contagion is as deep-seated today as it was more than 2,000 years ago in Palestine. There are modern theories and opinions of medical experts that the contagion is remote and by no means dangerous; but the popular belief of its perils founded on the Biblical narrative, on the stringent provisions of the Mosaic law that show how dreadful were its ravages and how great the terror which it excited, and an almost universal sentiment, the result of a common concurrence of thought for centuries, cannot in this day be shaken or dispelled by mere scientific asservation or conjecture. It is not, in this case, so much a mere academic inquiry as to whether the disease is in fact highly or remotely contagious; but the question is whether, viewed as it is by the people generally, its introduction into a neighborhood is calculated to do a serious injury to the property of the plaintiff there located." In Cherry v. Williams, 147 N. C. 452, 61 S. E. 267, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 15 Ann. Cas. 715, a temporary restraining order was granted against the maintenance of a tuberculosis hospital, notwithstanding evidence was introduced, as in this case, tending to show that the establishment of such a hospital, if properly maintained and conducted, would not be a menace to the health of the community, but in fact a benefit. We have no cases in this state directly in point, yet a case not without bearing is that of Shepard v. City of Seattle, 59 Wash. 363, 109 Pac. 1067, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 647. Judge Rudkin, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The presence of a private insane asylum, with its barred windows, and irresponsible inmates, would annoy, injure, and endanger the comfort, safety, and repose of any person of average sensibilities if located within 200 feet of his place of abode. In other words, it is a matter of common knowledge that the presence of such an institution in a residential portion of a city would practically destroy the value of all property within its immediate vicinity for residence purposes."

We therefore conclude that the lower court erred in denying an injunction. The case is remanded with instructions to enter a decree upon the findings in favor of appellant.[69]

[69] The statement of facts is abridged and part of the opinion is omitted.

But see Board of Health v. North American Home (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 464, 78 Atl. 677: ("Notwithstanding the great public good which will necessarily result from the work of an institution of this nature [a sanitarium devoted exclusively to the treatment of children afflicted with bone tuberculosis], it is manifest that if the health of the residents of Ventnor City is jeopardized by its maintenance, a court of equity may grant such relief as will afford adequate protection to the residents of that city from the threatened danger; but if no real danger of that nature exists, the mere fact that uninformed people who are unacquainted with the true conditions may or probably will assume such a danger to exist cannot be made the basis of equitable relief." Per Leaming, V. C.)

In Tod-Heatley v. Benham (1888) 40 Ch. D. 80, 98, Bowen, L. J., remarked: "I will assume as a matter of argument only that 'nuisance' in this covenant (in a building lease against doing any act which shall or may be or grow to the annoyance, nuisance, grievance or damage of the lessor, his heirs or assigns) means only a nuisance at common law; that is, in the language of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce in Walter v. Selfe (1851) 4 De G. & Sm. 322, 'an inconvenience materially interfering with the ordinary comfort physically of human existence, not merely according to elegant or dainty modes and habits of living, but according to plain and sober and simple notions among the English people.' Any material interference with the ordinary comfort of existence: that would be a nuisance. The law, in thus defining 'nuisance' has stopped short, I will not say of protecting the fancies of people, because the mere fancies of people I do not think can in any view be an element in the definition, but has stopped short, according to what is said in Aldred's Case (1610) 9 Rep. 58b, of giving an action in respect of that which is a matter only of delight, and not of necessity. 'Annoyance' is a wider term than 'nuisance,' and if you find a thing which reasonably troubles the mind and pleasure, not of a fanciful person or of a skilled person who knows the truth, but of the ordinary sensible English inhabitant of a house—if you find there is anything which disturbs his reasonable peace of mind, that seems to me to be an annoyance, although it may not appear to amount to physical detriment to comfort. You must take sensible people, you must not take fanciful people on the one side or skilled people on the other; that is the key as it seems to me of this case. Doctors may be able to say, and, for anything I know, to say with certainty, that there is no sort of danger from this hospital to the surrounding neighbourhood. But the fact that some doctors think there is makes it evident at all events that it is not a very unreasonable thing for persons of ordinary apprehension to be troubled in their minds about it. And if it is not an unreasonable thing for an ordinary person who lives in the neighbourhood to be troubled in his mind by the apprehension of such risk, it seems to me there is danger of annoyance, though there may not be a nuisance. * * *"

DAVIS v. SAWYER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1882. 133 Mass. 289, 43 Am. Rep. 519.)

W. ALLEN, J. This is a bill in equity praying for an injunction to restrain the defendants from ringing a bell. The case comes here on appeal by the defendants from a decree entered by a single judge, enjoining them from ringing the bell earlier than half after 6 o'clock in the morning. The plaintiffs for many years have owned and occupied dwelling-houses situated, one about one thousand feet, and the other about three hundred feet, from a woollen mill of the defendants. The defendants began to run their mill, which had been before that occupied by other persons, in December, 1879, and about January 1, 1880, placed the bell upon the mill, and caused it to be rung every working day at 5 o'clock, and twice between 6 and 6:30 o'clock, in the morning, and at other times during the day, except that the 5 o'clock bell was discontinued during the summer months.

The plaintiffs allege that the bell as rung is a private nuisance to them, and injures their property, and disturbs the quiet and comfort of their homes; that it is not necessary for any purpose of trade or manufacture; that it is unnecessarily large, and rung at unseasonable hours, and unreasonably long. The defendants in their answer deny that the bell is a nuisance to the plaintiffs, and say that it is used by the defendants to summon the operatives in their mill to work; that it is necessary and customary to adopt some method to summon operatives in such a manufactory to their work; that the bell is of suitable size, and rung at suitable hours, and in a proper manner, for that purpose.

Two questions are presented: whether the plaintiffs have proved that the ringing of the bell is a nuisance to them; and whether it is such a nuisance that this court will interfere to restrain it by injunction.[70]

Noise which constitutes an annoyance to a person of ordinary sensibility to sound, such as materially to interfere with the ordinary comfort of life, and impair the reasonable enjoyment of his habitation, is a nuisance to him. Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 409; Wesson v. Washburn Iron Co., 13 Allen, 95, 90 Am. Dec. 181; Fay v. Whitman, 100 Mass. 76. Upon a careful examination of the evidence reported, it seems fully to sustain the finding of the judge who heard the case, that the ringing of the bell was a nuisance to the plaintiffs. The bell weighs about two thousand pounds, and is set in an open tower about forty feet from the ground, and was rung for a long time at 5 o'clock, as many as ninety strokes having been repeatedly counted. The residences of the plaintiffs are so situated with respect to the bell, particularly that of the plaintiff Davis, being higher than the bell and upon a hill-side, with no obstruction between, that they receive the full force of the sound, and they are in a village in which, at that hour, there is no other ringing of bells, or other disturbing noise. Without referring to the evidence in detail, or reviewing the particular circumstances affecting the question, it is enough to say that the evidence sustains what must have been found by the judge, namely, that the plaintiffs were deprived of sleep during the hours usually devoted to repose, and were personally annoyed, and disturbed in their homes, and the quiet and comfort of their dwellings were impaired, as the natural consequence of the acts of the defendants which are complained of. Nor is the fact that a large majority of the persons living nearer to the bell than the plaintiffs were not annoyed by it, at all conclusive that it would not, and did not, awaken and annoy persons of ordinary sensibility to noise situated as the plaintiffs were. Besides the consideration that nearness to the bell would not alone determine the effect produced by its sound, it is obvious that the bell was sufficient and effective to awaken persons ordinarily sensitive to sound, who were no more exposed to its effects than the plaintiffs were. That was the effect it was intended to produce, and, if it had not in fact produced the effect, its use would not have been continued. The fact that some persons may have had such associations connected with the sound that it may have been to them a pleasure rather than an annoyance, or that the sensibility of others to the sound may have become so deadened that it ceased to disturb them, shows that the noise was not a nuisance to them, but does not change its character as to others. Many persons can, by habit, lose, to some extent, their sensibility to a disturbing noise, as they can to a disagreeable taste or odor or sight, or their susceptibility to a particular poison, but it is because they become less than ordinarily susceptible to the particular impression. In this case, the evidence shows that persons were awakened and disturbed by the bell until they had lost ordinary sensibility to its sound. * * *

[70] The second question, whether it was such a nuisance that the court will interfere to restrain it by injunction was answered in the affirmative.
See Sawyer v. Davis (1883) 136 Mass. 239, 49 Am. Rep. 27.

Decree affirmed.

ROGERS v. ELLIOTT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1888. 146 Mass. 349, 15 N. E. 768, 4 Am. St. Rep. 316.)

Tort for a nuisance, namely, the ringing of a church bell. At the trial there was evidence tending to prove that the plaintiff, who lived with his father in a thickly settled portion of Provincetown, had received a sun-stroke, and was carried home and a physician called to attend him; that directly opposite his father's house across a street but twenty feet in width was a Roman Catholic Church of which the defendant was the clergyman in charge; that one of the incidents of the plaintiff's illness was that loud noises might throw him into convulsions; that the defendant was informed by the physician and the plaintiff's father of the probable consequences to the plaintiff of the ringing of the bell upon his church, and was requested not to ring it; that the defendant refused to refrain from ringing the bell, but caused it to be rung eight times upon the next Sunday, as usual, twice before each of the four services held upon that day; that the plaintiff, the windows of whose room were shut, was thrown into violent and painful convulsions at each time that the bell on the church was rung, as well as when other bells in the town were rung, or a whistle on a steamboat in the harbor was blown, and once when the town clock struck; and that the convulsions increased the illness and retarded the recovery of the plaintiff.

The judge ruled that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and ordered a verdict for the defendant; and reported the case for the determination of this court. If the ruling was wrong, the verdict was to be set aside and a new trial granted; otherwise, judgment was to be rendered on the verdict.

KNOWLTON, J. The defendant was the custodian and authorized manager of property of the Roman Catholic Church used for religious worship. The acts for which the plaintiff seeks to hold him responsible were done in the use of this property, and the sole question before us is whether or not that use was unlawful. The plaintiff's case rests upon the proposition that the ringing of the bell was a nuisance. The consideration of this proposition involves an inquiry into what the defendant could properly do in the use of the real estate which he had in charge, and what was the standard by which his rights were to be measured.

It appears that the church was built upon a public street in a thickly settled part of the town, and if the ringing of the bell on Sundays had materially affected the health or comfort of all in the vicinity, whether residing or passing there, this use of the property would have been a public nuisance, for which there would have been a remedy by indictment. Individuals suffering from it in their persons or their property could have recovered damages for a private nuisance. Wesson v. Washburn Iron Co., 13 Allen, 95, 90 Am. Dec. 181.

In an action of this kind, a fundamental question is, by what standard, as against the interests of a neighbor, is one's right to use his real estate to be measured. In densely populated communities the use of property in many ways which are legitimate and proper necessarily affects in greater or less degree the property or persons of others in the vicinity. In such case the inquiry always is, when rights are called in question, what is reasonable under the circumstances. If a use of property is objectionable solely on account of the noise which it makes, it is a nuisance, if at all, by reason of its effect upon the health or comfort of those who are within hearing. The right to make a noise for a proper purpose must be measured in reference to the degree of annoyance which others may reasonably be required to submit to. In connection with the importance of the business from which it proceeds, that must be determined by the effect of noise upon people generally, and not upon those, on the one hand, who are peculiarly susceptible to it, or those, on the other, who by long experience have learned to endure it without inconvenience; not upon those whose strong nerves and robust health enable them to endure the greatest disturbances without suffering, nor upon those whose mental or physical condition makes them painfully sensitive to everything about them.

That this must be the rule in regard to public nuisances is obvious. It is the rule as well, and for reasons nearly, if not quite as satisfactory, in relation to private nuisances. Upon a question whether one can lawfully ring his factory bell, or run his noisy machinery, or whether the noise will be a private nuisance to the occupant of a house near by, it is necessary to ascertain the natural and probable effect of the sound upon ordinary persons in that house,—not how it will affect a particular person, who happens to be there to-day, or who may chance to come to-morrow. Fay v. Whitman, 100 Mass. 76; Davis v. Sawyer, 133 Mass. 289, 43 Am. Rep. 519; Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 315, 323; Soltau v. De Held, 2 Sim. (N. S.) 133; St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cas. 642. * * *

If one's right to use his property were to depend upon the effect of the use upon a person of peculiar temperament or disposition, or upon one suffering from an uncommon disease, the standard for measuring it would be so uncertain and fluctuating as to paralyze industrial enterprises. The owner of a factory containing noisy machinery, with dwelling-houses all about it, might find his business lawful as to all but one of the tenants of the houses, and as to that one, who dwelt no nearer than the others, it might be a nuisance. The character of his business might change from legal to illegal, or illegal to legal, with every change of tenants of an adjacent estate; or with an arrival or departure of a guest or boarder at a house near by; or even with the wakefulness or the tranquil repose of an invalid neighbor on a particular night. Legal rights to the use of property cannot be left to such uncertainty. When an act is of such a nature as to extend its influence to those in the vicinity, and its legal quality depends upon the effect of that influence, it is as important that the rightfulness of it should be tried by the experience of ordinary people, as it is, in determining a question as to negligence, that the test should be the common care of persons of ordinary prudence, without regard to the peculiarities of him whose conduct is on trial.

In the case at bar it is not contended that the ringing of the bell for church services in the manner shown by the evidence materially affected the health or comfort of ordinary people in the vicinity, but the plaintiff's claim rests upon the injury done him on account of his peculiar condition. However his request should have been treated by the defendant upon considerations of humanity, we think he could not put himself in a place of exposure to noise, and demand as of legal right that the bell should not be used.

The plaintiff, in his brief, concedes that there was no evidence of express malice on the part of the defendant, but contends that malice was implied in his acts. In the absence of evidence that he acted wantonly, or with express malice, this implication could not come from his exercise of his legal rights. How far and under what circumstances malice may be material in cases of this kind, it is unnecessary to consider.

TAYLOR v. BENNETT.

(At Nisi Prius, Swansea Assizes, 1836. 7 Car. & P. 329.)

Case. The first count of the declaration was for disturbing the plaintiff in the use of a well which she claimed as appurtenant to "a certain dwelling-house called Caivatre," by filling up the well with rubbish, and rendering the water muddy.

It appeared that the rubbish had been thrown into the well, but that the well had not been filled up thereby.

[71] Part of the opinion is omitted.

Accord: Lord v. De Witt (1902 C. C.) 116 Fed. 713: (P. is suffering from disease and an operation which have left him so sensitive to jar, and with so weak a heart, that if D. goes on with certain blasting which D. has begun on his own lot, with a view to building a house, the necessary jar from the blast will probably cause P.'s death. P. seeks to enjoin the blasting.)

Compare the analogous principle adopted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Eastern & South African Telegraph Company v. Cape Town Tramways Companies, [1902] A. C. 381. The action was for damages because of disturbances in the working of the plaintiffs' submarine cable, caused by an escape of electricity stored by the defendants for the working of their tramway system. Said Lord Robertson, delivering the judgment of their Lordships: "If the instrument (the plaintiffs' telegraphic cable) be taken as it was when the injury occurred, its nature is such that to insure its immunity from disturbance is a somewhat serious liability to cast on neighbours. To describe this as a delicate instrument might be inaccurate, if the term were used in relation to other electrical instruments of extreme sensibility. But in the present discussion this is not the true comparison at all. The true comparison is with things used in the ordinary enjoyment of property, and this instrument differs from such things in its peculiar liability to be affected by even minute currents of electricity. Now, having regard to the assumptions of the appellants' argument, it seems necessary to point out that the appellants, as licensees to lay their cable in the sea and as owners of the premises in Cape Town where the signals are received, cannot claim higher privileges than other owners of land, and cannot create for themselves, by reason of the peculiarity of their trade apparatus, a higher right to limit the operations of their neighbours than belongs to ordinary owners of land who do not trade with telegraphic cables. If the apparatus of such concerns requires special protection against the operations of their neighbours, that must be found in legislation; the remedy at present invoked is an appeal to a common law principle which applies to much more usual and less special conditions. A man cannot increase the liabilities of his neighbour by applying his own property to special uses, whether for business or pleasure."

COLERIDGE, J. (in summing up). If the effect of throwing in this rubbish was merely to make the water temporarily muddy, that would be too minute a damage to justify you in finding for the plaintiff; but if you think that the defendant has shallowed the water of the well, and has thereby rendered it less convenient to the plaintiff to obtain water, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.[72]

Verdict for the plaintiff on the first count of the declaration. Damages 1s.

FAY v. PRENTICE et al.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1845. 1 C. B. 828, 135 Reprint, 769, 68 R. R. 823.)

Case, for erecting a cornice at the side of the house of the defendant Prentice, projecting over the garden of the plaintiff.

On the trial, after a plea of not guilty, it appeared that the defendant Prentice was possessed of a messuage adjoining the messuage and garden of the plaintiff, and built up to the extreme boundary of his own land, and that, in May, 1844, he caused to be erected thereon (by the other defendant, a builder), an ornamental cornice, which projected about fourteen inches over the plaintiff's garden. The case attempted to be made out on the part of the plaintiff was, that the plants and gravel-walk in his garden were injured by the dripping of rain from this cornice; and some of his witnesses stated, that, in the event of the cornice being permitted to remain up so long as to give the owner of the house a right to keep it there, the value of the plaintiff's premises would be thereby diminished to the extent of £100., inasmuch as he would be prevented from building to the extremity of his land. Upon cross-examination, none of the witnesses would undertake to state that any rain had fallen upon the plaintiff's garden from the time of the erection of the cornice down to the commencement of the action, the 2d of July, 1844.

It was thereupon insisted, on the part of the defendants, that, as the grievance of which the plaintiff complained in his declaration was the causing the rain-water to flow from the cornice on to the plaintiff's garden, the evidence did not sustain it, no such inconvenience as that complained of having, in fact, been sustained by the plaintiff, down to the time of the commencement of the action.

[72] "But even should you think it proved that the defendants committed the act complained of, and that they have also not succeeded in making out their justification, before you can find for the plaintiff, you must be also satisfied that the plaintiff has sustained some substantial damage; it is not every unpleasantness or inconvenience that will be a good ground for an action like the present. There are many nuisances which the law will not recognize; as, by building so as slightly to obstruct another's light, or to shut out his view of a fine prospect, and the like. You must be satisfied that the plaintiff has sustained some substantial damage." Lord Denman, summing up in Evans v. Lisle (1836) 7 Car. & P. 563, 565.

His Lordship refused to nonsuit the plaintiff, but reserved the point; and he left it to the jury to say whether or not the plaintiff had been injured by the dripping of rain from the defendant's cornice, upon his garden, or by reason of the projection itself; which latter he inclined to think gave a cause of action, inasmuch as the plaintiff would be thereby prevented from building to the extremity of his own land, if so minded. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 40s.

A rule nisi having been obtained to enter a nonsuit, Shee, Serjt., urged the doctrine of Holt, C. J., in Ashby v. White (1703) 2 Ld. Raym. 938, that "every injury to a right imports a damage, in the nature of it, though there be no pecuniary loss."

(MAULE, J. I think there is no doubt that trespass would lie here: but, can the plaintiff maintain case without showing some consequential damage?)

Talfourd, Serjt., in support of the rule: It is not disputed that case will lie for a permanent injury to the plaintiff's right, upon a declaration aptly framed. But the question here is, whether any such injury (apart from the falling of rain) is suggested upon this record as will entitle the plaintiff to maintain this action. Striking out the allegation as to the dripping of rain upon the plaintiff's garden, that which remains is a mere allegation of a trespass. You cannot disengage the damage resulting from the trespass, from the trespass itself, so as to make it the subject of another form of action. Suppose the defendants had put up a pipe over their own land, in such a manner that it would only in very wet weather incommode the plaintiff; the plaintiff, clearly, could not have brought an action until some actual damage had occurred.[73]

COLTMAN, J. * * * Let us strike out of the declaration the allegation as to the dripping of rain; and then there remains simply an allegation that the defendants wrongfully and injuriously built, and caused and procured to be built, a certain cornice and projection, near to, and projecting over, the plaintiff's garden-ground, and that, by reason of the premises, the plaintiff had been greatly annoyed and incommoded in the use, possession, and enjoyment of his messuage, garden-ground, etc., and the same thereby became and was greatly deteriorated and lessened in value. Now, my brother Talfourd contends that evidence as to damage resulting to the plaintiff from the projection of the cornice, apart from rain, was not admissible, there being no allegation in the declaration to warrant it; for, that the statement as to the erection of the cornice must be considered as a mere allegation of a trespass, for which the plaintiff could not recover any damages in this form of action. It was not contended at the trial that that amounted to a trespass; nor was it so put by Sir T. Wilde, on moving [73] The statement of the case is abridged. A part of the opinion of Coltman, J., and the concurring opinions of Maule and Cresswell, JJ., are omitted.

for the rule. Supposing it, however, to be conceded that that would amount to an act of trespass—which is opposed to the opinion of Lord Ellenborough, Pickering v. Rudd, 1 Stark. N. P. C. 56, by reason of the presumption of law, cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum, there is nothing to show that the plaintiff had, or claimed, a right so extensive as that: and it is mere matter of fact. There is nothing, therefore, in this declaration that necessarily shows that the building of the cornice amounted to a trespass; and, consequently, I see no ground for saying that the evidence that was received was improperly admitted, or that the case was improperly left to the jury. Baten's Case, 9 Co. Rep. 53b, has considerable bearing on the present. It was there alleged that the defendant erected a house at the extremity of his land so as to project or jut over the house of the plaintiffs, ad nocumentum liberi tenementi ipsorum: and the court resolved that the plaintiffs need not assign any special nuisance; for, it appeared to the court that it was to their nuisance. So, here, the mere fact of the defendants' cornice overhanging the plaintiff's land, may be considered as a nuisance to him, importing a damage which the law can estimate. And, if so, it is quite unnecessary, as I apprehend, to lay special damage in the declaration. For these reasons, I am of opinion that there is no ground for disturbing the verdict.[74]

STURGES v. BRIDGMAN.

(Chancery Division, 1878. Court of Appeal, 1879. 11 Ch. Div. 852.)

The plaintiff was a physician. In the year 1865 he purchased the lease of a house in Wimpole Street, London, which he occupied as his professional residence. Wimpole Street runs north and south, and is crossed at right angles by Wigmore Street. The plaintiff's house was on the west side of Wimpole Street, and was the second house from the north side of Wigmore Street. Behind the house was a garden, and in 1873 the plaintiff erected a consulting-room at the end of his garden.

[74] See the remarks of Kelly, C. B., in Harrop v. Hirst (1868) L. R. 4 Ex. 43, 46: "The plaintiffs claim, with other persons, inhabitants of the same district as themselves, a right to a continuous flow of water for domestic purposes from a spout situated in the street of Tamewater, in the parish of Saddleworth, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. The defendant is the occupier and owner of certain land through which the stream on which the spout is dependent for its supply of water, flows; and he has from time to time abstracted water from the stream, to such an extent as to render the amount which reaches the spout to be sometimes insufficient for the supply of the whole district entitled to make use of it. It did not appear, however, at the trial that the plaintiffs themselves had ever suffered any actual personal inconvenience from the want of water, and the question is, whether, under these circumstances, an action is maintainable at their suit—in other words, does such an action lie without proof of any actual personal and particular damage? I think it is clear on the authorities, and especially on the case of Westbury v. Powel, cited in Fineux v. Hovenden (1599) Cro. Eliz. 661, that such an action is maintainable."

The defendant was a confectioner in large business in Wigmore Street. His house was on the north side of Wigmore Street and his kitchen was at the back of his house, and stood on ground which was formerly a garden and abutted on the portion of the plaintiff's garden on which he built the consulting-room. So that there was nothing between the plaintiff's consulting-room and the defendant's kitchen but the party-wall. The defendant had in his kitchen two large marble mortars set in brickwork built up to and against the party-wall which separated his kitchen from the plaintiff's consulting-room, and worked by two large wooden pestles held in an upright position by horizontal bearers fixed into the party-wall. These mortars were used for breaking up and pounding loaf-sugar and other hard substances, and for pounding meat.

The plaintiff alleged that when the defendant's pestles and mortars were being used the noise and vibration thereby caused were very great, and were heard and felt in the plaintiff's consulting-room, and such noise and vibration seriously annoyed and disturbed the plaintiff, and materially interfered with him in the practice of his profession. In particular the plaintiff stated that the noise prevented him from examining his patients by auscultation for diseases of the chest. He also found it impossible to engage with effect in any occupation which required thought and attention. The use of the pestles and mortars varied with the pressure of the defendant's business, but they were generally used between the hours of 10 a. m. and 1 p. m.

The plaintiff made several complaints of the annoyance, and ultimately brought this action, in which he claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the pestles and mortars in such manner as to cause him annoyance.

The defendant stated in his defence that he and his father had used one of the pestles and mortars in the same place and to the same extent as now for more than sixty years, and that he had used the second pestle and mortar in the same place and to the same extent as now for more than twenty-six years. He alleged that if the plaintiff had built his consulting-room with a separate wall, and not against the wall of the defendant's kitchen, he would not have experienced any noise or vibration; and he denied that the plaintiff suffered any serious annoyance, and pleaded a prescriptive right to use the pestles and mortars under the 2 & 3 Will. IV, c. 71.

Issue was joined, and both parties went into evidence. The result of the evidence was that the existence of the nuisance was, in the opinion of the court, sufficiently proved; and it also appeared that no material inconvenience had been felt by the plaintiff until he built his consulting-room.

The action came on for trial before the Master of the Rolls.

JESSEL, M. R.[75] I think this is a clear case for the plaintiff. There is really no dispute as to this being a nuisance; in fact, the evidence is all one way, and, as has been often said in these cases, the plaintiff is not bound to go on bringing actions for damages every day, when he is entitled to an injunction.

The only serious point which has been argued for the defendant is that by virtue of the statute, or by prescription, he was entitled as against the plaintiff to make this noise and commit a nuisance. Now the facts seem to be that until a very recent period it was not a nuisance at all. There was an open garden at the back of and attached to the plaintiff's house, and the noise, it seems, if it went anywhere, went over the garden, and, of course, was rapidly dispersed; as far as I can see upon the evidence before me, there was until a recent period no nuisance to anybody—no actionable nuisance at all. The actionable nuisance began when the plaintiff did what he had a right to do, namely, built a consulting-room in his garden, and when, on attempting to use the consulting room for a proper purpose, he found this noise too great for anything like comfort. That was the time to bring an action for nuisance.

Now, under those circumstances, it appears to me that neither the defence of the statute, nor the defence of the right by prescription, can possibly avail. * * *

It seems to me that, neither on the theory of lost grant nor on the statute, can the defendant claim to do what he has done, and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction; but as it would be somewhat hard upon a confectioner to alter his mode of business at the height of the London season, I will give him a reasonable time, say until the 1st of August, to alter the position of his mortars.[76]

[75] Part of the opinion is omitted.

Compare Dana v. Valentine (1842) 5 Metc. (Mass.) 8: P. sought an injunction to restrain D. from carrying on the business of slaughtering cattle on his land adjoining P.'s property. The defense was that D. had been carrying on this business at this place for more than twenty years without molestation. But to this it was objected that P.'s property had been vacant during this period, that he had suffered no annoyance until recently, and therefore that he could not interpose to prevent its continuance. "But," said Wilde, J., "it is very clear that where a party's right of property is invaded, he may maintain an action for the invasion of his right, without proof of actual damage."

[76] From this decision the defendant appealed. After argument the Court of Appeal (James, Baggallay, and Thesiger, L. JJ.) dismissed the appeal: "The Master of the Rolls in the Court below took substantially the same view of the matter as ourselves, and granted the relief which the plaintiff prayed for and we are of opinion that his order is right and should be affirmed." The opinion in the Court of Appeal, by Thesiger, L. J., is omitted.

ROBERTS v. GWYRFAI DISTRICT COUNCIL.

(Chancery Division. [1899] 1 Ch. 583.)

The plaintiff was the owner and occupier of an ancient water-mill, with lands belonging thereto, and he claimed, as riparian owner and occupier of the same, to be entitled to the natural flow of a stream that ran past his mill from a lake at the foot of a mountain some distance above the mill, the stream being utilized for driving the mill. The plaintiff also claimed that, whenever necessary for the purposes of his mill, he was entitled, in times of drought and scarcity of water in the stream, to dam up the water of the lake as a reservoir so as to ensure a sufficient supply of water to the mill. In 1893, the defendants, who had obtained a lease of the lake from the Crown and also a lease of adjoining land for the purpose of increasing the size of the lake, informed the plaintiff of their intention to take water from the lake for the purpose of supplying certain villages in their district with water, and applied to him for his written consent thereto under section 332 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), but he refused to give such consent. Thereupon the defendants, without any further notice, laid down pipes, and under, it was said, a license granted by the Crown in 1896, constructed a dam across the end of the lake, of which the stream in question formed the natural outlet, so as to increase the water storage, a sluice being placed in the dam to regulate the outflow from the lake. The area of the lake was considerably increased by the defendants' works.

The plaintiff, in 1898, issued the writ in this action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking any of the water from the lake, and from doing any act whereby the flow of water in the stream through and by the plaintiff's mill and lands would be diminished. The defendants, as lessees and occupiers of land adjoining the lake, claimed riparian and other rights in the lake, including the right to take water therefrom for supplying their district, so far as they could do so without causing damage to other riparian owners. They denied that they had done or were intending to do anything whereby the flow of water in the stream past the plaintiff's mill had been or would be diminished or so as to cause any damage to the plaintiff.

The action now came on for trial with witnesses. It was admitted at the trial that the plaintiff had not yet suffered any actual damage, and that the defendants' dam had been properly constructed for the purpose they had in view; also, that an arrangement had been made by means of the sluice for providing a regulated flow of water down the stream. This, the defendants' witnesses said, would give the plaintiff a constant supply instead of an intermittent one, which the plaintiff admitted sometimes occurred in dry seasons. The plaintiff, however, insisted that he was entitled, as of right, to the flow of water past his mill unimpeded and uncontrolled in any way by the defendants.

KEKEWICH, J. * * * The defendants, in the exercise of what they conceive to be their duty and within their powers, utilised the waters of this lake by constructing certain works which are admitted at present to be properly constructed with a view of supplying the district with water. It is not suggested that the plaintiff will be any worse off now than he was before; probably he will be better off in the future than he has been in the past. The supply may not be the same, but it will be sufficient, and will be apparently more constant than it has been before, since the evidence shews it to have been of an intermittent character and sometimes very much less than was required for the purposes of the mill. But the plaintiff says: "I am entitled to insist upon having what I had before. It is immaterial whether the supply of water I had before is better or worse than what is now proposed to be given to me. It is for me to consider whether I shall derive any benefit from the alteration. I protest against any alteration at all."

Several cases have been referred to, but I intend to refer only to one of them in which occurs a passage to which Mr. Renshaw called my attention. The law on this subject has been threshed out again and again, and I do not think any advantage would be gained by my going through the authorities. A riparian proprietor or owner is entitled to say that the water which flows by his property and which is used by him for ordinary, or it may be for extraordinary, purposes shall flow in the future as it has done in the past—debet currere ut currere solebat. That seems to me to be the common law right; and unless that common law right has been affected by statute he is entitled to insist upon it. But there is one passage in Lord Cairns's speech in the House of Lords in the case of Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co., L. R. 7 H. L. 697, which, Mr. Renshaw says, instead of being in the plaintiff's favour is against him. I do not so read it. What Lord Cairns says is this (L. R. 7 H. L. 705): "Therefore, my Lords, so far as regards the position of the respondents as riparian owners, it appears to me that they clearly have a right to complain of that which is done by the appellants, if what is so done by them is insisted upon as a thing which they have a right to do." That is the qualification. "I put this qualification because, if, when the attention of the appellants had been called to what they were doing, they had not insisted upon doing it as a matter of right, I can well understand that if the Court of Chancery found * * * that no sensible damage had occurred to them, it might not have thought it necessary to interfere with them by an injunction or declaration."

What I understand Lord Cairns to mean is that, there being no sensible damage, an injunction or declaration would not have been granted unless the appellants had insisted upon what they were doing as a thing they were entitled to do as a matter of right. From which I should conclude also that, as they did insist upon it as a matter of right, whether damage was incurred or not, the respondents were entitled to an injunction or declaration. That, as I understand, is the meaning of his Lordship's observations, and what he means by the qualification, and what he deduces from it. Therefore it seems to me that, unless the defendants have some higher authority by statute (prescription being out of the question) to interfere with the flow of water, they have no right to alter the flow even although the alteration may cause no sensible damage to the plaintiff. He is entitled to have his water flowing as it did before, and so far I am entirely in his favour. * * *

The defendants are seeking to interfere with the plaintiff's common law right, and there is no statutory power enabling them to do that. The common law right seems to me to be unaffected by the statute.

The result is that, in my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction. The injunction will be a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, agents, and workmen, from taking any water from the lake for the purpose of supplying their district with water, and from doing any other act for that purpose whereby the flow of water in the stream and through and by the plaintiff's mill and lands shall be diminished.[77]

DOWNING v. ELLIOTT.

This case was reserved from the Supreme Judicial Court, Suffolk County, for the full court, on the pleadings, master's report, and complainant's exceptions.

MORTON, J. The plaintiff is engaged in the ice business, and is the owner of a pond in Brighton, from which he cuts ice for family and wholesale trade. The defendant is the owner of a greenhouse near the pond, and heated by steam. Prior to the bringing of the bill he had used soft coal; and the bill alleges that smoke, dust, soot, and cinders were thereby deposited in the plaintiff's pond, and the ice rendered unfit for use. The prayer of the bill is that the defendant may be restrained from using soft coal or other fuel that will interfere with or injure the property or business of the plaintiff, and for the assessment of damages. * * *

The defendant's business is a lawful business, and he has a right to use his premises in any manner that will not interfere with the legal rights of others or violate the law. It cannot be said, we think, that the use of soft coal for the purpose of generating steam of itself constitutes a nuisance, and there is nothing to show that the business is not a proper one to be carried on in that locality, or that it is not carried on in a proper manner. Indeed, there would seem to be few businesses less objectionable than that of growing plants and flowers for sale. But, though the locality is a suitable one, and the business is lawful, and carried on in a proper manner, the defendant has no right to materially contaminate the air that comes to the plaintiff's premises, and injure his business and property, by the presence and deposit of smoke, soot, dust, and cinders. Every one has a right to have the air that comes to his premises come as pure and uncontaminated as can reasonably be expected. In thickly-settled communities absolute purity is out of the question; and the more thickly-settled the community is, and the more varied are the kinds of business, the more will the atmosphere be unavoidably impregnated with impurities. This is one of the inconveniences, if it is an inconvenience, which every one who lives in a populous neighborhood must suffer. But the fact that the atmosphere is already impure does not justify or excuse a party in adding to the impurity, so as thereby to cause still further discomfort to others, or still further injury to their business or property; and conduct which leads to such a result will constitute an invasion of the rights of the parties injuriously affected thereby. But in these as in other cases an independent wrongdoer is responsible only for the consequences of his own wrongdoing, and not for the acts or conduct of others. The burden of proof is upon the party complaining, and each case must stand on its own facts. No general rules can be laid down that will furnish an infallible guide in all cases. The most that can be done is to indicate the lines along which the decision must proceed. To entitle the plaintiff to relief, the injury of which he complains must be certain and substantial, and not slight or theoretical. The right, as already observed, is not a right to absolute purity, any invasion of which would give a right of action, but it is a right to such a degree of purity as, taking all the circumstances into account, the plaintiff is reasonably entitled to. See Ferrule Co. v. Hills, 159 Mass. 147, 34 N. E. 85, 20 L. R. A. 844; Rogers v. Elliott, 146 Mass. 349, 15 N. E. 768, 4 Am. St. Rep. 316; Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cas. 642; Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 409; Walter v. Selfe, 4 De Gex & S. 315; Fleming v. Hislop (1886) 11 App. Cas. 686; Wood, Nuis. (1st Ed.) 429 et seq.

In the present case the master finds that the ice was unfit and unsuitable for the plaintiff's family trade by reason of black spots resembling soot and cinders embedded in it, and that the black specks referred to had been deposited on the surface, and had sunk into the ice in the process of alternate freezing and thawing; and he says, what is obvious, that the main question in the case is to determine from what source these specks came. Upon that question he finds as follows: "I cannot find that no particles of soot or carbon from the defendant's chimney are deposited on the plaintiff's pond or upon his ice, but I find and report that soot and cinders from the defendant's chimney, caused by the burning of soft coal by him, are only one cause contributing to the specks resembling soot and cinders in the plaintiff's ice, rendering it unfit and unsuitable to be used and disposed of in his family trade. I further find and report, if it is material, that the portion of soot and cinders coming from the defendant's chimney is of small importance in comparison with other causes contributing to injure the plaintiff's ice and render it unfit and unsuitable as aforesaid." These findings are warranted by other facts found by the master,—such, for instance, as the general considerations affecting the locality, the precautions taken by the defendant to prevent the escape of soot and cinders, the distance from the fire to the chimney and the distance from them to the pond, the fact that the prevailing wind was not in a direction from the greenhouse towards the pond, and the experiments and other circumstances tending to show that the atmosphere abounded in impurities from other causes. There is no finding that any unusual or extraordinary volumes of smoke issued at any time from the defendant's chimney; and the fair import of the master's findings is, it seems to us, that while he cannot say that no soot and cinders from the defendant's chimney were deposited on the plaintiff's ice, if any were deposited they contributed only slightly, if at all, to the injury to the ice, and the damage done by them was insignificant as compared with that resulting from other causes. He further finds that, while the use of soft coal is not a necessity in carrying out the defendant's business, it is more economical, and saves him between $400 and $500 a year. If, therefore, an injunction should issue as prayed for, it not only will not afford the plaintiff the relief which he seeks, but will inflict great and unnecessary injury on the defendant. As the case stands, we do not think that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction. Neither do we think that he is entitled to damages. If the alleged injuries are too slight and uncertain to be ground for an injunction, we do not see how they can be made the basis for an assessment of damages.[78]

The result is that we think that the bill should be dismissed. So ordered.

[78] Part of the opinion is omitted.

"In all these cases of nuisance, one has to consider what must be proved by the plaintiff in order to support his action. It seems to me that the House of Lords went upon the principle that, whether the plaintiff was relying upon his common law rights, or upon his prescriptive rights, or his rights of property of any sort or kind, the conditions precedent to constitute a cause of action were really identical. The courts have always been unwilling in these cases of nuisance to hold that every nuisance, apart from the rule de minimis non curat lex, should be a cause of action. On the contrary, in all these cases of nuisance which involve a limitation of a man's right to use his own land, the courts will not enforce the alleged rights of the plaintiff, unless that which has occurred is a substantial interference with his comfortable or profitable occupation of his dwelling-house, or warehouse, or house of business, as the case may be." (C) The Remedies in Nuisance

There was an old Assise of Nuisance; but this, as a real action, could only be used by and against freeholders, while the action of Case framed upon the analogy of it was open to all persons having an interest in possession, against all persons causing a physical injury to their land. A curious and not altogether commendable survival of the right of self-help marks the transition. Under the old Assise of Nuisance, and the still older Writ of Quod Permittat, the successful plaintiff was entitled to have the nuisance "abated," or taken away by the sheriff and the power of the county. The judgment in the action of Case in the Nature of Nuisance was merely for damages; but the complainant was, apparently, permitted to abate the nuisance himself, and the right survives to the present day, though the exercise of it has been largely superseded by the issue of mandatory injunctions.

GATES v. BLINCOE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1834. 2 Dana, 158, 26 Am. Dec. 440.)

ROBERTSON, C. J. The plaintiff sued the defendants, in case, for diverting the water from his mill, by cutting a ditch. They attempted to justify on the ground that the mill dam was a nuisance, which they had a legal right to abate.

On the trial, the court instructed the jury that "if the water occasioned (by the dam) was a nuisance, or had been a nuisance, and was like to become so again, the defendants had a right to cut a ditch, and draw off the water," and thereupon the jury found a verdict for the defendants, on which the court rendered a judgment in bar of the action. * * *

In the opinion of this court, the instruction is erroneous in three particulars:

First. It is not strictly true, that "if the dam had been a nuisance, and was like to become so again," the defendants had a right to abate it. Unless it was a nuisance at the time when the ditch was cut, no person had a right to stop or obstruct the mill without the owner's consent. It is not now material whether the evidence tended to prove that the dam was a nuisance when the ditch was cut; for the instruction clearly implies that, though it may not have been then a nuisance, the defendants had a right to abate it, if it had been, and would probably again become a nuisance; and it is evident that, even though it may have been once a nuisance, and might again become so, it may not have been a nuisance when the ditch was cut by the defendants. A probability that a thing may become a nuisance, or, in other words, an actual and substantial annoyance, public or private, does not make a nuisance which can be lawfully abated; and therefore, Lord Hardwicke, in an anonymous case in 3 Atk. said that "the fears of mankind, though they may be reasonable, will not create a nuisance."

In a proper case, when the danger is imminent, a nuisance may be prevented by injunction; and for that which had been a common nuisance, an indictment would be an effectual and appropriate remedy.

A nuisance must be actually subsisting, to the injury of the public, or of some individual, before any person should be suffered to resort to a remedy so critical, perilous and extraordinary, as that of his own will and power, which necessity alone indulges, in cases of extremity or of great emergency, in which no ordinary remedy will be altogether effectual. The public peace should not be jeoparded, by permitting individuals to redress their own wrongs, when they might obtain adequate security and indemnity by a resort to any of the ordinary remedies in courts of justice.

Prima facie, a mill dam which was once a nuisance will continue to be so as long as it exists; but it may not; and, therefore, as the dam may not in this case have been a nuisance when the ditch was cut, the instruction was erroneous.

Second. Even though the dam may have been a nuisance when the ditch was cut, the defendants had not, as the court instructed the jury that they had, a right, as a matter of course, to abate the nuisance; because it may have been, in the opinion of the jury, a private nuisance only, and, if so, no person who was not injured by it had a right to abate it; and therefore, as the jury, and not the court, had the right to decide whether the nuisance was public or private and whether, if private, it annoyed the defendants, or any of them, the court erred in instructing the jury, that if they believed that the dam was a nuisance, the defendants had a right to abate it.

Third. If the defendants had a right to cut a ditch for abating a nuisance, their right was limited to that which was a nuisance; they had no right to draw off more water than so much as would abate the nuisance. If they transcended that limit, they did an injury to the plaintiff for which he might have an action. Rex v. Rippineau, 1 Strange, 686, and Russell on Crimes, 306. The ditch may have been deeper than the end to be legitimately effected by it, required. There was no proof as to that point, and the instruction is, in that particular, unqualified, and, therefore, is erroneous; because it imports that the defendants were justifiable, even if, in abating a nuisance, they wantonly or recklessly destroyed, without necessity, the total value of the plaintiff's mill.

Wherefore, it is considered by this court that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.[79]

STATE v. MOFFETT et al.

(Supreme Court of Iowa, 1848. 1 G. Greene, 247.)

The defendants were indicted for damaging a mill-dam. It appears from the bill of exceptions that Moffett built and possessed a mill and dam on Skunk River in 1834 or 1835; that at the time of the alleged injury he was in possession; that in 1840 Peter Brener, built a mill and dam on the same river, about a mile and half below Moffett's mill, the effect of which was to throw back-water to an injurious extent on the wheels of Moffett's Mills, but not so as to stop them entirely; that both mills are public mills; and on the 23d of March, 1848, Moffett and the other defendants tore down Brener's dam to a considerable degree—a space from fifty to eighty feet wide, and from one to three feet deep—with intent to remove the alleged nuisance; and justified in their defense on the ground that Brener's dam was a nuisance injurious to Moffett, and that he had a right to abate it by his own act.

The prosecution asked the court to instruct the jury, that, by the 15th section of the criminal law of Iowa, entitled an "Act Defining Crimes and Punishments," the right of Moffett to abate a mill-dam as a nuisance, by his own act, was taken away; which instruction was refused. The court also refused to instruct the jury, that the act of the legislative assembly authorizing Peter Brener to build a dam did not take away Moffett's right to abate the dam as a nuisance. The court then instructed the jury, that if Brener's dam caused water to flow back upon the wheel of Moffett's mill to his serious injury, it was a private nuisance, and Moffett might pull it down so as to remove the back-water. These instructions, refused and given, are assigned for error.

KINNEY, J. The only question in this case is, whether the statute making it a penal offense to "injure a mill-dam," took away Moffett's right to abate it for a nuisance. That a person at common law has a right to abate a nuisance cannot be denied. It is one of those rights which secure to him the uninterrupted enjoyment of his person and property. When properly exercised, it may be as essential to his happiness as the right of self defense. But like other summary rights of damages, and have judgment that the nusance shall be removed, cast down, or abated, as the case requires; or the party grieved may enter and abate the nusance himself, as appears by 17 E. 3, 44, 9 E. 4, 35, and in Penruddock's Case, but then he shall not have an action, nor recover damages, for in an assize of nusance, or quod permittat prosternere, etc., it is a good plea, that the plaintiff himself either before the writ brought, or pending the writ, has abated the nusance: for in an assise or quod permittat, he shall have judgment of two things, sc. to have the nusance abated, and to recover damages, and he has disabled himself by his own act to have judgment for one of them, s. to have a nusance abated, and therefore the action doth not lie.") James v. Hayward (1631) Cro. Car. 184, 78 Reprint, 761. Raikes v. Townsend (1804) 2 Smith, 9, 7 R. R. 776, when Serjeant Williams urged unsuccessfully that the right of abatement by self help was confined to the cases mentioned in 2 Rolle's Abridgement, 144, pls. 2 and 3, nuisances to a house, to a mill, or to land.

See also 29 Cyc. 1214 et seq.; 37 Cent. Dig. "Nuisance," §§ 51–54; Key-No. "Nuisance," §§ 20, 74.

this nature, it is confined within certain limits. No more injury to the property of another must be inflicted than is absolutely necessary to accomplish the object. A salutary check is thrown around an improper exercise of this right, as the individual is always under the peril of being deemed a trespasser, unless the existence of the nuisance is established. Thus, while a person can be the judge, in the first instance, as to the existence of the nuisance, if it should turn out otherwise he is responsible, and can be made to answer to the party injured, and may subject himself to criminal prosecution. But at common law, his right to abate a nuisance, when it really is such, is uncontroverted. And we think our statute has not impaired this right by making it penal to injure a mill-dam, if the mill-dam becomes a nuisance. The injury to the dam, to come within the purview of the statute, must be "willful or malicious." The summary abatement of a dam as a nuisance, is not necessarily attended with malicious or willful motives. It may be an act necessary for the protection and enjoyment of property. * * * [80]

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. GIDDY.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1904] 2 K. B. 448.)

The plaintiff and the defendant were the occupiers of adjoining premises. The plaintiff alleged that he had sustained damage to the extent of £60. by reason of certain elm and ash trees growing on the defendant's premises overhanging the plaintiff's premises and interfering with the growth of his fruit trees. The plaintiff claimed damages and an injunction.

The county court judge held that the plaintiff's only remedy was to abate the nuisance by cutting back the overhanging trees himself, and he directed a nonsuit. The plaintiff appealed.[81]

WILLS, J. I am of opinion that the judgment of the county court judge in this case was erroneous, and that there must be a new trial. It is no doubt quite true that there is no case to be found in the books in which the action has been held to lie against an adjoining owner for allowing his trees to project over the boundary where the only damage resulting from the projection has been a damage to the plaintiff's crops. It was pointed out by Kelly, C. B., in Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board [1878] 4 Ex. D. 5, that there was no precedent for such an action, and it was there suggested that there was much to be said on the grounds of general convenience in favour of such an action not being maintainable. But I am of opinion that the principle upon which that case was decided is enough to enable us to decide the present case in favour of the plaintiff. There the action was brought against the owners of a yew tree which they or their predecessors in title had planted on their land and which they allowed to overhang their boundary, whereby the plaintiff's horse in the adjoining meadow feeding on the projecting branches was poisoned; and it was held that the action lay. The court treated the case as an illustration of the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher [1868] L. R. 3 H. L. 330, that a person who brings on his land something that is likely to do damage if it escapes is responsible if that damage occurs.[82] It seems to me that there is no distinction in principle between the damage occasioned in that case and the damage in the present. The injury to the plaintiff's fruit trees was the natural consequence of the defendant's trees being allowed to overhang.

I have come to this conclusion with considerable reluctance, for I have a strong feeling that it is highly desirable not to establish new causes of action if it can possibly be avoided, but I do not see how we can refuse to hold that this action lies without departing from the principle of Crowhurst's Case. Moreover, we are fortified in this view by the dictum of Kay, L. J., in the case of Lemmon v. Webb [1894] 3 Ch. 1, where, although it was not necessary to the decision, he distinctly states it as his opinion that for any damage occasioned by overhanging boughs an action on the case would lie. It has been contended that the remedy which the plaintiff has of cutting the trees back himself is all sufficient, and that under those circumstances it is unnecessary to invent a new cause of action. But that, in my opinion, is no answer to the action.

KENNEDY, J. I am of the same opinion. The county court judge has nonsuited the plaintiff; therefore we must assume, for the purposes of the present argument, that the damage alleged in the particulars has actually been suffered. If that be so, the damage was substantial. And under those circumstances I fail to see any reason in principle why the action should not lie as for a nuisance. I cannot differentiate the present case in principle from Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board. If trees although projecting over the boundary are not in fact doing any damage, it may be that the plaintiff's only right is to cut back the overhanging portions; but where they are actually doing damage, I think there must be a right of action. In such a case I do not think that the owner of the offending trees can compel the plaintiff to seek his remedy in cutting them. He has no right to put the plaintiff to the trouble and expense which that remedy might involve. The case must go back for a new trial.

COULSON v. WHITE.

(High Court of Chancery, 1743. 3 Atk. 21, 26 Reprint, 816.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. Every common trespass is not a foundation for an injunction in this court, where it is only contingent and temporary; but if it continues so long as to become a nuisance, in such a case the court will interfere and grant an injunction to restrain the person from committing it.[84]

CRUMP v. LAMBERT.

LORD ROMILLY, M. R. The plaintiff in this cause is the occupier and owner of a house in Walsall, in Staffordshire, and complains that the defendants have recently erected an iron factory adjoining his grounds, the smoke, noise, and effluvia proceeding from which occasion a nuisance which he applies to this court to abate. The defence is, in substance, twofold; first, one of law, and secondly, one of fact. The defendants say that smoke alone does not entitle a person to come here for an injunction; that a disagreeable smell alone does not entitle a plaintiff to ask for an injunction; that noise alone does not entitle a plaintiff to ask for an injunction. * * *

With respect to the question of law, I consider it to be established by numerous decisions that smoke, unaccompanied with noise or noxious vapour, that noise alone, that offensive vapours alone, although not injurious to health, may severally constitute a nuisance to the owner of adjoining or neighbouring property; that if they do so, substantial damages may be recovered at law, and that this court, if applied to, will restrain the continuance of the nuisance by injunction in all

[84] As late as 1834, Lord Chancellor Brougham remarked, in Earl of Ripon v. Hobart, 3 My. & K. 169, 180: "It is always to be borne in mind that the jurisdiction of this court over nuisance by injunction at all is of recent growth, has not till very lately been much exercised, and has at various times found great reluctance on the part of the learned judges to use it, even in cases where the thing or the act complained of was admitted to be directly and immediately hurtful to the complainant. All that has been said in the cases where this unwillingness has appeared, may be referred to in support of the proposition which I have stated; as in The Attorney-General v. Nichol [1809] 16 Ves. 338, The Attorney-General v. Cleaver [1811] 18 Ves. 211, an Anonymous case [1790] 1 Ves. Jun. 140, before Lord Thurlow, and others. It is also very material to observe, what is indeed strong authority of a negative kind, that no instance can be produced of the interposition by injunction in the case of what we have been regarding as eventual or contingent nuisance."

On the present extent and variety of this equitable jurisdiction, see 29 Cyc. 1219 et seq., and 21 Halsbury's Laws of England, 560.

The principles followed in granting or refusing an injunction for a nuisance are in the main those which apply generally to this branch of equity.

cases where substantial damages could be recovered at law. Elliotson v. Feetham [1835] 2 Bing. N. C. 134, and Soltau v. De Held [1851] 2 Sim. N. S. 133, are instances relating to noise alone. In the former, damages were recovered in an action at law; and in the second, an injunction was granted on account of sound alone.

What constitutes a nuisance is thus defined by Lord Justice Knight Bruce, when Vice-Chancellor, in Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 322: "Both on principle and authority the important point next for decision may properly, I conceive, be thus put: Ought this inconvenience to be considered in fact as more than fanciful, more than one of mere delicacy or fastidiousness, as an inconvenience materially interfering with the ordinary comfort, physically, of human existence, not merely according to elegant or dainty modes and habits of living, but according to plain and sober and simple notions among the English people?" This definition is adopted in Soltau v. De Held by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, and is, I apprehend, strictly correct; and it agrees with the principle of all the cases referred to at common law and approved of in the case of St. Helen's Smelting Company v. Tipping, 11 H. L. C. 642, which settled the law as regards another part of this case, to which I shall presently have occasion, when citing Hole v. Barlow, 4 C. B. N. S. 334 (E. C. L. R. vol. 93), to refer. The law on this subject is, I apprehend, the same, whether it be enforced by action at law or by bill in equity. In any case where a plaintiff could obtain substantial damages at law, he is entitled to an injunction to restrain the nuisance in this court.[85]

RIDER v. CLARKSON.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. 1910. 77 N. J. Eq. 469, 78 Atl. 676, 140 Am. St. Rep. 614.)

Suit for injunction by Susie B. Rider and others against Mary E. Clarkson and others.

LEAMING, V. C. * * * It is lawful for a person to keep a vicious dog. De Gray v. Murray, 69 N. J. Law, 458, 55 Atl. 237. But it is not lawful for a person to keep a vicious dog in such manner that neighbors are unnecessarily exposed to danger. It is no less a nuisance for a neighbor to keep a vicious dog without appropriate restraint and in such manner that the dog can and will escape and inflict bodily harm than it is for such neighbor to conduct a lawful business in such negligent manner as to endanger the health of residents in the vicinity. The undisputed facts are that the dog in question is vicious, and is only restrained by a fence over which he can jump at will; and that the owner of the dog refuses to adopt suitable measures to prevent the escape of the dog; and that complainants are in danger of being attacked by the dog at such times as they leave their homes. The dog has been ordered by the municipality to be killed, pursuant to the provisions of a local ordinance, but the execution of that order had been prevented by a writ of certiorari; in the meantime the unlawful conduct of defendants renders it unsafe for complainants to pass to and from their homes. I think it the undoubted duty of a court of equity to extend immediate relief against the continuance of such conditions.

[85] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point.
On the limitations attaching to equity jurisdiction in such causes, see 29 Cyc. 1222 et seq.

I see no reason why complainants may not appropriately join in the bill. They suffer special injury by reason of the proximity of their properties to the property occupied by defendants, and the wrongful conduct of defendants affects them in a similar way and at the same time. See Rowbotham v. Jones, 47 N. J. Eq. 337, 20 Atl. 731, 19 L. R. A. 663.

I will advise a preliminary injunction restraining defendants from longer keeping the dog on the premises in question without the adoption of suitable measures to prevent the escape of the dog from the premises.[86]

COOMBS et al. v. LENOX REALTY CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. 1913. 111 Me. 178, 88 Atl. 477, 47 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1085.)

SPEAR, J. This is a bill in equity in which the plaintiffs allege that the brick wall of the defendant's building, 18 feet from the ground, and between the second and third floor continuing to the roof, shows a maximum overhang upon the plaintiffs' premises of about 1½ inches, and prays that the encroachment upon the plaintiff's land occasioned thereby may be adjudged a nuisance and that the defendant may be ordered and required to remove it forthwith.

The case comes up on appeal from the decree of the sitting justice. In this decree the law and the facts are so fully stated that the court feels fully justified in adopting it as a proper declaration of the law. If we were to write an opinion, it would necessarily be but a restatement of the law found in the decree, as we fully indorse both the reasoning and the result therein announced. The decree is as follows:

"The case came on to be heard on bill, answer, and proof, and was argued by counsel. And now, after mature deliberation, I make the following findings of fact and rulings in law:

"The defendant in the winter of 1911–12 erected a four-story brick apartment building on Turner street, Auburn, on land adjoining the plaintiff's land. At the bottom, the wall next to the plaintiff's land was built about one inch in from the division line, and was so continued up to the second story. At a point between the second and third stories, owing it is said to the freezing of the mortar nights in extreme cold weather, the wall gradually bulged out as it was built up, until it was in a place or places two inches over the line. The trouble was then noticed by the contractor, and the wall was gradually drawn in until at the top it projected over the line about a quarter of an inch. The result was that when the wall was completed there was an area on its side, towards the easterly end, 20 to 30 feet high and 30 to 40 feet long, which overhung the plaintiff's land, and the overhang was 2 inches at the most, and from that down to a point at the bottom, and a quarter of an inch at the top.

"It is not shown that any of the defendant's officers or agents knew of the bulging until after the building was completed. The contractor testified, and I find, that, although he knew of the bulging before the wall was completed, he did not think it was over the line. The plaintiffs have not been guilty of laches, and have in no sense acquiesced.

"It is not disputed that the plaintiffs, owning the soil in fee, owned also ad usque cœlum, and the overhang of the wall is an invasion of their rights. They have already brought two successive actions of trespass quare clausum fregit for the trespass, and have recovered judgment in each. The plaintiffs now bring this bill for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to remove the overhang of the wall which is over their line.

"The plaintiffs have a three-story wooden tenement building on their lot, standing so near the offending brick wall of the defendant that it will be impossible to remedy a very considerable portion of the overhang by working on the outside. The wall will have to be torn out from the inside and rebuilt, if abatement is ordered. The plaintiffs are sustaining no pecuniary damage at the present time, and will not so long as their present use of their property is unchanged.

"It is not disputed that equity has jurisdiction to order the invasion of the plaintiff's premises to be abated. The grounds of such jurisdiction, as usually stated, are the want of a complete remedy at law, since full compensation for the entire wrong cannot be obtained in an action at law for damages (see 4 Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 1357, and note) and to prevent a multiplicity of actions, since a plaintiff might be compelled to bring a succession of actions in order to obtain relief. See 1 Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 252, and 5 Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. §§ 496, 516.

"But it does not follow that a writ of mandatory injunction should be granted in all cases. It is a discretionary writ. The discretion, however, is not an arbitrary one, but is to be exercised in accordance with settled rules of law. The rules by which I think this case must be tested are stated in Lynch v. Union Institution for Savings, 159 Mass. at page 308, 34 N. E. at page 364, 20 L. R. A. 842, in these words: 'In general, where a defendant has gone on without right and without excuse in an attempt to appropriate the plaintiff's property, or to interfere with his rights, and has changed the condition of his real estate, he is compelled to undo, so far as possible, what he had wrongfully done affecting the plaintiff, and to pay the damages. In such a case a plaintiff is not compelled to part with his property at a valuation, even though it would be much cheaper for the defendant to pay the damages in money than to restore the property. * * * On the other hand, where, by an innocent mistake, erections have been placed a little upon the plaintiff's land, and the damages caused to the defendant by removal of them would be greatly disproportionate to the injury of which the plaintiff complains, the court will not order their removal, but will leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law. * * * The doctrines applied by the court of equity in cases of this kind call for a consideration of all the facts and circumstances which help to show what is just and right between the parties.'

"I think the case at bar falls within the second class of cases mentioned in the Massachusetts case. Here there was no intention nor attempt to appropriate the plaintiff's property. The contractor made a mistake. The injury to the plaintiffs is now trivial, and at no time can it be so great that it would not be many times outweighed by the expense, damage, and loss which would necessarily be occasioned to the defendant if it should be compelled to remove the overhang of its wall. I do not think that equity requires or permits the court to use its strongest arm to produce a result so inequitable. I think the bill should be dismissed, but, under the circumstances, without costs. For further discussion, see Methodist Epis. Soc. v. Akers, 167 Mass. 560, 46 N. E. 381; Harrington v. McCarthy, 169 Mass. 492, 48 N. E. 278, 61 Am. St. Rep. 298; Levi v. Worcester Consolidated St. Ry., 193 Mass. 116, 78 N. E. 853; Kendall v. Hardy, 208 Mass. 20, 94 N. E. 254; Kershishian v. "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the bill be dismissed."

(D) Excusable Nuisances [88]

DELAWARE & HUDSON CANAL CO. v. TORREY.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1859. 33 Pa. 143.)

This was an action on the case by the canal company for obstructing the navigation of its canal, by the discharge of saw-dust from the defendant's mill into the Lackawaxen river, a public highway, in such a manner as to allow the saw-dust to enter the feeder of the company's canal and basin.

It appeared that the defendant had built a saw-mill on the south side of the Lackawaxen, in such a way that the tail-race terminated at the head of the company's feeder, and the saw-dust from the mill entered the feeder, and passed down to the basin, where it settled and obstructed the navigation. The defendant offered evidence to prove that it was impossible for him to use and enjoy his saw-mill, without letting the saw-dust fall into, and pass off with the stream. The court admitted this evidence, notwithstanding an objection by the plaintiff, and sealed a bill of exceptions. Verdict and judgment for the defendant.[89]

STRONG, J. The court was requested to instruct the jury, "that if the whole or any part of the saw-dust made at the defendant's mill, came into the company's basin and there intermingled with other matter, obstructing the navigation, and making it necessary for the company to remove it, then the verdict should be for the plaintiffs."

[88] "In an action on the case, under the plea of not guilty, the defendant may not only put the plaintiff upon proof of the whole charge, contained in the declaration, but may give in evidence any justification or excuse of it, or shew a former recovery, release, or satisfaction. * * * So in case for obstructing ancient lights, a custom of London to build on an ancient foundation to any height, may be given in evidence by the defendant; and though a license must be pleaded in trespass, yet it is the practice to admit it in evidence in an action on the case." 1 Chitty, Pl. 488 (1828).

Rules in Hilary Term (1833): "Pleadings in Particular Actions: IV. In Case: 1. In actions on the case, the plea of not guilty shall operate as a denial only of the breach of duty or wrongful act alleged to have been committed by the defendant, and not of the facts stated in the inducement, and no other defence than such denial shall be admissible under that plea: all other pleas in denial shall take issue on some particular matter of fact alleged in the declaration. In an action on the case for a nuisance to the occupation of a house by carrying on an offensive trade, the plea of not guilty will operate as a denial only that the defendant carried on the alleged trade in such a way as to be a nuisance to the occupation of the house, and will not operate as a denial of the plaintiff's occupation of the house.

In an action on the case, for obstructing a right of way, such plea will operate as a denial of the obstruction only, and not of the plaintiff's right of way.

2. All matters in confession and avoidance shall be pleaded specially." See Chitty, Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) 755.

[89] The statement of the case is abridged and part of the opinion is omitted.

This proposition the court refused to affirm, but on the contrary charged the jury that, if they believed the saw-dust from the defendant's mill alone, unaccompanied and unmixed with saw-dust from other mills, would not inconvenience the plaintiffs, they could not recover. Thus the jury were led to believe that the deposit of saw-dust by the defendant in their basin was not sufficient to enable the plaintiffs to maintain an action, unless it alone caused a practical inconvenience and obstruction to the navigation. This we hold to have been erroneous, and the error was a radical one underlying the whole charge.[90] It was repeated in various forms, and covered nearly the whole ground of contest in the case. The facts, as developed by the evidence, seem to leave no doubt, that the dust from the defendant's mill, falling into the stream, was carried by the current through the feeder of the canal into the basin, and there deposited. The defence consisted mainly, not in a denial of this fact, but in the assertion, that if there had not been intermingled with it saw-dust, culm, and other substances from other mills, no obstruction of the navigation would have been caused. In the way in which the learned judge put the case to the jury, they must have understood that, if the facts were as contended by the defendant, there could be no recovery—that the dust from Mr. Torrey's mill alone must have been, of itself, an obstruction. If this be so, then the basin of the plaintiffs might have been filled without any legal injury to them, for the contributors to the deposit might have been so numerous that the share contributed by each would be inappreciable. Or suppose there had been no other saw-mill on the stream than that of the defendant. In a course of years that might have filled the basin with its dust, and yet the quantity deposited during any period of six years might not, of itself, have caused any obstruction. If the doctrine avowed by the learned judge be correct, the wrong would be remediless. The court confounded the degree with the existence of the injury, or perhaps failed to distinquish between a wrong to the present enjoyment and an injury to the right of enjoyment. The defendant cannot justify himself by showing that others were guilty of similar and concurrent wrongs. He had no right to cause any saw-dust to be deposited in the plaintiff's basin. His first deposit therefore was an actionable injury, though it caused no practical inconvenience, because it was a violation of the plaintiffs' right, and because continued deposition for twenty-one years would have given to him an easement, a right to continue it, as was ruled in Wright v. Williams, 1 M. & W. 77, and as we held in Jones v. Crow, 32 Pa. 398, a case decided at this term. The commencement of the acquisition of such an easement is with [90] The charge on this point, notwithstanding the admission of this testimony, was as follows: "It is argued here, that a water saw-mill cannot be so constructed as to avoid the difficulty complained of. The only answer we need make to it is, that it must be so constructed as not to create a nuisance to the injury of others."

the first user, and of course the first user is an invasion of the rights of the owner of the servient tenement. * * * [91]

The evidence, the admission of which is the subject of the sixth assignment of error, was doubtless inadvertently received. The court subsequently charged the jury, that if the defendant could not enjoy a water-power on his own premises without depriving others above or below him of vested rights, he must cease to enjoy it, or answer in damages for injury done. This ruling, undoubtedly correct, if applied to the evidence, would have excluded it.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.[92]

[91] "Then it was said that the plaintiff alleges an obstruction caused by several persons acting independently of each other, and does not shew what share each had in causing it. It is probably impossible for a person in the plaintiff's position to shew this. Nor do I think it necessary that he should shew it. The amount of obstruction caused by any one of them might not, if it stood alone, be sufficient to give any ground of complaint, though the amount caused by them all may be a serious injury. Suppose one person leaves a wheelbarrow standing on a way, that may cause no appreciable inconvenience, but if a hundred do so, that may cause a serious inconvenience, which a person entitled to the use of the way has a right to prevent; and it is no defence to any one person among the hundred to say that what he does causes of itself no damage to the complainant." Per James, L. J., in Thorpe v. Brumfitt (1873) L. R. 8 Ch. 650, 656.

Compare the opinion of Chitty, J., in Lambton v. Mellish, [1894] 3 Ch. 163, where it was submitted by counsel that the independent act of one of the defendants, in using a gentle hand organ, was a lawful act, and therefore could not be enjoined.

C.) 141 Fed. 385, 411: (The factory of the defendants and the factory of Brown & Co. "are so situated with respect to each other that when the wind is in such direction as to carry the odors from one of them to the quarantine station it will carry the odors from the other there, and the odors from one cannot be distinguished from the odors from the other. There is no evidence of co-operation, privity or business relationship of any kind between the defendants and Brown & Co. in the erection and operation of their respective factories, or between the defendants and the succeeding owners or managers, if such there be, of the factory erected by Brown & Co.; nor is there any evidence to the point that the odors from either of the factories alone would or would not so contaminate the air at the quarantine station as to create a nuisance there within the definition of the authorities. But the combined odors from both factories unquestionably have that effect, and in producing it the two establishments in fact co-operate in and contribute to the creation of the nuisance. Under these circumstances, in the absence of a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law, the owners or managers of both or either of the factories can be enjoined from maintaining or contributing to the maintenance of the nuisance." RAPIER v. LONDON TRAMWAYS CO.

In the Court of Appeal, [1893] 2 Ch. 597.)

The defendants, the London Tramways Company, were empowered by Act of Parliament to construct three lines of tramway according to certain plans, "with all proper rails, plates, works, and conveniences connected therewith." The act gave no compulsory power for taking land and made no special mention of building stables. The defendants constructed the lines, and built large blocks of stables near the plaintiff's house for the horses employed in drawing the cars. The plaintiff complained of the smell caused by the stables, and brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using the stables so as to cause a nuisance.

The action came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Kekewich, who granted the injunction asked as regards the smell. The defendants appealed.[93]

LINDLEY, L. J. I think it is impossible to disturb the judgment or order which is appealed from. The case is one of very considerable importance both to the plaintiff and to the defendants, and it is also of importance from a public point of view.

The first point which we have to consider is the Act of Parliament under which, if at all, the defendants can justify what they have done. Now, what they have done is this. Being a company formed for making tramways, they have bought a piece of land near the plaintiff's house, about five acres in extent. They have erected, at very considerable expense, very excellent stables upon this land, capable of holding more than 400 horses, but used apparently up to the present time for 200, more or less. All that is perfectly lawful. There is no reason why people should not have stables, and large stables too, provided only they carry on their stable business in such a way as not to occasion a nuisance to their neighbours. The Act of Parliament to which Mr. Willis has referred does not appear to me extending from the foundations to the roofs. The fronts of the stores made a continuous brick wall of uniform height and thickness. The partition walls and the front wall were interlocked or built together. On October 17, 1887, the three stores were destroyed by fire. Nothing was left standing except the front wall and parts of the partition walls. Soon after the fire the front wall began to incline towards the street, and continued to incline more and more in that direction until November 17, 1887, when it gave way, near the partition wall between the buildings of L. and P., and the whole front fell into the street. Material from a part of the front wall standing on the lots of E. and P., and from their partition wall, fell upon and killed S., who was lawfully upon the sidewalk near the boundary between their lots. No part of L.'s wall touched him. It was contended that, if E., P., and L. were liable at all, they were not liable jointly, within the rule of Chipman v. Palmer (1879) 77 N. Y. 51, 33 Am. Rep. 566. Held, that they were jointly liable.)

to do more than authorize them to create and make a certain tramway; it proceeds on the assumption that they may use animal power; I do not think it otherwise authorizes such use. Animal power for such a purpose in this country means horse-power, and as a matter of course the defendants must have horses. That involves, as a natural consequence, stables to put them in. To that extent the Act of Parliament authorizes the defendants to have stables and horses. I agree with Mr. Willis that it is for the directors to say, within the limits which I will discuss presently, where they shall have stables, how many horses they will have, and where they will locate them. What are the limits of that discretion? Mr. Willis says this Act of Parliament, which does not say anything expressly about stables or horses, gives the directors power to do whatever in the exercise of their discretion they may think reasonable and proper in their own interests, provided they take all reasonable care not to commit a nuisance.

Is that the true construction of the Act of Parliament? or is it that they may do what they may think right in the exercise of their own discretion provided they do not commit a nuisance? Which is it? The whole case up to a certain point turns on that. An Act of Parliament might be so worded as to cast upon them no greater duty than the duty to take reasonable care. Unless the Act of Parliament is so worded as to limit their duty to that extent, I think the common law must prevail, that they must exercise their power so as not to commit a nuisance. At common law, if I am sued for a nuisance, and the nuisance is proved, it is no defence on my part to say, and to prove, that I have taken all reasonable care to prevent it.[94] The

[94] Compare Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. (1890) 122 N. Y. 18, 25 N. E. 246, 9 L. R. A. 711: (P. sued to recover damages for an alleged nuisance caused by D. in making gas from naphtha. There was no evidence of negligence on the part of D. The trial court was asked to charge: "That unless the jury should find that the works of the defendant were defective, or that they were out of repair, or that the persons in charge of manufacturing gas at these works were unskillful and incapable, their verdict should be for the defendant;" and "that if the odors which affect the plaintiff are those that are inseparable from the manufacture of gas with the most approved apparatus and with the utmost skill and care, and do not result from any defects in the works, or from want of care in their management, the defendant is not liable." This charge the court refused to give.)

Whittemore v. Baxter Laundry Co. (1914 Mich.) 148 N. W. 437, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 930, and note: (In his business of dry cleaning D. uses 15,000 gallons of gasoline annually. He is about to place on his property, and within 11 feet of P.'s dwelling, two steel tanks for the storage of gasoline. The tanks have a capacity of 10,000 gallons each. P. seeks to enjoin D. from storing gasoline in the tanks. Said Kuhn, J., delivering the opinion: "We may grant that the storage of gasoline on the premises adjacent to or adjoining the premises of another is not a private nuisance per se. It might, however, become such considering the locality, the quantity, and the surrounding circumstances, and would not necessarily depend upon the degree of care used in its storage. Heeg v. Licht, 80 N. Y. 579, 36 Am. Rep. 654, 29 Cyc. 1177. We may also concede that in the instant case every precaution that human ingenuity has conceived has been made use of in the construction of the tanks as testified to by the defendant's experts. Considering, however, the

Act of Parliament may be an answer. It was an answer in the case of London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company v. Truman, 29 Ch. D. 89, 11 App. Cas. 45, and it might be an answer here if the Act of Parliament went further than it did. I cannot find that the Act of Parliament contains any clause which warrants us in saying that no limit is set to the exercise of the discretion of the directors except the duty to take reasonable care not to create a nuisance. The only limit I can find is the limit which is set by the general law of the country that they do not commit a nuisance. Within that limit they may have what stables they like, they may have what number of horses they like, and they may conduct them how they like. * * *

dangerous character of the substance and its power as an explosive, of which in this age of its wonderful development as a power to propel automobiles, traction engines, and airships, we can well take judicial notice, and also considering human fallibility, that accidents in the operation of the most perfect mechanism will occur, and all that it needs to change what is, when properly protected, a harmless agency to a most dangerous explosive is a careless person, can it be said that to have 20,000 gallons of such an agency stored within but a few feet of one's dwelling house is not sufficient to be an unreasonable interference with the comfortable enjoyment of that home?"

West v. Bristol Tramways Co., [1908] 2 K. B. 14: (D., a tramway company which was required, by a special Act of Parliament, to pave between and on either side of its rails with wood, used for that purpose wood blocks coated with creosote. The fumes given off by this creosoted wood pavement caused damage to plants and shrubs belonging to P., a market gardener whose premises abutted on a road thus paved by D. There was another kind of wood paving, in use for several years, which D. might have used, and which, if used, would have caused no damage to P.'s plants and shrubs. The jury found "that it was not absolutely necessary for the defendants to pave the road as they did, and at the time they did; and that it was reasonably necessary for them to pave the road as they did, and at the time they did, according to the knowledge of the defendants at the time, but that in the light of the evidence given at the hearing it was not reasonably necessary." Said Lord Alverstone, C. J.: "In my opinion the proposition of law applicable to this case is correctly stated in Garrett on Nuisances (2d Ed.) p. 129; and I will read that statement as part of my judgment, as, in my opinion, the law on the subject could not be more clearly expressed. It is as follows: 'Where the owner of land uses his land for any purpose for which it may in the ordinary course of enjoyment of land be used, he will not, in the absence of negligence on his part, be liable, though damage result to his neighbour in the ordinary enjoyment by the latter of his property; for it lies with the latter to protect himself from the operation of natural laws. But, if the owner of land uses it for any purpose which from its character may be called non-natural or extraordinary user, such as, for example, the introduction on to the land of something which in the natural condition of the land is not upon it, he does so at his peril, and is liable if sensible damage results to his neighbour's land from its escape, or if the latter's legitimate enjoyment of his land is thereby materially curtailed.' If the contention of the defendant's counsel in this case is correct, this last proposition is stated much too widely; for they contend that the owner of land who has so acted has not done so at his peril, and is not liable, unless the plaintiff shews that the thing introduced on the land was, to the knowledge of the defendant, likely to escape and cause damage. The authorities do not, in my opinion, support the suggestion that this onus is cast on the party injured."

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1914. 246 Pa. 35, 91 Atl. 1049.)

The action was against the railroad company for damages to the plaintiff's land from the discharge of cinders, smoke, etc., from the defendant's locomotives. Verdict for the plaintiff with judgment for the defendant non obstante veredicto. The plaintiff appeals.

BROWN, J. In 1889 the plaintiff below leased several acres of land, in the city of Philadelphia, for the purpose of carrying on his business as a truck gardener. He raised all kinds of vegetables, some under sash for the early market. In 1904 the Pennsylvania Railroad Company established a place about 400 yards from his truck garden, for the purpose of cleaning its locomotives. These were cleaned by the use of compressed air driven through the boiler tubes. As a consequence of this process of cleaning, smoke, soot, ashes, cinders and greasy substances were blown out of the stacks of the locomotives and settled on appellant's premises, ruining his plants and vegetables and destroying his business. In this action he recovered a verdict of $5,500 for the injuries which he sustained, but defendant's motion for judgment non obstante veredicto was allowed on the ground that the testimony of the witness called by the plaintiff as an expert to show that the locomotives of the defendant could have been cleaned without any resultant injury to the plaintiff was insufficient to sustain his charge of negligence. On this appeal the narrow question is whether the court below correctly so held in denying plaintiff judgment on the verdict. * * *

In support of the judgment of the court below it is argued that the defendant cannot be held liable to the plaintiff, because it appeared that the means which it had adopted to clean the boiler tubes were those in general use by other railroad companies. In view of the testimony as to the practicability of adopting other means for cleaning the boilers by which such injuries as were sustained by the appellant may be avoided, the doctrine of general usage, contended for by counsel for appellee, is not to be applied. To apply it in the present case would mean that though the defendant could have adopted means for the prevention of injuries to others in cleaning its locomotives in its yard, it was not bound to adopt them until they had been adopted by other railroad companies. It is to be remembered that the complaint of the appellant does not grow out of the actual operation of the locomotives, but out of what resulted from preparing them for operation—on property owned by the defendant company. It had a right to use the property for that purpose, but, under the competent testimony in the case, believed by the jury, only in obedience to the rule, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas;" and not to have so used it was found by the jury to have been negligence, for the consequences of which the defendant must answer to the plaintiff. * * *

The judgment entered for the defendant is therefore reversed, and the record remitted, that plaintiff may have judgment.*

PILE et al. v. PEDRICK et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1895. 167 Pa. 296, 31 Atl. 646, 647, 46 Am. St. Rep. 677.)

Bill in equity against Pedrick and another to compel the removal of a wall. From this decree below both the plaintiffs and the defendants appeal.

WILLIAMS, J. The learned judge of the court below was right in holding that the wall in controversy was not a party wall. It was not intended to be. The defendants were building a factory and under the advice of their architect decided to build within their own lines in order to avoid the danger of injury to others from vibration which might result from the use of their machinery. They called upon the district surveyor to locate their line and built within it as so ascertained. Subsequent surveys by city surveyors have determined that the line was not accurately located at first but was about one and a half inches over on the plaintiffs. This leaves the ends of the stones used in the foundation wall projecting into the plaintiffs' land below the surface one and three-eighths inches. This unintentional intrusion into the plaintiffs' close is the narrow foundation on which this bill in equity rests.

The wall resting on the stone foundation is conceded to be within the defendants' line. The defendants offered nevertheless to make it a party wall by agreement and to give to plaintiffs free use of it, as such, on condition that the windows on the third and fourth floors should remain open until the plaintiff should desire to use the wall. This offer was declined. The trespass was then to be remedied in one of two ways. It could be treated with the plaintiffs' consent as a permanent trespass and compensated for in damages, or the defendants could be compelled to remove the offending ends of the stones to the other side of the line. The plaintiffs insisted upon the latter course, and the court below has by its decree ordered that this should be done. The defendants then sought permission to go on the plaintiffs' side of the line and chip off the projecting ends, offering to pay for all inconvenience or injury the plaintiffs or their tenants might suffer by their so doing. This they refused.[95] Nothing remained but to take down and rebuild the entire wall from the defendants' side and with their building resting on it. This the decree requires, but in view of the course of the litigation the learned judge divided the costs. * * *

[95] Compare Thompson v. Gibson (1841) 7 M. & W. 456, 56 R. R. 762: (The defendants had erected a building, on the land of S., which excluded the public from a part of the space on which a market was lawfully held. They cannot now remove the nuisance without committing a trespass on S.'s land.

It is not denied that the foundation wall on which the appellant (Pedrick) has built was located under a mistake made by the district surveyor, and does in fact project slightly into the plaintiffs' land. For one inch and three-eighths the ends of the stones in the wall are said to project beyond the division line. The defendants have no right at law or in equity to occupy land that does not belong to them and we do not see how the court below could have done otherwise than recognize and act upon this principle. They must remove their wall so that it shall be upon their land. This the court directed should be done within a reasonable time. To avoid further controversy over this subject we will so far modify the decree as to permit such removal to be made within one year from the date of filing hereof. In all other respects the decree is affirmed.[96]

BLISS v. HALL.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1838. 4 Bing. N. C. 183, 132 Reprint, 758, 44 R. R. 697.)

In an action of nuisance for carrying on the business of a tallow chandler in a messuage adjoining the messuage of the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded as follows:

That the defendant was possessed of his said messuages for a long space of time, to wit, for the space of three years next before the plaintiff became possessed of his said messuage in the declaration mentioned, and before the plaintiff occupied, inhabited, and dwelt in the same: and that before and at the time when the defendant first became and was possessed of his said messuages, the said furnaces and stoves in the introductory part of this plea mentioned had been and then were erected, set up, and placed in and upon the same: that the defendant always, to wit, from the time at which he became so possessed of his said messuages, until and at and after the plaintiff so became possessed of his said messuage as in the declaration mentioned, and thence hitherto, had used, exercised, and carried on the said trade and business of a candlemaker, and had occasioned—the phenomena described in the declaration (enumerating them as above)—in the same manner and form, and degree, and to the same extent, and at the same hours, and times, and seasons, as at the said time when, etc., in the declaration and in the introductory part of this plea mentioned; and the same during all that time, and at the said time when, etc., were and still are requisite and necessary to enable the defendant to carry on his said trade and business, in and upon his said premises, in the same manner and form, and to the same extent, as the defendant carried on the same at the time when the plaintiff came to his said premises in the declaration mentioned, near and adjoining to the premises and business of the defendant, so carried on as aforesaid: that the defendant lawfully enjoyed his said premises, manufactory, and business, before the plaintiff came to, occupied, or was possessed of his said premises in the declaration mentioned, in the same condition, extent, manner, and form, as he enjoyed and possessed the same at the said time when, etc., in the declaration mentioned, and of right ought still lawfully to enjoy the same without interruption or suit of the plaintiff; and that, the defendant was ready to verify.

Demurrer and joinder.

Hoggins, against the demurrer. Even if it be a nuisance, a party who comes to it is not entitled to complain. It was his own election to approach so near.[97]

TINDAL, C. J. In this case the declaration alleges that the defendant injuriously carried on, in messuages contiguous to the messuage of the plaintiff, the trade and business of a candlemaker, by which noxious vapours and smells proceeded from the messuage of the defendant and diffused themselves over the messuage of the plaintiff; and all that the defendant says in answer, is, that he carried on the business for three years before the plaintiff became possessed of the messuage he inhabits. That is no answer to the complaint in the declaration; for the plaintiff came to the house he occupies with all the rights which the common law affords, and one of them is, a right to wholesome air. Unless the defendant shows a prescriptive right to carry on his business in the particular place, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

VAUGHAN, J. The smells and noises of which the plaintiff complains are not hallowed by prescription, and under this plea the defendant cannot justify their continuance.

BOSANQUET, J. I am of the same opinion. The defendant has, prima facie, a right to enjoy his property in a way not injurious to his neighbour; but here on his own showing the business he carries on is offensive, and he makes out no title to persist in the annoyance.

Com. 403 (1765).

Action for a nuisance arising from the burning of bricks on the defendant's land near to the plaintiff's house. The declaration was in two counts; the only material plea to both counts was "Not Guilty." On the trial it appeared:

That some land, part of the Beulah Spa Estate, was offered for sale in lots by public auction, in accordance with certain printed particulars of sale. These were headed "Particulars of the first section of the Beulah Spa Estate, consisting of about fifty acres of Freehold Building Land, etc., in nineteen lots," and stated, among other things, that the property presented "splendid sites for the erection of first class villas;" and that "there is abundance of brick earth and gravel, which, combined with all the other advantages appertaining to this exceedingly beautiful property, present an unusually advantageous opportunity of carrying out safe and profitable building operations." The brother-in-law of the plaintiff, in the year 1857, purchased lot 11 of this property, containing about two acres, and built a residence on it. The house was finished in the year 1858, and shortly afterwards the plaintiff became the tenant of the house and property. The defendant was a solicitor in London, and in the year 1858, he bought some other lots of the same property under the same particulars and conditions, being respectively lots 1, 10, 14, and 16. It was proved that building was going on in the neighbourhood, the plaintiff's house being within ten minutes' walk of the new railway station; that, during the preceding year, bricks had been burnt at certain spots in lots 13 and 15, and at a spot adjoining to lot 15; that during the last seventeen years, bricks had from time to time been burnt at various parts of the field, of which the site of the clamp in question then formed part, such field having been divided at the time of the sale into various lots; and that bricks had previously been made on the spot where the plaintiff's house stood.

In June, 1860, the defendant, with the view of burning bricks made out of the brick earth found upon his land and thereby obtaining bricks to build upon it, erected a clamp of bricks on lot 16, at a distance of 180 yards from the plaintiff's house. It was proved that there was an annoyance to the plaintiff arising from the erection and use of the clamp as complained of in the first count sufficient prima facie to constitute a cause of action; but it was also proved that the erection and use of the clamp by the defendant as complained of was temporary only, and for the sole purpose of making bricks on his own land and from the clay found there, with a view to the erection of dwelling-houses on his own land; and that the clamp for burning the bricks was placed on that part of the defendant's land most distant from the plaintiff's house, and so as to create no further annoyance than necessarily resulted from the burning of bricks.

The question was whether, under the circumstances so proved, an action could be maintained in respect of such annoyance.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, before whom the case was tried, intimated that the case came within the principle laid down in Hole v. Barlow [1858] 4 C. B. N. S. 334, and directed the jury, upon the authority of that case, that if they thought that the spot was convenient and proper, and the burning of the bricks was, under the circumstances, a reasonable use by the defendant of his own land, the defendant would be entitled to a verdict upon the first count, independent of the small matter of whether there was an interference with the plaintiff's comfort thereby. Upon this ruling a verdict was by arrangement entered for the defendant on the first count, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to set it aside, if the Court should be of opinion that the above ruling of the Lord Chief Justice was erroneous.[1]

In the following Michaelmas Term, Petersdorff, Sergt., moved for a rule calling upon the defendant to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff on the first count for 40s. damages.

PER CURIAM (COCKBURN, C. J., and WIGHTMAN, HILL, and BLACKBURN, JJ.). Rule refused with leave to appeal.

In the Exchequer Chamber.

The plaintiff having appealed against the above decision, a case setting forth the facts was stated, and concluded as follows:

"If the court should be of opinion that, upon the facts as stated, the ruling of the Lord Chief Justice, founded upon the decision of Hole v. Barlow, was erroneous, the verdict found for the defendant on the first count is to be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiff instead thereof with 40s. damages.

"If the court should be of a contrary opinion, the verdict entered for the defendant upon the first count is to stand."

The case was argued, in Easter Vacation, before Erle, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Williams and Keating, JJ., and Bramwell and Wilde, BB.

WILLIAMS, J., delivered the judgment of ERLE, C. J., KEATING, J., WILDE, B., and himself:

On the argument of this case, there was some contest as to what the true question was which the court had to consider. On the part of the plaintiff it was said to have been proved at the trial, beyond dispute, that the burning of the bricks in the kilns of the defendant was a nuisance, and that the point reserved was, whether it was legalized by the other facts which the jury must be taken to have found to exist. On the part of the defendant it was said that the true point was, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the burning of the bricks amounted to an actionable nuisance.

It is not, perhaps, material which of these contentions is correct. For the Lord Chief Justice, at the trial, directed the jury, on the authority of Hole v. Barlow, 4 C. B. N. S. 334, to find for the defendant, notwithstanding his burning the bricks had interfered with the plaintiff's comfort, if they were of opinion that the spot where the bricks were burnt was a proper and convenient spot, and the burning of them was, under the circumstances, a reasonable use by the defendant of his own land. The jury, consequently, if they were of that opinion, would have been bound to find their verdict for the defendant, notwithstanding they were also of opinion that the brick-kilns of the defendant, by immitting corrupted air upon the plaintiff's house, had rendered it unfit for healthy or comfortable occupation.

[1] The statement of the case is abridged. Upon the second count, a verdict was by arrangement entered for the plaintiff, with 1s. damages, but no question arose on that count. Part of the opinion of Bramwell, B., and the dissenting opinion of Pollock, C. B., are omitted.

It was therefore treated as a doctrine of law that, if the spot should be found by the jury to be proper or convenient, and the burning of the bricks a reasonable use of the land, these circumstances would constitute a bar to the action; and if there is, in truth, no such doctrine, there was a misdirection: it is the same thing as if there had been a plea averring the existence of these circumstances, and a demurrer to the plea. Such a plea, though it would admit all the allegations of the declaration, would be a good plea by way of avoidance, if the direction of the Chief Justice was right. And it is not material to inquire whether it would be good as averring facts which amount to a legalization of the nuisance stated in the declaration, or as superadding facts which, taken together with those stated in the declaration, show that the alleged annoyance was not an actionable nuisance. In either point of view the question for our consideration appears to be, whether the case of Hole v. Barlow, 4 C. B. N. S. 334, was well decided. And we are of opinion that it was not.

That decision was plainly founded on a passage in Comyns' Digest, Action upon the Case for a Nuisance (C), which is in the following words: "So an action does not lie for a reasonable use of my right, though it be to the annoyance of another; as, if a butcher, brewer, &c., use his trade in a convenient place, though it be to the annoyance of his neighbour." It may be observed that, in the language of this dictum (for which no authority is cited by Comyns), there is a want of precision, especially in the words "reasonable" and "convenient," which renders its meaning by no means clear. And it may be doubted whether the court, in Hole v. Barlow, did not misunderstand it. What is a "convenient place"? Does this expression mean, as the court understood it in that case, that the place is proper and convenient for the purpose of carrying on the trade, or does it mean that it is a place where a nuisance will not be caused to another? It has been pointed out by Mr. W. H. Willes, in his valuable edition of Gale on Easements, p. 410, note, that this latter sense of the word "convenient" is the one adopted by Hide, C. J., in Jones v. Powell, Palm. 536, 539, s. c. Hutt. 135, where he says, "A tan-house is necessary, for all men wear shoes, and nevertheless it may be pulled down if it be erected to the nuisance of another: in like manner of a glass-house; and they ought to be erected in places convenient for them." In the original Norman-French it is "Un tan house est necessary, car touts wear shoes; et uncore ceo poit estre pull down, etc., si est erect al nusance d'auter: et issint de glass house; Et pur ceux doient estre erect in places convenient pur eux." The term appears to be used in the same sense when applied to questions as to public nuisances. Thus it is said in Hawkins, P. C., book 1, c. 75 (2 Hawk. P. C., by Leach, p. 146, § 10), "It seems to be agreed, that a brew house, erected in such an inconvenient place wherein the business cannot be carried on without greatly incommoding the neighbourhood, may be indicted as a common nuisance." It should seem, therefore, that just as the use of an offensive trade will be indictable as a public nuisance if it be carried on in an inconvenient place, i. e., a place where it greatly incommodes a multitude of persons, so it will be actionable as a private nuisance if it be carried on in an inconvenient place, i. e., a place where it greatly incommodes an individual.

If this be the true construction of the expression "convenient" in the passage from Comyns' Digest, the doctrine contained in it amounts to no more than what has long been settled law, viz., that a man may, without being liable to an action, exercise a lawful trade, as that of a butcher or brewer and the like, notwithstanding it be carried on so near the house of another as to be an annoyance to him, in rendering his residence there less delectable or agreeable, provided the trade be so conducted that it does not cause what amounts, in point of law, to a nuisance to the neighbouring house.

In Hole v. Barlow, 4 C. B. N. S. 334, however, the court appear to have read the passage as containing a doctrine that a place may be "proper and convenient" for the carrying on of a trade, notwithstanding it is a place where the trade cannot be carried on without causing a nuisance to a neighbour. This is a doctrine which has certainly never been judicially adopted in any case before that of Hole v. Barlow, and moreover the adoption of it would be inconsistent with the judgments pronounced in some of the cases cited at the bar during the argument, and more especially with the case of Walter v. Selfe, 4 De Gex & Sm. 315. And the introduction of such a doctrine into our law would we think lead to great inconvenience and hardship, because, as was forcibly urged by Mr. Mellish in arguing for the plaintiff, if the doctrine is to be maintained at all, it must be maintained to the extent that, however ruinous may be the amount of nuisance caused to a neighbour's property by carrying on an offensive trade, he is without redress if a jury shall deem it right to find that the place where the trade is carried on is a proper and convenient place for the purpose.

It should be observed that the direction of the judge to the jury in Hole v. Barlow, which was upheld by the Court of Common Pleas, was simply that the verdict ought to be for the defendant if the place where the bricks were burnt was a convenient and proper place for the purpose. But in the present case, the Lord Chief Justice's direction to the jury pointed at a further condition, viz., if the burning of the bricks was under the circumstances a reasonable use by the defendant of his own land. It remains, therefore, to consider whether the doctrine adopted in Hole v. Barlow, if accompanied with this addition, is maintainable.

If it be good law, that the fitness of the locality prevents the carrying on of an offensive trade from being an actionable nuisance, it appears necessary to follow that this must be a reasonable use of the land. But if it is not good law, and if the true doctrine is, that whenever, taking all the circumstances into consideration, including the nature and extent of the plaintiff's enjoyment before the acts complained of, the annoyance is sufficiently great to amount to a nuisance according to the ordinary rule of law, an action will lie, whatever the locality may be, then surely the jury cannot properly be asked whether the causing of the nuisance was a reasonable use of the land.

If such a question is proper for their consideration in an action such as the present, for a nuisance by inmitting corrupted air into the plaintiff's house, we can see no reason why a similar question should not be submitted to the jury in actions for other violations of the ordinary rights of property; e. g. the transmission by a neighbour of water in a polluted condition. But certainly it would be difficult to maintain, as the law now stands, that the jury, in such an action, ought to be told to find for the defendant if they thought that the manufactory which caused the impurity of the water was built on a proper and convenient spot, and that the working of it was a reasonable use by the defendant of his own land. Again, where an easement has been gained in addition to the ordinary rights of property, e. g. where a right has been gained to the lateral passage of light and air, no one has ever suggested that the jury might be told, in an action for obstructing the free passage of the light and air, to find for the defendant if they were of opinion that the building which caused the obstruction was erected in a proper and convenient place, and in the reasonable enjoyment by the defendant of his own land. And yet, on principle, it is difficult to see why such a question should not be left to the jury if Hole v. Barlow was well decided.

We are, however, of opinion that the decision in that case was wrong, and, consequently, that the direction of the Lord Chief Justice which was founded on it, was erroneous, that the verdict for the defendant ought to be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiff.

Bramwell, B. * * * The question seems to me to be, Is this a justification in law,—and, in order not to make a verbal mistake, I will say,—a justification for what is done, or a matter which makes what is done no nuisance? It is to be borne in mind, however, that, in fact, the act of the defendant is a nuisance such that it would be actionable if done wantonly or maliciously. The plaintiff, then, has a prima facie case. The defendant has infringed the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. Then, what principle or rule of law can he rely on to defend himself? It is clear to my mind that there is some exception to the general application of the maxim mentioned. The instances put during the argument, of burning weeds, emptying cesspools, making noises during repairs, and other instances which would be nuisances if done wantonly or maliciously, nevertheless may be lawfully done. It cannot be said that such acts are not nuisances, because, by the hypothesis, they are; and it cannot be doubted that, if a person maliciously and without cause made close to a dwelling-house the same offensive smells as may be made in emptying a cesspool, an action would lie. Nor can these cases be got rid of as extreme cases, because such cases properly test a principle. Nor can it be said that the jury settle such questions by finding there is no nuisance, though there is. For that is to suppose they violate their duty, and that, if they discharged their duty, such matters would be actionable, which I think they could not and ought not to be. There must be, then, some principle on which such cases must be excepted. It seems to me that that principle may be deduced from the character of these cases, and is this, viz., that those acts necessary for the common and ordinary use and occupation of land and houses may be done, if conveniently done, without subjecting those who do them to an action. This principle would comprehend all the cases I have mentioned, but would not comprehend the present, where what has been done was not the using of land in a common and ordinary way, but in an exceptional manner—not unnatural nor unusual, but not the common and ordinary use of land. There is an obvious necessity for such a principle as I have mentioned. It is as much for the advantage of one owner as of another; for the very nuisance the one complains of, as the result of the ordinary use of his neighbour's land, he himself will create in the ordinary use of his own, and the reciprocal nuisances are of a comparatively trifling character. The convenience of such a rule may be indicated by calling it a rule of give and take, live and let live.[2]

ST. HELEN'S SMELTING CO. v. TIPPING.

This was an action to recover damages for injuries done to the plaintiff's trees and crops, by the defendants' works. The defendants are the directors and shareholders of the St. Helen's Copper Smelting Company (Limited). The plaintiff, in 1860, purchased a large portion of the Bold Hall estate, consisting of the manor house and about 1300 acres of land, within a short distance of which stood the works of the defendants. The declaration alleged that:

"The defendants erected, used, and continued to use, certain smelting works upon land near to the said dwelling house and lands of the plaintiff, and caused large quantities of noxious gases, vapours, and other noxious matter, to issue from the said works, and diffuse themselves over the land and premises of the plaintiff, whereby the hedges, trees, shrubs, fruit, and herbage, were greatly injured; the cattle were rendered unhealthy, and the plaintiff was prevented from having so beneficial a use of the said land and premises as he would otherwise have enjoyed, and also the reversionary lands and premises were depreciated in value."

But the same considerations do not apply to a non natural or extraordinary user of land." Per Farwell, L. J., in West v. Bristol Tramways Company [1908] 2 K. B. 14, 23.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD WESTBURY). * * * My Lords, I think your Lordships will be satisfied with the answer we have received from the learned judges to the questions put by this House.[3]

My Lords, in matters of this description it appears to me that it is a very desirable thing to mark the difference between an action brought for a nuisance upon the ground that the alleged nuisance produces material injury to the property, and an action brought for a nuisance on the ground that the thing alleged to be a nuisance is productive of sensible personal discomfort. With regard to the latter,

[3] The history of the case to this point was as follows: The cause, under a plea of Not Guilty, was tried before Mr. Justice Mellor, at Liverpool in August, 1863. The defendants offered evidence to show that the whole neighborhood was studded with manufactories and tall chimneys, that there were some alkali works close by the defendants' works, that the smoke from one was quite as injurious as the smoke from the other, that the smoke of both sometimes united, and that it was impossible to say to which of the two any particular injury was attributable. The fact that the defendants' works existed before the plaintiff bought the property was also relied on.

The defendants' counsel submitted that the three questions which ought to be left to the jury were, "whether it was a necessary trade, whether the place was a suitable place for such a trade, and whether it was carried on in a reasonable manner." The learned judge did not put the questions in this form, but did ask the jury whether the enjoyment of the plaintiff's property was sensibly diminished, and the answer was in the affirmative. Whether the business there carried on was an ordinary business for smelting copper, and the answer was, "We consider it an ordinary business, and conducted in a proper manner, in as good a manner as possible." But to the question whether the jurors thought that it was carried on in a proper place, the answer was, "We do not." The verdict was therefore entered for the plaintiff. A motion was made for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, but the rule was refused. 4 Best & S. 608. Leave was however given to appeal, and the case was carried to the Exchequer Chamber, where the judgment was affirmed; Lord Chief Baron Pollock there observing: "My opinion has not always been that which it is now. Acting upon what has been decided in this court, my Brother Mellor's direction is not open to a bill of exception." 4 Best & S. 616. This appeal was then brought.

The judges were summoned, and Mr. Baron Martin, Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Justice Blackburn, Mr. Justice Keating, Mr. Baron Pigott, and Mr. Justice Shee, attended. For the appellants, who were the defendants in the court below, there was an argument by the Attorney General (Sir R. Palmer) and Mr. Webster, to the effect that the dissent in Bamford v. Turnley, in the Exchequer Chamber, from the doctrine of Hole v. Barlow, was not warranted by principle or authority. "Our material question," said the counsel for the appellants, "is the convenience or fitness of the place where the business is carried on."

These two questions were thereupon proposed by the Lord Chancellor to the judges: "Whether directions given by the learned judge at Nisi Prius to the jury were correct? or, Whether a new trial ought to be granted in this case?"

Mr. Baron Martin. My Lords, in answer to the questions proposed by your Lordships to the judges, I have to state their unanimous opinion that the directions given by the learned judge to the jury were correct, and that a new trial ought not to be granted. As far as the experience of all of us goes, the directions are such as we have given in these cases for the last twenty years.

namely, the personal inconvenience and interference with one's enjoyment, one's quiet, one's personal freedom, anything that discomposes or injuriously affects the senses or the nerves, whether that may or may not be denominated a nuisance, must undoubtedly depend greatly on the circumstances of the place where the thing complained of actually occurs. If a man lives in a town, it is necessary that he should subject himself to the consequences of those operations of trade which may be carried on in his immediate locality, which are actually necessary for trade and commerce, and also for the enjoyment of property, and for the benefit of the inhabitants of the town and of the public at large. If a man lives in a street where there are numerous shops, and a shop is opened next door to him, which is carried on in a fair and reasonable way, he has no ground for complaint, because to himself individually there may arise much discomfort from the trade carried on in that shop. But when an occupation is carried on by one person in the neighbourhood of another, and the result of that trade, or occupation, or business, is a material injury to property, then there unquestionably arises a very different consideration. I think, my Lords, that in a case of that description, the submission which is required from persons living in society to that amount of discomfort which may be necessary for the legitimate and free exercise of the trade of their neighbours, would not apply to circumstances the immediate result of which is sensible injury to the value of the property.

Now, in the present case, it appears that the plaintiff purchased a very valuable estate, which lies within a mile and a half from certain large smelting works. What the occupation of these copper smelting premises was anterior to the year 1860 does not clearly appear. The plaintiff became the proprietor of an estate of great value in the month of June 1860. In the month of September 1860 very extensive smelting operations began on the property of the present appellants, in their works at St. Helen's. Of the effect of the vapours exhaling from those works upon the plaintiff's property, and the injury done to his trees and shrubs, there is abundance of evidence in the case.

My Lords, the action has been brought upon that, and the jurors have found the existence of the injury; and the only ground upon which your Lordships are asked to set aside that verdict, and to direct a new trial, is this, that the whole neighbourhood where these copper smelting works were carried on, is a neighbourhood more or less devoted to manufacturing purposes of a similar kind, and therefore it is said, that inasmuch as this copper smelting is carried on in what the appellant contends is a fit place, it may be carried on with impunity, although the result may be the utter destruction, or the very considerable diminution, of the value of the plaintiff's property. My Lords, I apprehend that that is not the meaning of the word "suitable," or the meaning of the word "convenient," which has been used as applicable to the subject. The word "suitable" unquestionably cannot carry with it this consequence, that a trade may be carried on in a particular locality, the consequence of which trade may be injury and destruction to the neighbouring property. Of course, my Lords, I except cases where any prescriptive right has been acquired by a lengthened user of the place.

On these grounds, therefore, shortly, without dilating farther upon them (and they are sufficiently unfolded by the judgment of the learned judges in the court below), I advise your Lordships to affirm the decision of the Court below, and to refuse the new trial, and to dismiss the appeal with costs.[4]

Judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, affirmed; and appeal dismissed with costs.

RUSHMER v. POLSUE & ALFIERI, Limited.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1906] 1 Ch. 234.)

POLSUE & ALFIERI, Limited, v. RUSHMER.

(In the House of Lords. [1907] A. C. 121.)

Appeal from the judgment of Warrington, J., granting a perpetual injunction to restrain a nuisance arising from noise. The facts of the case, as shown by the evidence, were as follows:

For the last seventeen or eighteen years the plaintiff had been, and he still was, the occupier, and was also the present lessee, of a house, No. 8 Gough Square, Fleet Street, in the City of London, in which he was residing with his family. In a shop on the ground floor he carried on the business of a dairyman.

Gough Square was a small oblong space situate in a district bounded on the east by Shoe Lane, on the south by Fleet Street, on the west by Fetter Lane, and on the north by Holborn. It was a district specially devoted to the printing and allied trades. There was no thoroughfare for wheeled traffic in Gough Square, the only access for such traffic being under an archway in the north-west corner. The plaintiff's house, No. 8, was in the north-east corner. For a house in the heart of the City of London the plaintiff's was, it appeared, in a quiet situation, except for such noises as inevitably arose from neighbouring business establishments. No. 7, Gough Square, the house adjoining the plaintiff's house on the west side, had for some time been occupied by persons maintaining and working machinery, but it appeared from the evidence that although in the day time the plaintiff must have been subjected to noise from that source, yet no noisy machinery had been worked at night in that house. Nearly opposite to the plaintiff's house was a large printing establishment, Messrs. Pardon's, in which work on certain days of the week proceeded at night, and some distance further away were the printing works of the Daily Telegraph newspaper, which were run regularly at night. The evidence, however, shewed that no disturbance at night was caused by noise arising from either of those sources.

The defendants, Polsue & Alfieri, Limited, were a company carrying on business as printers and publishers at Nos. 4 and 5, Gough Square, and at No. 10, Wine Office Court, which latter house immediately adjoined the plaintiff's house, being separated therefrom only by a party-wall. No. 10, Wine Office Court, was taken by the defendants in 1904. A printing business had been previously carried on there, though without causing the plaintiff any nuisance from noise; but in September of that year the defendants set up in that house and began to work certain machinery, including a cutter on the ground floor and a printing machine in the basement. The noise of which the plaintiff complained mainly arose from this printing machine, the evidence shewing that no real nuisance arose from the cutter. The printing machine was of an improved type, quieter, it was said, than most machines of the kind, and was properly fixed upon a concrete bed. It was driven by an electric motor, and was usually run at a speed throwing off 1,440 impressions per hour; but under exceptional circumstances it might be, and in fact had been, run at a rate of 1,560 impressions. It had always been carefully and properly worked. When first set up it was driven through the medium of a shafting fixed to the ceiling of the room; but after a complaint by the plaintiff this was altered and the machine was driven by a belt passing directly to it from the motor. In October, 1904, the plaintiff again complained, and on October 21 caused a formal letter of complaint to be written by his solicitor. To this no reply was made, and on November 1 the plaintiff issued the writ in this action against the defendants for an injunction to restrain them from so working their machinery and carrying on their printing works at No. 10, Wine Office Court, as, by reason of noise or otherwise, to cause a nuisance or annoyance to the plaintiff as lessee and occupier of the house No. 8, Gough Square, or to his family, or to the persons inhabiting or resorting to that house. Notice of motion for an injunction was given, but the motion was never heard, the action being by arrangement at once set down for a speedy trial.

In their defence to the plaintiff's statement of claim, the defendants denied that their printing machine was being so worked as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiff, and they insisted that, as his premises were situated in the heart of a district almost entirely devoted to the printing and allied trades, he was not entitled to an injunction. At the trial oral evidence was given on both sides by several engineering experts as to the general nature and effect of the noises arising from printing and other machines in the neighbourhood. As to the noise caused by the defendants' machine and to the alleged nuisance arising therefrom to the plaintiff and his family, particularly at night, evidence was given by several persons, including, in addition to the plaintiff, his two daughters and his son. At the conclusion of the trial, before Warrington, J., which occupied five days of the Michaelmas Sittings, 1904, his Lordship reserved judgment. On January 12, 1905, he delivered his judgment, in which he commenced with the following statement of the legal principles which, in his opinion, were applicable to the case:

"The question I have to answer is whether the defendants, by working the machine in question, seriously interfere with the comfort, physically, of the plaintiff and his family in the occupation of his house according to the ordinary notions prevalent among reasonable English men and women: Walter v. Selfe (1851) 4 De G. & Sm. 315, 322; and for the purpose of answering this question I am not to look at the defendants' operations in the abstract and by themselves, but in connection with all the circumstances of the locality, and in particular in reference to the nature of the trades usually carried on there, and the noises and disturbance existing prior to the commencement of the defendants' operations: Sturges v. Bridgman, 11 Ch. D. 852, 865; St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. C. 642. But if, after taking these circumstances into consideration, I find a serious and not merely a slight additional interference with the plaintiff's comfort as above defined, I think it is the duty of the Court to interfere: Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 409. This seems to me to be the true result of the authorities."

His Lordship then proceeded to deal with the evidence, and stated the three following definite findings of fact:

First, that although in the day time the plaintiff must have been subject to some noise from printing works in the immediate neighbourhood, no disturbance at night had been caused by noise arising from any of these sources. Secondly, that as regarded the ordinary working hours in the day time, the plaintiff had not proved such a substantial addition to pre-existing noises as would amount to a legal nuisance. And, thirdly, that the night working of the defendants' machine caused a serious disturbance to the plaintiff and his family such as had not previously been experienced by them.

His Lordship held this to be a legal nuisance entitling the plaintiff to an injunction. Accordingly he granted a perpetual injunction restraining the defendants, their workmen, servants and agents from so working their machinery, and so carrying on their printing works, at No. 10, Wine Office Court, as by reason of noise to cause a nuisance to the plaintiff as lessee and occupier of the adjoining house, No. 8, Gough Square, or to his family, or to the persons inhabiting or resorting to such house.

The defendants appealed.[5]

In the Court of Appeal.

Cozens-Hardy, L. J. This is an appeal from the judgment of Warrington, J., who has granted an injunction restraining the defendants from so working a printing machine as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiff. The plaintiff has for seventeen years been residing with his family at No. 8, Gough Square, Fleet Street. In the lower part of the house he carries on a milk business. The defendants' machine is next door to the plaintiff's house. The plaintiff's house is situate in a district specially devoted to the printing and allied trades, most of which are noisy, though not all equally noisy. The district is one in which it is not reasonable to expect the same quiet and freedom from noise as might be looked for in more purely residential neighbourhoods. Warrington, J., has stated the legal principles which it was his duty to apply as follows. (His Lordship then read from the learned judge's judgment the passage above quoted and proceeded:) In my opinion that is a statement of the law which is not only accurate, but adequate. He then proceeds to deal with the evidence. He does not leave us to infer the conclusions at which he has arrived, for he states certain definite findings of fact. (His Lordship then read the three findings above stated, and proceeded:) In my opinion, it is not right for the Court of Appeal in a case like this to overrule the decision on issues of fact of a judge who has seen and heard the witnesses; and, this being so, I think the appeal must fail. I cannot doubt that the learned judge did apply the legal principles he himself enunciated, and I do not think we ought to embark upon the consideration of the question whether his mind may not have been influenced by some other legal view than that expressed by him. But some arguments were raised by counsel for the appellants and for the respondent to which I desire shortly to refer. It was strenuously contended by Mr. Duke that a person living in a district specially devoted to a particular trade cannot complain of any nuisance by noise caused by the carrying on of any branch of that trade without carelessness and in a reasonable manner.[6] I cannot assent to this argument. A resident in such a [6] In his argument for the defendant, Duke, K. C., cited the following cases in support of his contention: St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping (1865) 11 H. L. C. 642; Gaunt v. Fynney (1872) L. R. 8 Ch. 8, 10, 13; Sturges v. Bridgman (1879) 11 Ch. D. 852, 865; Christie v. Davey, [1893] 1 Ch. 316; Saunders-Clark v. Grosvenor Mansions Co., [1900] 2 Ch. 373; Attorney General v. Cole & Son, [1901] 1 Ch. 205; Bamford v. Turnley (1860) 3 B. & S. 62. The following cases were distinguished from the case at bar: Crump v. Lambert (1867) L. R. 3 Eq. 409, 414; Heather v. Pardon (1877) 37 L. T. 393; Bartlett v. Marshall, [1895] 44 W. R. 251; Crossley & Sons v. Lightowler (1867) L. R. 2 Ch. 478, 481.

On the local standard of comfort as a test in Nuisance, see also 21 Halsbury's Laws of England, 531, 532 (1912); 29 Cyc. 1157, 1159, and especially notes 33, 47, 48, 49; and the annotations to Rushmer v. Polsue (1906) in 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 373, 377.

Compare Gilbert v. Showerman (1871) 23 Mich. 448: (P., the owner of a four-story business building in Detroit, in a part of that city which was chiefly given over to business, occupied the upper part of his building as his dwelling. D. used his adjoining four-story building as a steam-flouring mill. P. sought to enjoin D. from operating his mill, claiming a nuisance. Said Corley, J., in dismissing the bill: "The complainant, having taken up his residence in a portion of the city mainly appropriated to business purposes, cannot complain of any new business near him, provided such new business is not in itself objectionable as compared with those already established, and is carried on in a proper manner.")

Eller v. Koehler (1903) 68 Ohio St. 51, 67 N. E. 89: (P. sued to recover damages for alleged injuries to her health and her property resulting from the noise and vibrations occasioned by D.'s drop-hammers, in use on his adjoining lot. D. averred that his "said manufacturing plant is situate in a part of the city which is and has been devoted to like business purposes, and was so at the time said plant was constructed." This was not denied by P.

neighbourhood must put up with a certain amount of noise. The standard of comfort differs according to the situation of the property and the class of people who inhabit it. This idea is expressed by Thesiger, L. J., in Sturges v. Bridgman, 11 Ch. D. 852, when he said that what might be a nuisance in Belgrave Square would not be a nuisance in Bermondsey. But whatever the standard of comfort in a particular district may be, I think the addition of a fresh noise caused by the defendant's works may be so substantial as to create a legal nuisance. It does not follow that because I live, say, in the manufacturing part of Sheffield I cannot complain if a steam hammer is introduced next door, and so worked as to render sleep at night almost impossible, although previously to its introduction my house was a reasonably comfortable abode, having regard to the local standard; and it would be no answer to say that the steam hammer is of the most modern approved pattern and is reasonably worked. In short, if a substantial addition is found as a fact in any particular case, it is no answer to say that the neighbourhood is noisy, and that the defendant's machinery is of first-class character.[7]

It was, on the other hand, urged by Mr. Terrell that any kind of noise occasioning discomfort is actionable unless the defendant can prove a prescriptive right to create a noise. I do not think this argument can be supported, and I see no ground for supposing that Warrington, J., was influenced by it. The lower standard of comfort

The court was asked by D. to charge the jury thus: "In determining the question whether the plaintiff has suffered actual, substantial, and material injuries, you may consider the locality of her property and that of the defendant, the nature of the business that is being conducted by the defendant, the character of the machinery that he is using, the manner of using the property producing the alleged injuries; and you may also consider the kinds of business, if any, which are being conducted and carried on in the vicinity of these properties. * * * If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff's property is situated in a populous city, and in the vicinity of other shops of the same, or substantially the same, character and kind, then you may consider this fact in determining whether the plaintiff has suffered injuries of the kind named. A party dwelling in a populous city, and in the vicinity of shops and factories, cannot have the same quiet and freedom from annoyances that he would have in the country or in other districts. If these annoyances, should you find them to be such, are either trifling in their nature, or are such as under the particular circumstances of this case do not cause real, substantial, and material injuries, then, so finding, the plaintiff could not recover." The court refused to so instruct. There was a judgment for plaintiff. The refusal of this instruction was held reversible error.)

existing, say, in Whitechapel would equally exist in one of the numerous districts which have sprung up in late years on the outskirts of the City, and which are occupied by persons of the same class as those who occupy the older houses in Whitechapel. In short, prescription has nothing to do with the case.

In the result I accept Warrington, J.'s findings of fact, and his enunciation of the legal principles applicable to the case, and I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

The Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L. JJ.) having affirmed the decision of Warrington, J., the defendants appealed.

In the House of Lords.

LORD LOREBURN, L. C. My Lords, this appeal has been presented to your Lordships with great fairness and propriety; but to my mind it is a hopeless appeal. There is no question of law that I can see in the case. Warrington, J., laid down the law quite soundly; nor is it disputed that he did so.

The law of nuisance undoubtedly is elastic, as was stated by Lord Halsbury in the case of Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, [1904] A. C. 179, at p. 185. He said: "What may be called the uncertainty of the test may also be described as its elasticity. A dweller in towns cannot expect to have as pure air, as free from smoke, smell, and noise as if he lived in the country, and distant from other dwellings, and yet an excess of smoke, smell, and noise may give a cause of action, but in each of such cases it becomes a question of degree, and the question is in each case whether it amounts to a nuisance which will give a right of action." This is a question of fact.

It is said, indeed, by the learned counsel for the appellants that Warrington, J., did not carry out his law in the way in which he approached the facts. I cannot see that it is so. There was evidence sufficient to shew that, taking into consideration the character of the locality and the noises there prevailing, yet a serious addition had been caused by the defendants. In my opinion that was quite sufficient to warrant the conclusion arrived at by the learned judge and the Court of Appeal.

I agree with Cozens-Hardy, L. J., when he says: "It does not follow that because I live, say, in the manufacturing part of Sheffield I cannot complain if a steam hammer is introduced next door, and so worked as to render sleep at night almost impossible, although previously to its introduction my house was a reasonably comfortable abode, having regard to the local standard; and it would be no answer to say that the steam hammer is of the most modern approved pattern and is reasonably worked."

My Lords, I think that this appeal wholly fails and that it ought to be dismissed with costs.

PIERSON v. GLEAN.

(Supreme Court of Judicature of New Jersey, 1833. 2 Green [14 N. J. Law] 36, 25 Am. Dec. 497.)

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was lawfully seized and possessed, on the first day of April, 1831, of certain lands, through which a stream of water had always been accustomed to flow; that the defendant on the said first day of April, 1831, and from that time continually afterwards, maintained a mill dam across the said stream and thereby caused the waters of the said stream to overflow and drown the plaintiff's land.

To this declaration the defendant put in three pleas—1st, the general issue. 2dly, protesting that he never erected or unlawfully maintained the dam, the defendant says that prior to the 26th of July, 1830, he had no title or possession; that on that day he became seized and possessed of the said dam; since which neither the plaintiff or any other person, for him or in his behalf, ever requested the defendant to reform or remove the said dam; and concludes with a verification, 3dly, that the mill-dam was erected, kept up and maintained before the 26th July, 1830, previous to which day the defendant had no title, possession or interest in the said dam—that on that day the defendant became seized and possessed in fee, and has never since been requested, etc.

To the second and third pleas there is a general demurrer and joinder.

HORNBLOWER, C. J. * * * The only question presented to the court upon the pleadings in this case, is, whether an action for continuing a nuisance, will lie against him, who did not erect it, before any request made to him to remove or abate the injury.

The plaintiff's declaration is not for erecting, but for maintaining and keeping up the dam.

The defendant says, the dam was erected before he became seized or possessed of the premises, and that the plaintiff did not at any time before the commencement of the action, request him to reform or remove the injury complained of. This allegation is fully admitted by the general demurrer.

The law as settled in Penruddock's Case, 5 Co. 101, has never, I believe, been seriously questioned since. In that case it was resolved, that though the continuance of a nuisance by the feofee was a new wrong, yet a quod permittat would not lie against him, without a request made, etc. Ld. Ch. Just. Willes, in Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes Rep. 583, speaking of the distinction between the beginning and the continuance of a nuisance, by building a house that hangs over or damages another, refers to Penruddock's case; says the law is certainly so, and the reason obvious. Mr. Chitty, in his treatise on Pleading, vol. 1, p. 376, says it is necessary to state a request in declaration, for continuing a nuisance erected by another. See 2 Chit. on Pl. 334, note c. In the case of Salmon v. Bensley, Ryan and Moody, 195, 21 Engl. Com. L. R. 414, 2 Saund. on Evid. and Plead. 690, the same doctrine is admitted by Abbott, Ld. Ch. Just., though he held that a person who takes premises upon which a nuisance exists, and continues it, takes them subject to all the restrictions imposed upon his predecessors, by the receipt of such a notice, as had in that case been served upon the preceding occupant.

As well then upon the good sense and common justice of the case, as upon the ground of venerable and unquestioned authorities, I am of opinion, that the demurrer ought to be overruled.

Judgment for defendant on demurrer.[8]

BONNER v. WELBORN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, 1849. 7 Ga. 296.)

In 1843 Alfred Welborn erected a mill-dam on his own land, adjoining the property known as the Meriwether Warm Springs, then the property of Seymour R. Bonner. In 1845, Seymour R. Bonner sold and conveyed this property to the plaintiff in error, Robert Bonner.

In 1847, Robert Bonner brought an action against Alfred Welborn, alleging that he had been damaged $20,000, because the defendant on November 1, 1843, and on divers other days and times between that date and the commencement of this suit had erected a mill-dam within 400 yards of certain medicinal springs and a hotel of which the plaintiff was possessed and thus had caused the water to stagnate and plaintiff's premises to become unhealthy, with the result that plaintiff's hotel business fell off. At the trial, no request by the plaintiff to the defendant to abate the nuisance was proven.

The court charged the jury, that the erection of the mill-pond by the defendant, on his own land, being a lawful act, it was necessary that the plaintiff should request the defendant to abate it, or give notice to that effect, before he could maintain this action; and the mill-dam, as shown by the proof, having been erected before the plaintiff purchased the land, or went into possession of the springs, he could not maintain this action for its erection or continuance, until he had requested the defendant to take it down.

NISBET, J. * * * The circuit judge ruled, that the defendant was not liable in this case, but upon request, or notice to abate the nuisance. That decision is also excepted to, and is the only other question made. The plaintiff is the grantee of the property, holding title of Seymour Bonner, who was the owner at the time the mill-dam was built. The defendant, Welborn, erected the mill-dam, and is still the owner. The mill-pond did not prove a nuisance, until after the plaintiff bought and went into possession of the springs. At this bar, it is insisted, that an action for damages does not lie in favor of him who is the feofee or assignee of the owner, at the time the nuisance was erected, against him who erected it, without request. This proposition, I do not think, is sustainable, either upon principle or authority.

A private nuisance, is anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another. 3 Black. 170. If, for example a person keeps his hogs or other noisome animals so near the house of another, that the stench of them incommodes him, and makes the air unwholesome, this is an injurious nuisance, as it tends to deprive him of the use and benefit of his house. 9 Coke, 58; 1 Burrow, 337; 3 Black. Com. 217. If one does any other act, in itself lawful, which yet being done in that place, necessarily tends to the damage of another's property, it is also a nuisance. So closely, says Blackstone, does the law of England enforce that excellent rule of gospel morality, of "doing to others, as we would that they should do unto ourselves." Let this suffice to show what a nuisance is, and that the act complained of in this instance is a nuisance. The obligation of each citizen is, to use his own property in such a way as not to do hurt or damage to the property of another. If he does not, he creates a nuisance, and is liable to respond in damages; and this, although the use to which he applies his property is, in itself, lawful. The condition upon which he uses his property is, that no one shall be injured thereby. The rule is of universal application; no one is exempt from its operation; nor does the obligation depend upon the time when, or the manner in which, he becomes owner. Eo instanti in which the use of his property becomes injurious to another, it is a nuisance, and he is liable in damages. This liability depends upon no other fact or circumstance—if the nuisance exists, if the damage is proven, the law, without more, attaches to him the liability. The law devolves upon him the burden of seeing to it, that in the use of his property, he does no injury to his neighbor. There is, therefore, no condition precedent to the recovery of the person injured in his property, or the use of it. The conclusion from these principles, is irresistible, that he who does hurt or damage to another, in the use of his own property, is liable, without notice or request. * * * [9]

MURTHA v. LOVEWELL.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1896. 166 Mass. 391, 44 N. E. 347, 55 Am. St. Rep. 410.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Suffolk County; Oliver Wendell Holmes, Judge. The case was reported to the full court for decision.

LATHROP, J. The defendants do not now contend that their furnace for melting iron was not properly found by the justice of this court who heard the case to be a nuisance at common law, but they seek to justify their acts on the ground of certain so-called "licenses," issued by the mayor and aldermen of Chelsea, under Pub. St. c. 102, §§ 40–48. The first of these appears to be merely a street permit to use a portion of the street in front of the premises for the deposit of building materials. On March 5, 1895, a license to erect a furnace for melting iron was granted to the defendants, with the provision that they build a stack 25 feet in height above the roof of the building, with a suitable spark arrester placed upon the top thereof. Due notice was given of the application for such a license, in accordance with section 41 of chapter 102 of the Public Statutes. A copy of this order was served upon the defendants, but, through some mistake, the height of the stack above the roof was stated to be 20 feet, instead of 25 feet. Thereupon the defendants proceeded to erect their stack only 20 feet high above the roof. Subsequently, this mistake was discovered, and the defendants filed a petition that the board of aldermen should revise the order by striking out the word "five" after the word "twenty"; and on May 4, 1895, the former action of the board was rescinded, and a new license was issued, to maintain a steam engine and boiler, also to melt iron, etc., on condition that the chimney on said building be 20 feet high, and capped with a suitable spark arrester. No notice, however, was given to any one on this petition.

We are of opinion that the defendants show no ground of defense. They did not comply with the license of March 5, 1895, although perhaps through no fault of theirs; and the license of May 14, 1895, cannot avail them, because no notice was given, as provided in section 41, above referred to. If the case stopped here, the plaintiff would be entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing the nuisance, and to the damages which had been assessed for the injury already done to the plaintiff's premises. But it was stated by counsel on both sides at the argument that, since the case was reported to this court, the defendants had obtained a license, in proper form, after due notice, to continue their business; and we have been requested to consider the question whether, under the sections above referred to, a license is any defense to this bill in equity for a private nuisance. If it is a defense, it is obvious that an injunction should not be granted; and the plaintiff will be entitled only to the damages which he has sustained, and which, by agreement of parties made at the argument, is to be the sum found by the justice who heard the case. We are of opinion that it is well settled in this commonwealth that, under statutes similar to the one before us, where a license is granted by a local board, and the licensees are complying with the license, what they do cannot be considered as a nuisance or be restrained by this court.

In Com. v. Parks, 155 Mass. 531, 30 N. E. 174, it is said by Mr. Justice Holmes: "It is settled that, within constitutional limits not exactly determined, the legislature may change the common law as to nuisances, and may move the line either way, so as to make things nuisances which were not so, or to make things lawful which were nuisances, although, by so doing, it affects the use or value of property." Under St. 1845, c. 197, § 1, which is similar in its language to Pub. St. c. 102, § 40, it was said in Call v. Allen, 1 Allen, 137, 142, 143, that, the power being vested in the officers named in the statute to grant licenses, "it is an inevitable implication from its exercise in making and recording an order prescribing rules, restrictions, and alterations as to the building in which the furnace or engine is constructed, and other provisions for the safety of the neighborhood, that the owner may thereafter, by conforming to and observing all the terms and requirements of the order, lawfully continue to maintain, use, and work them." And again: "The further prosecution of his business by the defendant, by the use of his engine, was lawful; and his mills and works could afterwards be justly complained of only when he should fail in any respect to comply with the requirements of the order, or should act contrary to or in violation of its provisions."

This question was considered at length in Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 239, 241, 242, 245, 49 Am. Rep. 27. In that case, after this court had determined on a bill in equity that the ringing of a bell on a mill was a private nuisance to the plaintiff, and after a final injunction was issued restraining such ringing, the legislature passed a statute authorizing manufacturers, for the purpose of giving notice to employés, to ring bells and use whistles and gongs of such size and weight, and in such manner, and at such hours, as the board of aldermen of cities and selectmen of towns might designate. The selectmen of the town where the mill was situated granted a license to the owner to ring the bell on the mill at the hour at which he was prevented from ringing it by the injunction. It was held on a bill of review brought by the millowner, seeking to have the injunction dissolved, that the statute was constitutional, and that the bill could be maintained. It was said in the opinion: "And, when the legislature directs or allows that to be done which would otherwise be a nuisance, it will be valid, upon the ground that the legislature is ordinarily the proper judge of what the public good requires, unless carried to such an extent that it can fairly be said to be an unwholesome and unreasonable law." See, also, Com. v. Rumford Chemical Works, 16 Gray, 231; Alter v. Dodge, 140 Mass. 594, 5 N. E. 504; White v. Kenney, 157 Mass. 13, 31 N. E. 654. The case of Quinn v. Light Co., 140 Mass. 106, 3 N. E. 200, upon which the plaintiff relies, was decided upon the ground that a license under Pub. St. c. 102, § 40, to run a steam engine, if it included authority to run any kind of machinery, was broader than the statute; that the machinery, therefore, might, by its noise, be a nuisance, for which an action for damages would lie.

In the case at bar, the nuisance appears to have been caused by the spark arrester not preventing sparks and small pieces of red-hot iron from falling upon the vacant lot of the plaintiff, but "the authority to do an act must be held to carry with it whatever is naturally incidental to the ordinary and reasonable performance of that act." Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 245, 49 Am. Rep. 27. The presiding justice has stated that he was satisfied that, on the evidence, this spark arrester was the best one known for the purpose, and so found it to be suitable, and that the furnace and chimney were managed with all the precaution practicable for the business. Under the statutes above referred to, which apply to this case, we are of opinion that there is enough to show that the legislature intended the license to cover the whole question, and to authorize the doing of the business with reasonable care. We are also of the opinion that the finding of the single justice shows that the business was conducted with such care. Assuming that there was a proper license, we are therefore of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction, but is only entitled to recover the damages which have been assessed. Decree accordingly.

BRANAHAN v. HOTEL CO.

(Supreme Court of Ohio, 1883. 39 Ohio St. 333, 48 Am. Rep. 457.)

The Cincinnati Hotel Company had obtained a judgment in the District Court against Branahan and others, owners and drivers of hackney coaches, perpetually enjoining them from using the street in front of the plaintiff's property as a hackney coach stand. It appeared that this use of the street was under the authority of a city ordinance. The defendants move to file a petition in error to the District Court.

JOHNSON, C. J. * * * The City is clothed with power over the streets, and is charged with the duty of keeping them open for public use and free from nuisance. It may enlarge these general public uses without infringing the rights of the adjacent owner, but where additional burdens are imposed even for a public purpose, which materially impair the incidental property right of the lot owner, equity will enjoin, until compensation is made. Railway v. Lawrence, 38 Ohio St. 41, 43 Am. Rep. 419; Street Railway v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 524; Crawford v. Village of Delaware, 7 Ohio St. 459. This ordinance granted a permanent use of the street for mere private uses. As well might the city authorize permanent booths or structures for the use of dealers in various articles of trade. Having no rent to pay, the occupants could accommodate the public at better rates.

The supervision and control of the public highways of a city is a public trust, and while additional uses may be imposed, not subversive of, or impairing the original use, such as laying down gas and water mains; yet the rights of the public to use it as a street, and of the adjacent lot owner to enjoy it as the means of access to his property, cannot be materially impaired.

The city has the right to regulate hackney coaches (R. S. § 1692), and also the right to appropriate private property for the use of the corporation, but it has no power to appropriate the easement of an adjacent owner to a mere private use. This permanent occupancy of the streets cutting off access to the plaintiff's store rooms, for the convenience and benefit of a private business, cannot be justified on the plea that the public who use hacks are accommodated more readily and on better terms.

The same would, doubtless, be the case with other kinds of business located in the streets. The finding of the court is, that the use complained of deprives the owner of all access to his premises.

Even if, as is suggested, this is in the nature of a public use, like a market, the city could not appropriate it to such use without proceeding according to law as settled in the cases already cited.[10]

Motion overruled.

[10] A portion of the case is omitted.

Compare Bacon v. Boston (1891) 154 Mass. 100, 28 N. E. 9, and the remark of C. Allen, J.: "The general rule is that the legislature may authorize small nuisances without compensation, but not great ones. Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 239, 243 [49 Am. Rep. 27]. But it will not be assumed that the legislature intended to authorize a nuisance unless this is the necessary result of the powers granted."

III. Trover and Conversion [11]

(A) Nature of the Tort

(a) Trover and Conversion Distinguished from Other Torts.

PUT and HARDY v. RAWSTERNE et al.

(Court of King's Bench, 1682. Sir T. Raym. 472, 83 Reprint, 246.)

Trover of divers goods. The defendant pleads an action of trespass vi & armis brought against them formerly, for taking and disposing of the same goods; and upon not guilty pleaded, a verdict for the defendants: judgment si actio. The plaintiff demurs; and adjudged for the plaintiff in this action of trover, because trover and trespass are actions sometimes of a different nature; for trover will sometimes lie where trespass vi & armis will not lie; as if a man hath my goods by my delivery to keep for me, and I afterwards demand them, and he refuses to deliver them, I may have an action of trover, but not trespass vi & armis because here was no tortious taking: and sometimes the case may be such, that either the one or the other will

[11] A Declaration in Trover and Conversion, in the Case of Bancks v. Jeans (1735), the Pleader's Assistant (1795) 509:

"To wit. Robert Bancks, Esq., complains of Thomas Jeans, in custody, &c, for this, that whereas the said Robert upon the first day of May in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and thirty-five, at Basinstoke, in the county of Southampton, was possessed of divers goods and chattels, that is to say, of thirty ton weight of paving stones, thirty ton weight of other stone for building, three thousand bricks, and ten cart loads of timber, of the value of sixty pounds, as of his own proper goods and chattels, and being so possessed thereof, the said Robert afterwards, that is to say, on the same day and year abovesaid, at Basinstoke aforesaid, casually lost the said goods and chattels out of his hands and possession, which said goods and chattels afterwards, to wit, on the same day and year abovementioned, at Basinstoke aforesaid, came to the hands and possession of the said Thomas by finding the same, yet the said Thomas well knowing the said goods and chattels to be the proper goods of him the said Robert, and of right to belong and appertain to him, but devising and fraudulently intending, craftily and subtilly to deceive and defraud the said Robert of the said goods and chattels, hath not delivered the said goods and chattels, nor any of them to the said Robert (although often requested so to do) but afterwards, that is to say, upon the second day of May, in the year aforesaid, at Basingstoke aforesaid, converted and disposed of the said goods and chattels to his own use, to the damage of the said Robert sixty pounds, and thereupon he brings his suit."

See also the form of the declaration in Stephen on Pleading (Williston's Ed. 1895) 44, and in Whittier's Cases on Pleading, 195.

Under the Judicature Acts (1875), the following is a sufficient statement of claim in Trover and Conversion:

"The plaintiff has suffered damage by the defendant wrongfully depriving him of a gold watch belonging to the plaintiff, and converting the same to his own use after a demand from the plaintiff for its delivery. The plaintiff claims £40. damages." Cunningham and Mattinson, Precedents 569 (1884).

For the different uses of the term "Conversion" see Black's Dictionary, "Conversion in Law" and "Conversion in Equity," and 9 Cyc. 824.

lie; as where there is a tortious taking away of goods, and detaining them, the party may have either trover or trespass, and in such case judgment in one action is a bar in the other. And the rule for this purpose is, that wheresoever the same evidence will maintain both the actions, there the recovery or judgment in one may be pleaded in bar of the other; but otherwise not; and so this judgment will not clash with Ferrer's Case,[12] which is good in law; for here it is to be presumed that the plaintiffs in the first action had mistaken their action; for that they had brought a trespass vi & armis, whereas they had no evidence to prove a wrongful taking, but only a demand and denial, and therefore the verdict passed against them in that action, and so were forced to begin in this new action of trover. This judgment was given positively by PEMBERTON, JONES and myself, DOLBEN hæsitante.

LACON v. BARNARD, Attorney.

(Court of Common Pleas, 20 Jac. I. Cro. Car. 35, 79 Reprint, 635.)

Trover and conversion of one hundred sheep, shewing that the plaintiff upon the twenty-fifth day of March, 19 Jac. I, was possessed of those goods and lost them, and that upon the last day of April they came to the defendant's hands, who the same day sold and converted them to his proper use.

The defendant for eleven of them pleaded not guilty; and as to the eighty-nine, the residue, he pleaded, that the plaintiff at another time, viz. on the eighteenth day of September, 19 Jac. I, prosecuted an original writ out of the Chancery, returnable in this Court, against the defendant and one Brian Smith, quare ceperunt et abduxerunt 100 oves; and thereto they appeared, and the plaintiff counted against them of their taking of a hundred sheep upon the fourteenth day of April, 19 Jac. I; and thereto they pleaded not guilty for the eleven sheep, and for the eighty-nine residue they pleaded a recovery in debt by the defendant against Edward Hatcliff of a debt of sixty pounds; and that the said Edward Hatcliff was then possessed of the said eighty-nine sheep, and that by virtue of a fieri facias those goods were sold to him, whereupon he took them into his custody. The plaintiff thereto replied, and took issue, and found for him, and damages assessed to twopence: and thereupon the plaintiff had judgment of the said twopence damages, and had six pounds for costs; and avers, that the said taking and driving, for which the recovery in trespass was had, and the conversion of the said eighty-nine sheep in this action be all one, and that the said judgment is yet in force.

To this plea the plaintiff replies, that true it is he brought such an action, and recovered the twopence for the taking and driving of the said eighty-nine sheep, and six pounds for costs; but he farther saith, that the twopence damages was not assessed for the value of the said sheep and the conversion of them, and that the said defendant, at the day and year in the bill, sold the said eighty-nine sheep and converted them to his own use: the which conversion is the same conversion whereof he now complaineth; and traverseth, that the said taking and driving in the said action, whereupon the judgment was given, is the same trespass as to the conversion of those goods whereof the plaintiff now declareth.

Upon this replication the defendant demurred generally: and it was now argued at the Bar by Serjeant Crew, for the defendant, and by Serjeant Henden, for the plaintiff; and after the said arguments at the Bar, it was resolved

By HUTTON, HARVEY, and myself, that this replication is good, and that the plaintiff ought to recover; for the damages of twopence given for the eighty-nine sheep being so small, is in itself an implication (and the Court shall so intend it) that it was given only for the taking and driving of them, and that the plaintiff had them again, and not in lieu of the value of them; for if it should be given for the value of them, then the plaintiff should thereby lose the property in them and have nothing for his sheep but twopence, and the defendant should have the sheep: but the law will rather intend (and so it may be averred) that those damages were given only for the taking and driving, and that the plaintiff had them again, and afterwards lost them, and that the defendant found and after converted them, &c.: and this demurrer is a confession that he converted them after the said taking and driving; for the action of trespass is supposed to be upon the 14th April, 19 Jac. I, and the trover and conversion in this action is supposed to be upon the 30th April, 19 Jac. I, which well stands with the former action; for the defendant may take and chase them one day, and the plaintiff recover damages for the chasing, and after lose them, &c. And this first action is brought for the first taking and chasing, and the second for the conversion, so both may stand together, which is now confessed by the demurrer, and that the damages were given for the first taking and driving and not for the conversion; therefore they conceived the plaintiff should recover.

But YELVERTON held, because the action of trespass is cepit et abduxit, therefore it includes that the defendant had them, and ousted the plaintiff of the possession: and although the damages be small, it shall be intended to be given for the sheep; and if so, then he cannot have an action for converting them afterward.

But judgment was given for the plaintiff.

AMERICAN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. MIDDLETON.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1880. 80 N. Y. 408.)

MILLER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for wrongfully and maliciously cutting down, and unlawfully carrying away and converting twenty-three telegraph poles, wires, and insulators attached thereto, located in the State of New Jersey, and forming a part of a continuous line of telegraph in operation in that State. An order of arrest was granted, the defendant held to bail, and a motion to vacate the order was denied. The defendant appealed to the General Term, where the order was affirmed and an appeal was taken to this court.

The question presented is whether an order of arrest can be lawfully granted in such a case. The telegraph poles, with the wires and attachments thereto, which, it is alleged, were cut down by the defendant, were affixed to the soil of a highway, and constituted a part of the freehold. The Electric Tel. Co. v. Overseers, 24 L. J. (N. S.) 146. As they could not be cut down without an entry on the realty, and this constitutes a material part of the damages, the only action which can properly be brought is an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. This is clearly manifest; and as such action is local in its character, by the statute as well as by the common-law, it will not lie in this State, where the land is located in another State. Watts' Adm'rs v. Kinney, 23 Wend. 484. In the case last cited it was held that although the courts will entertain actions which are in their nature transitory, notwithstanding they arise abroad, actions for trespass quare clausum fregit, ejectment, etc., where the land lies in a foreign country, cannot be tried here.

It is claimed that the damage to the real estate is not the cause of action; and as the tortious acts were committed upon the highway where the defendant had a right to be, there could be no trespass on the close. The answer to this position is that the plaintiff had affixed their poles to the realty, and the cutting away of the same was a trespass for which damages could only be recovered by an action quare clausum fregit.

It is also insisted that the gravamen of the complaint was for carrying away and converting the poles which were severed, and were personal property after the cutting, even if they were a part of the realty previously. It is quite obvious that the cutting of the poles and the removal of them was one continuous and uninterrupted transaction, inseparably connected together, which constituted a single cause of action which cannot be divided into two actions, one for the cutting and another for the conversion. The one was a part of the other, and the conversion so coupled with the cutting that they were the same, and both of them are thus made local. Howe v. Willson, 1 Denio, 181.

Conceding, however, that the poles and wires could have been made the subject of a conversion after they had been severed from the soil, we think that the affidavits establish that no such separate conversion actually took place. The defendant only carried them from the place where they were cut and from the highway to the ditches and side fences of the road, and left them there or placed them on the side fences by the road-side. There was no assumption of possession, no attempt to exercise control, or to convert them to his own use. But even if there was, the only damages which could be recovered in such a case would be the actual value of the poles and wires, which would be merely nominal when compared with the amount of damages ($5,000) which the plaintiff claims to recover, and for which sum the defendant was held to bail in this action. It is very evident from the plaintiff's affidavits that there was no legal conversion, and that it could not take place without a removal of the poles and wires for the purpose of taking them away from the plaintiff, or by the exercise of some dominion over them by the defendant for the benefit of himself or of some other person. The mere act of removal, of itself, independent of any claim over them in favor of the defendant, or any one else, does not amount to the conversion of the poles, wires and insulators: Addison on Torts (3d Ed.), 309. * * *

It follows that the order of the Special and General Terms must be reversed. * * *[13]

WILLIAMS v. GESSE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1837. 3 Bing. [N. C.] 849, 132 Reprint, 637, 43 R. R. 822.)[14]

Trover for a coat and pantaloons. Plea, not guilty. The defendant kept a public house at Oxford, frequented by farmers. The plaintiff's clothes, packed in a box, were deposited in the defendant's kitchen, behind the settle, by a person who said the box was to stay till called for. The box was never seen again by the plaintiff, but when he enquired for it, the defendant said, "I suppose it's behind the settle."

Verdict for the plaintiff, with leave for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit instead, on the ground that there was no evidence of any conversion.

[13] Part of the opinion is omitted.

Compare: Radway v. Duffy (1903) 79 App. Div. 116, 80 N. Y. Supp. 334: (D. entered without right upon the land of P., and dug up and carried away 6,000 cubic yards of earth, and used it in grading a public street, for which D. had a contract.)

Ludlow, Serjt., having obtained a rule nisi accordingly,

V. Lee appeared for the plaintiff; but upon reading the learned Judge's report, as above,

The rule was made absolute.

In a similar action by a sister of the plaintiff against the same defendant, it was proved that the defendant received parcels for carriers; that the parcels were accustomed to be placed behind the settle; and when application was made for the parcel in question, the defendant's wife said, "My husband has sent it, no doubt, by Croft, the carrier: he has a bad memory; it's a pity you did not speak to me." Verdict for the defendant.

V. Lee, in Easter Term, moved for a new trial, on the ground that the language of the wife showed that the defendant had interfered by giving directions, which would amount to a conversion.

Rep. 334: (Action against a railroad company to recover damages for the alleged conversion of money which the plaintiff sent in a registered letter addressed to L., at a station on the defendant's line. The defendant was engaged in transporting the mail, and in this capacity received the letter in question. The letter never reached its address. The complaint contained only one count, in trover for conversion of the money, not stating any other facts. Plea, not guilty. The trial court charged that "it is no answer to this complaint that the money was lost through the defendant's want of proper care." Said Clopton, J., delivering the opinion of the reviewing court: "The essential element of a conversion is malfeasance. The action will lie against a common carrier, for a misdelivery, or an appropriation of the property to his own use, or for any act of dominion or ownership antagonistic to, and inconsistent with the plaintiff's claim or right. But trover will not lie against a carrier, for goods lost by accident or stolen, or for non-delivery, unless there be a refusal to deliver while having possession; nor for any act or omission, which amounts to negligence merely, and not to an actual wrong. Packard v. Getman, 4 Wend. [N. Y.] 613, 21 Am. Dec. 166; Magnin v. Dinsmore, 70 N. Y. 410, 26 Am. Rep. 608. So also a bailee is not liable for a conversion, who deals negligently with goods intrusted to him. Heald v. Carey (1852) 11 C. B. 977. On like principles, trover will not lie against a mail-contractor, for money lost by negligence, or stolen, unless the theft was authorized by him. We do not understand, as is insisted on, that the evidence shows, or tends to show, that the defendant is guilty of any wrongful disposition, or appropriation, or withholding of the letter containing the money, other than a failure to deliver on the com-

This action was brought to recover the possession of a horse. The horse had been taken in the action, and delivered to the plaintiff and retained by him to the time of the trial. There was conflicting evidence as to the title of the horse, but the jury found the title to be mencement of the suit. It appears that the letter was stolen by some one: but whether by a third person, or a servant of the defendant, the defendant is not liable as for a conversion. In Conner & Johnson v. Allen & Reynolds, 33 Ala. 515, it was said: 'Trover is one of the actions, the boundaries of which are distinctly marked, and carefully preserved by the Code. A conversion is now, as it has ever been, the gist of that action, and without proof of it the plaintiff can not recover, whatever else he may prove, or whatever may be his right of recovery in another form of action.' On the facts shown by the record, the defendant is not liable as for a conversion of the money. Reversed and remanded.")

But see Fisher v. Prince (1762) 3 Burr. 1364, where Lord Mansfield and Mr. Justice Wilmot both concurred in the following distinction: "That where trover is brought for a specific chattel, of an ascertained quantity and quality, and unattended with any circumstances that can enhance the damages above the real value, but that its real and ascertained value must be the sole measure of the damages, there the specific thing demanded may be brought into court; (and Mr. Justice Wilmot said this was the more reasonable, as this action of trover comes in the place of the old action of detinue:) where there is an uncertainty either as to the quantity or quality of the thing demanded, or that there is any tort accompanying it that may enhance the damages above the real value of the thing, and there is no rule whereby to estimate the additional value, there it shall not be brought in." The rule thus announced has been followed in England. Pickering v. Truste (1796) 7 T. R. 531; Tucker v. Wright (1826) 3 Bing. 601; Gibson v. Humphrey (1833) 1 Cr. & M. 544. in the defendant, and assessed its value at $175, and damages for its detention by the plaintiff at $75. The defendant, for the purpose of proving his damages for the detention, gave evidence of the value of the use of the horse. The plaintiff objected to this evidence, claiming that the value of the use was not the proper measure or rule of damage. This objection being overruled raised the only question considered upon this appeal.

EARL, C. * * * In actions of trover, in cases where there has been no increase in the value of the property converted intermediate the conversion and the time of the trial, the measure of damages is the value at the time of the conversion, and interest thereon to the time of the trial, and it would have to be a very special case that would authorize greater damages. The claim here is, that the same rule applies in an action of replevin, and I shall endeavor to show that it does not apply in all cases, and that this case is one of a class to which it cannot be applied.

The very nature of the two kinds of action shows that the same rule of damages should not be inflexibly applied in each.

In the action of trover, the plaintiff does not seek to recover his property, but its value as a substitute for the property. He abandons the property to the defendant, preferring to pursue him for its value. He makes a kind of forced sale of it, without any expectation or intention of retaking it. Hence, in such cases, he can be expected at once to go into the market and supply himself with the same property at its market value if he desires it. But in the action of replevin, the plaintiff seeks to recover the property and is, in all stages of the case to final judgment, in pursuit of that, and not its value. And during the whole time the defendant may have the possession and the use (if it can be used) of his property. At the termination of the suit it is not optional with him to take the property or its value. If the defendant has the property, and will permit him to take it, he is obliged to take it. Code, § 277; Dwight v. Enos, 9 N. Y. 470; Fitzhugh v. Wiman, 9 N. Y. 559. Hence the plaintiff cannot always be expected or required, in such cases, to go into the market and supply himself with the same kind of property at its market value. Suppose the controversy be about a canal boat or a carriage, or an expensive machine. If the plaintiff should go into market and buy another, at the end of the litigation, in case of success, he would have on hand duplicates of the article, and would thus be subjected to further loss and inconvenience. These observations are made simply to show that there is nothing in the nature of the two actions requiring the application of the same rule of damages. * * *

In the action of replevin, under the Code, the jury are required to assess the value of the property, and damages for its detention. The value here intended is the value at the time of the trial. In case the prevailing party can obtain a delivery of the property, he must take it as it then is; if he cannot obtain such delivery, then the value is intended as a substitute and precise equivalent of the property. The damages for detention are the same, whether the party recover the property or its value. * * *

Suppose the plaintiff had taken defendant's boat, worth $2,000, and kept it a whole year before it was ordered, as the result of the action, to be returned to the defendant, would the interest be a fair compensation to the defendant for the loss of the use of his boat? Instead of a boat, suppose it had been a carriage, worth $1,000, would the interest be a sufficient allowance for the use of the carriage a whole year? The same supposition may be made as to any article of personal property having a usable value. There would be very few cases where the interest would give the owner a fair or adequate indemnity, and thus two of the fundamental rules of damages would be violated: The owner would not be completely or fully indemnified for the loss of the use of his property, and the wrong-doer who had had the use of it would make a profit out of his own wrong, which the law does not tolerate.

This case illustrates the injustice of the rule contended for by the plaintiff as well as any. The jury found the value of the horse to be $175 and the value of the use to be $75 for one year and three months. For the same period the interest would have been $15.31, and if that had been taken as the measure of damages, the owner would have lost about sixty dollars and the wrong-doer would have made that much profit out of his wrong. A rule of damage which works out such a result, cannot have a basis of principle or justice to stand upon. * * *[17]

It follows that the rule of damages adopted below was right, and that the judgment must be affirmed with costs.

(b) Subject-Matter of Trover and Conversion

MACKINTOSH v. TROTTER et al.

(Court of Exchequer, 1838. 3 Mees. & W. 184, 49 R. R. 565.)

Trover for fixtures, furniture, &c. Plea, that the goods and chattels in the declaration mentioned were not, nor were any of them, the property of the plaintiff. At the trial, it appeared that the action was brought by the plaintiff, an innkeeper at Liverpool, to recover from the defendants, his assignees under a fiat in bankruptcy, which he alleged to be void, the value of certain tenant's fixtures and household furniture, which they, as his assignees, had put up to sale by auction, together with the lease of his house and the goodwill of his business. The fixtures and furniture were sold in one lot, for £79. 8s. 8d., and it was proved that the former still remained affixed to the freehold, not having been removed by the purchaser. It was contended, for the defendants, that the fixtures were not recoverable in trover. The learned Judge was disposed to think that the defendants, by selling them, had, as between themselves and the plaintiffs, treated them as goods and chattels: he however desired the jury to assess the value of the fixtures separately; and they having stated their value at £55., a verdict passed for the plaintiff for £79. 8s. 8d., leave being reserved to the defendants to move to reduce the damages by the sum of £55.

In Michaelmas Term, Cowling obtained a rule accordingly.

Cresswell, Wightman, and Addison now showed cause: These were fixtures which the plaintiff, being tenant, might have removed; and for such fixtures, if the tenant be dispossessed of them during his term, he may maintain trover. * * * If trespass was maintainable for the wrongful taking, so trover would lie for the wrongful conversion and detention of them. (PARKE, B. Would trover lie for a crop of standing corn? Your argument amounts to this, that the plaintiff may maintain trover for preventing him from exercising his right of removal.)

Alexander and Cowling, in support of the rule, were stopped by the Court.

PARKE, B. Minshall v. Lloyd, 2 M. & W. 450, is a direct authority on this point. I gave my opinion in that case, not on my mere impression at the time, but after much consideration of this point, that the principle of law is, that whatsoever is planted in the soil belongs to the soil, quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit; that the tenant has the right to remove fixtures of this nature during his term, or during what may, for this purpose, be considered as an excrescence on the term; but that they are not goods and chattels at all, but parcel of the freehold, and as such not recoverable in trover. That case is a direct authority, so far as my opinion and that of my brother Alderson go; and I think it was a correct decision.

BOLLAND and GURNEY, BB., concurred.

Rule absolute.[18]

[18] Compare Rogers v. Gilinger (1858) 30 Pa. 185, 72 Am. Dec. 694, where the question of the subject-matter of conversion relates to fragments of a large frame building blown down by a wind, "leaving the foundation and floors nearly entire, but breaking the superstructure, so that its materials could not be replaced, or used in the construction of a similar building."

WOOD v. SMITH.

Action of trover of divers goods (naming them particularly), and converting of them. The defendant pleaded not guilty; and it was found against him, and damages assessed to £40. And it was now moved in arrest of judgment,

First, the action is brought of divers things by an administrator, of goods of the intestate's found and converted; and it appears that parcel of those goods are things fixed to the freehold, and as parcel thereof, for which this action lies not, for the declaration is, that he was possessed de duobus articulis vocat. portal, cum suspensis vocat. hinges, et de uno molendino vocat. an hand-mill, et de uno plumbo vocat. a lead, et de una alveolâ vocat. a washing-fat, and lost them, &c. which things appear to be fixed to the house, and are as parcel thereof, and are not accounted as goods; so the action lies not for them; for the portal is a door of the house, and the hand-mill and the lead (which is a brewing lead), and the washing-fat (which is parcel of the brewing vessels), are always fixed things, and go to the heir and not to the executor, as 20 Hen. VII is.

Sed non allocatur; for it is alleged in the declaration, that he was possessed of them ut de bonis propriis; and it may be that those things were severed from the freehold, and things lying by; and it shall be so intended, when the plaintiff so declares; and the contrary appears not to the Court by any matters shewn to them by the defendant's plea. * * *

Adjudged for the plaintiff.[19]

GRYMES v. SHACK.

(Court of King's Bench, 1610. Cro. Jac. 262, 79 Reprint, 226.)

Action of trover and conversion of one hundred muskcats and sixty monkies. The defendant pleads not guilty; and it was found against him: and it was moved in arrest of judgment, that an action lay not, because he doth not shew that they were tame or reclaimed; as 12 Hen. VIII and 14 Eliz. Dyer, for a hawk.

Sed non allocatur; for they are merchandise, and valuable. And so it is of an action for a parrot. Wherefore it was adjudged for the plaintiff.

[19] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point.

KINASTON v. MOOR.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1627. Cro. Car. 89, 79 Reprint, 678.)

Error in the Exchequer Chamber of a judgment in the King's Bench in action of trover and conversion of divers goods, and among other things of £190 in pecuniis numeratis. Upon not guilty pleaded, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, and entire damages given. The error was assigned, because trover and conversion cannot be of money out of a bag.

But all the Justices and Barons agreed, that it well lies: for although it was alleged that money lost cannot be known; and so whether it was the plaintiff's money, whereof the trover and conversion was, as is the charge of this action, yet the Court said, it being found by a jury that he converted the plaintiff's money (for the losing is but a surmise and not material, for the defendant may take it in the presence of the plaintiff, or any other who may give sufficient evidence; and although he take it as a trespass, yet the other may charge him in an action upon the case in a trover, if he will), the plaintiff had good cause of action. Wherefore the judgment before well given was now affirmed.

The Justices and Barons said, that this action lies as well for money out of a bag, as of corn which cannot be known.

ORTON v. BUTLER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1822. 5 Barn. & Ald. 652, 106 Reprint, 1329.)

The declaration in this case contained three counts; the third count was as follows:

> And, whereas also the said defendant afterwards, to wit, on, etc. at, etc. had and received for the use of the plaintiff, a certain sum of money; to wit, the sum of ten shillings to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff upon request. Yet the defendant, not regarding his duty in that behalf, but contriving, etc. hath not, although often requested, paid to the plaintiff the last mentioned sum of money, or any part thereof, but hath wholly omitted so to do; and on the contrary thereof, afterwards, to wit, on, etc. at, etc. converted and disposed thereof to his own use.

The defendant pleaded to the first two counts the general issue, and demurred specially to the last count.

ABBOTT, C. J. The law has provided certain specific forms of action for particular cases, and it is of great importance that they should be preserved; we ought therefore to look with great jealousy to an innovation of this sort. The present count states, that the defendant had and received to the use of the plaintiff, a certain sum of money, to wit, ten shillings to be paid to the plaintiff, but which the defendant converted to his own use. It is contended, that this is a count in trover. Now, the action of trover is only maintainable for specific property; it will lie for so many pieces of gold or silver, and in that case a defendant can only redeem himself by tendering to the plaintiff the same specific pieces. But in this case he clearly might do so by returning an equal sum of money. There is, therefore, not merely a want of certainty in the count, but it states that which is not the subject of an action of trover at all. The demurrer therefore must be allowed.

BEST, J. This is an innovation upon the old forms established by law, and therefore ought not to be allowed. There is a broad distinction between actions ex contractu and ex delicto. Here, it arises out of a breach of contract, and the party ought not to be allowed to proceed in the present mode of framing his count ex delicto, which would be attended by the inconveniences pointed out in argument. The defendant might be deprived of his set off, and if he lived within the jurisdiction of an inferior Court, of his costs, and in addition to that, would not be able to pay money into Court. The action of trover is clearly not maintainable in a case like the present: there a party recovers damages for the detention of specific goods. But it would be inconsistent with justice, if where a sum of money was delivered generally to a defendant, the Court were to hold, that he could not defend himself unless he could prove that he had restored the same specific money delivered to him. But this would be the case if we were to allow the action of trover to be maintainable.

Judgment for the defendant.

ROYCE, ALLEN & CO. v. OAKES.

(Appellate Division, Supreme Court of Rhode Island, 1897. 20 R. I. 252, 38 Atl. 371.)

Action of trespass on the case. Certified from the Common Pleas Division and heard on demurrer to each count in the declaration.

TILLINGHAST, J. The plaintiffs set out in the first count of their declaration that on January 15, 1894, they delivered to the defendant the sum of $1,714.60 in money together with three gross of napkin rings of the value of $49.26, said money and goods being the property of the plaintiffs, for safe keeping, and to be redelivered by the defendant to the plaintiffs thereafterwards on the same day; that the defendant received said money and merchandise for the purpose aforesaid, yet, not regarding his duty in that behalf, afterwards on the same day, intending and contriving to injure the plaintiffs, fraudulently and unlawfully converted said money and goods to his own use, and, although thereafterwards duly requested, he neglected and refused to deliver said money and goods, or any part thereof, to the plaintiffs.

To the first count of the declaration the defendant demurs, on the grounds:

(1) That the matters therein stated do not set forth a cause of action against the defendant. (2) That, whereas said action is trespass on the case, said count states no cause of action against the defendant unless the same be an action for breach of contract. (3) That said count does not state facts constituting an action of trespass on the case against the defendant, but if any cause of action sounding in tort is therein stated, the same is an action of trover, and not a trespass on the case. And (4) that said plaintiffs join a cause of action for breach of contract with a cause of action sounding in tort.

We think the demurrer to the first count should be overruled; for, while it is somewhat inartificially drawn, yet it sufficiently states a case in trover, which is a species of action on the case. It sets out property in the plaintiffs, alleging a value thereof, together with the conversion thereof by the defendant at a certain time and place; and we think this is sufficient. For, while it is customary to incorporate into the declaration the legal fiction that the plaintiff casually lost the goods and chattels described, and that the same thereafterwards came to the defendant's hands by finding, yet we think it is sufficient to allege that they came to his hands generally, the conversion being the gist of the action. See Oliv. Prec. (3d Ed.) 467; Gen. Laws R. I. c. 235, §§ 4, 5.

But the defendant contends that trover lies only for the conversion of personal chattels, and does not lie for the failure to deliver to the plaintiffs money, as such;[20] and that the proper form of action as to that is assumpsit, for money had and received. It is true that the obligation to pay money to another is primarily within the confines of assumpsit, or debt; but the cause stated in said first count shows something more than a debt. It shows a trust coupled with a specific duty, together with a breach of the trust and a fraudulent violation of the duty. It shows that the defendant received the money in question simply for safe keeping, the same to be delivered to the plaintiffs on demand, and that instead of discharging the duty thus devolved upon him he wrongfully converted the money to his own use. Having received the money in specie, simply for safe keeping, it was his duty to deliver the same specific money to the plaintiffs on demand. See Donohue v. Henry, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 162; Worley v. Moore, 97 Ind. 15; Richmond v. Soportos (City Ct. N. Y.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 433;

[20] "'Tis pity that reporters sometimes catch at quaint expressions that may happen to be dropped at the bar or bench; and mistake their meaning. It has been quaintly said 'that the reason why money cannot be followed is, because it has no ear mark': but this is not true. The true reason is, upon account of the currency of it: it cannot be recovered after it has passed in currency. So in case of money stolen, the true owner cannot recover it; after it has been paid away fairly and honestly upon a valuable and bona fide consideration: but before money has passed in currency, an action may be brought for the money itself." Per Lord Mansfield, in Miller v. Race (1758) 1 Burr. 452, 457.

26 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 766; Coffin v. Anderson, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 395; Govett v. Radnidge, 3 East, 62–70.

As to the napkin rings, of course no question is made that they are the subject of trover and conversion.

But the defendant contends that the plaintiffs have joined in the same count a cause of action ex contractu with a cause of action ex delicto, and hence that it is demurrable. As we construe the count there is no such misjoinder. It simply sets out the manner in which the defendant became possessed of the property in question, his duty regarding the same, and his wrongful conversion thereof to his own use. In short, it states a case wholly sounding in tort and not in assumpsit. * * *

The demurrer to the first count is overruled.[21]

(c) Effect of a Judgment for Plaintiff

ADAMS v. BROUGHTON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1737. Andrews, 18, 95 Reprint, 278.)

An action of trover was brought by the present plaintiff against one Mason, wherein he obtained judgment by default, and afterwards had final judgment; whereupon a writ of error was brought. And another action of trover was now brought by the same plaintiff, and for the same goods for which the first action was brought, against Broughton. It was thereupon moved by Solicitor General Strange, on an affidavit that the goods converted amounted to more than £10 that the defendant may be held to special bail. And he compared this to the case of an indorsee of a bill of exchange, who may bring an action both [21] Part of the opinion, relating to a second count, is omitted.

Compare Larson v. Dawson (1902) 24 R. I. 317, 53 Atl. 93, 96 Am. St. Rep. 716: (The declaration set out that on July 19, 1901, the plaintiff was possessed of $900 lawful money of the United States, and that on said day he intrusted said money to the defendant with the request that he should purchase for the plaintiff out of said money a certain lot of land situate on Greene street in Pawtucket, the defendant to pay for said lot the sum of $650, and that with the remaining $250 he was to commence the erection of a house on said lot for the plaintiff; that the defendant received said money in pursuance of said request, and afterwards, to wit, on October 23, 1901, he informed the plaintiff that he would not purchase said lot of land with said money, nor would he return the money to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff thereupon demanded of the defendant the said $900, which the defendant refused to deliver, and, not minding or regarding his duty in this behalf, but intending and contriving to injure and defraud the plaintiff, fraudulently and unlawfully converted said money to his own use by expending or dissipating the same, or otherwise disposing thereof contrary to law. And the plaintiff avers that criminal proceedings were instituted against the defendant, for embezzling said money, before the commencement of this action. To this declaration the defendant demurred, on the ground, among others, that the action of trover will not lie for money delivered to the defendant under the circumstances above set forth.)

against the drawer and the indorser, and hold them both to bail: and he cited the cases of Wyndham and Wither, and Wyndham and Trull, East, 8 Geo. I, where upon a motion to stay proceedings it was held, that an indorsee of a bill of exchange may bring an action thereon, both against the indorser and drawer; and the Court is only to see that the plaintiff hath but one satisfaction. So here the plaintiff may sue both Mason and the present defendant, and is entitled to the same process against the last, as if the action had been brought against him only. And he urged, in answer to an objection made by Page, J., that by a judgment obtained by the plaintiff in trover, the goods are become the defendant's; that a special property only is thereby vested in him: and in the present case, it is evidence only of a property as between the plaintiff and Mason, but not as between the present parties.

But PER CUR' (LEE, C. J., absente): The property of the goods is intirely altered by the judgment obtained against Mason, and the damages recovered in the first action are the price thereof; so that he hath now the same property therein as the original plaintiff had; and this against all the world. And therefore the motion was denied.[22]

[22] See the remarks of Willes, J., in Brinsmead v. Harrison (1871) L. R. 6 C. P. 584, 588: "This question whether the property is changed by the mere recovery in trover appears to have led to much difference of opinion. The authority mainly relied upon by Mr. Powell was the dictum of Jervis, C. J., in Buckland v. Johnson (1854) 15 C. B. 145, 157, in which that very learned and accurate judge did lay it down, upon the authority of a case in Strange, Adams v. Broughton (1737) 2 Str. 1078, that the property is changed by the mere recovery, without any satisfaction. I would observe, however, that the case, as reported in Strange, is far from satisfactory. It is also reported in Andrews, 18, where the case is thus stated. * * * The loose expressions of the Court,—that 'the property of the goods is entirely altered by the judgment obtained against Mason, and the damages recovered in the first action are the price thereof; so that he hath now the same property therein as the original plaintiff had; and this against all the world,'—were quite unnecessary. The same may be said as to the dictum of Jervis, C. J., in Buckland v. Johnson (1854) 15 C. B. 145. * * * On the other hand, there is a series of decisions showing that a mere recovery, without satisfaction, has not the effect of changing the property. * * *"

A like result was reached by the majority of the bench in Miller v. Hyde (1894) 161 Mass. 472, 37 N. E. 760, 25 L. R. A. 42, 42 Am. St. Rep. 424, but with Field, C. J., and Holmes and Knowlton, JJ., dissenting. "I am of opinion," said Mr. Justice Holmes in his dissenting opinion, "that the plaintiff ought to be barred in this action by her recovery of judgment in trover for the same horse. I am aware that the doctrine that title passes by judgment without satisfaction is not in fashion, but I never have been able to understand any other. It always has seemed to me that one whose property has been converted has an election between two courses, that he may have the thing back or may have its value in damages, but that he cannot have both: that when he chooses one he necessarily gives up the other, and that by taking a judgment for the value he does choose one conclusively. He cannot have a right to the value of the thing, effectual or ineffectual, and a right to the thing at the same time. The defendant is estopped by the judgment to deny the plaintiff's right to the value to the thing. Usually estoppels by judgment are mutual. It would seem to follow that the plaintiff also is estopped to deny his right to the value of the thing, and therefore is estopped to set up an inconsistent claim. In general an election is determined by judgment. Butler v. Hildreth (1842) 5

Metc. (Mass.) 49; Bailey v. Hervey (1883) 135 Mass. 172, 174; Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Caduc (1887) 144 Mass. 85, 86, 10 N. E. 483; Raphael v. Reinstein (1891) 154 Mass. 178, 179, 28 N. E. 141. I know of no reason why a judgment should be less conclusive in this case than any other. Of course, I am speaking of a judgment for the value of the chattel, not of one giving nominal damages for the taking. The argument from election is adopted in White v. Philbrick (1827) 5 Greenl. 147, 150, 17 Am. Dec. 214, which so far as I know is still the law of Maine, notwithstanding the remark in Murray v. Lovejoy (1863) 2 Cliff. 191, 198, Fed. Cas. No. 9963. See also Shaw, C. J., in Butler v. Hildreth (1842) 5 Metc. (Mass.) 49, 53. The most conspicuous cases which have taken a different view speak of the hardship of a man's losing his property without being paid for it, and sometimes cite the dictum in Jenkins, 4th Cent., Case 88, 'Solutio pretii emptionis loco habetur,' which is dogma, not reasoning, or if reasoning, is based on the false analogy of a sale: but they leave the argument which I have stated unanswered, not, as I think, because the judges deemed it unworthy of answer or met by paramount considerations of policy, but because they did not have either that or a clue to the early cases before their mind. Lovejoy v. Murray (1865) 3 Wall. 1, 17, 18 L. Ed. 129; Brinsmead v. Harrison (1871) L. R. 6 C. P. 584, 587; s. c., L. R. 7 C. P. 547, 554. It is not the practice of the English judges to overrule the common law because they disapprove it, and to do so without discussion. In Brinsmead v. Harrison, Mr. Justice Willes thought he was proving that the common law always had been in accord with his position. So far as the question of policy goes, it does not seem to me that the possibility—it is only the possibility—of an election turning out to have been unwise, is a sufficient reason for breaking in upon a principle which must be admitted to be sound on the whole, and for overthrowing the doctrine of the common law by a judicial fiat. I am not informed of any statistics which establish that judgments for money usually give the judgment creditor only an empty right. That the view which I hold is the view of the common law I think may be proved by considering what was the theory on which the remedies of trespass and replevin were given. In Y. B. 19 Hen. VI, 65, pl. 5, Newton says: 'If you had taken my chattels it is at my choice to sue replevin, which shows that the property is in me, or to sue a writ of trespass, which shows that the property is in the taker; and so it is at my will to waive the property or not.' In 6 Hen. VII, 8, pl. 4, Vavisor uses similar language, and adds, 'And so it is of goods taken, one may devest the property out of himself, if he will, by proceedings in trespass, or demand property by replevin or writ of detinue,' if he prefers. There is no doubt that the old law was that replevin affirms property in the plaintiff and trespass disaffirms it, and that the plaintiff has election. Bro. Abr. Trespass, pl. 134; 18 Vin. Abr. 69 (U); Anderson and Warberton, JJ., in Bishop v. Montague (1601) Cro. Eliz. 824. The proposition is made clearer when it is remembered that a tortious possession, at least if not felonious, carried with it a title by wrong in the case of chattels as well as in the case of a disseisin of land, as appears from the page of Viner just cited, and as has been shown more fully by the learned researches of Mr. Ames and Mr. Maitland, 3 Harv. Law Rev. 23, 326. See 1 Law Quarterly Rev. 324. I do not regard that as a necessary doctrine, or as the law of Massachusetts, but it was the common law, and it fixed the relations of trespass and replevin to each other. Trespass, and on the same principle trover, proceed on the footing of affirming property in the defendant, and of ratifying the act of the defendant which already has affirmed it. I do not see on what other ground a judgment for the value can be justified. If the title still is in doubt, or remains in the plaintiff, the defendant ought not to be charged for anything but the tortious taking. Again, cannot the plaintiff take the converted chattel on execution? And on what principle can he do so if it does not yet belong to the defendant? I say but a word as to the practical difficulties of the prevailing rule. No doubt they can be met in one way or another. Suppose the plaintiff after judgment were to retake the chattel by his own act, it would strike me as odd to say that this satisfied the judgment, and as impossible to say that it satisfied the whole judgment, which was for the tort, as well as for the value of the property. Yet on the

(Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1821. 5 Har. & J. 211, 9 Am. Dec. 512.)

Trover for negro slaves, brought by the appellant against the appellee.

DORSEY, J. The appellant in this cause, as administrator of Jane Fishwich, instituted an action of trover against the appellee, to recover the value of certain negroes, among whom were Sall, Patt and Phillis, the property of the appellant's intestate, and obtained a verdict for the sum of $7,153.50, on which judgment was rendered. The appellee appealed from that judgment to the court of appeals, and the same was affirmed at June term, 1818; and the amount of the judgment, with costs, was paid by the appellant to the appellee before the trial but after the issue was joined in the present suit. After the commencement of the action of trover, in which the verdict was rendered, the slaves, Sall, Patt and Phillis, each had a child, and the present action of trover was instituted by the appellant to recover the value of the said children. The court below decided that the action could not be maintained, and this court concur in that decision. The British authorities lay down the general proposition, that if the plaintiff in an action of trover has recovered damages for the conversion of the goods, the property thereof vests in the defendant, who, as damages to the value have been recovered against him, is to be considered as a purchaser. Adams v. Broughton, 2 Str. 1078; 6 Bacon's Abr. tit. Trover, A, p. 679. This court are of an opinion, that the judgment per se doth not clothe the defendant with the legal character of a purchaser; but that the judgment and its fruit, to wit, the payment of view which I oppose I presume that the judgment could not be collected. See Coombe v. Samsom (1822) 1 Dowl. & Ry. 201. It seems to me that the opinion which I hold was the prevailing one in England until Brinsmead v. Harrison. Bishop v. Montague (1601) Cro. Eliz. 824; Fenner, J., in Brown v. Wootton (1605) Cro. Jac. 73, 74; s. c., Yelv. 67; Moore, 762; Adams v. Broughton (1737) 2 Strange, 1078; s. c., Andrews, 18, 19; Buckland v. Johnson (1854) 15 C. B. 145, 157, 162, 163; Sergt. Manning's note to 6 Man. & Gr. 640. See Lamine v. Dorrell (1705) 2 Ld. Raym. 1216, 1217. And I should add that I see a relic of the ancient and true doctrine in the otherwise unexplained notion that when execution is satisfied the title of the defendant relates back to the date of the conversion. Hepburn v. Sewell (1821) 5 Har. & J. 211, 9 Am. Dec. 512; Smith v. Smith (1872) 51 N. H. 571, and (1870) 50 N. H. 212. Compare Atwater v. Tupper (1877) 45 Conn. 144, 147, 148, 29 Am. Rep. 674. The only authorities binding upon us are the ancient evidences of the common law as it was before the Revolution and our own decisions. I have shown what I think was the common law. Our own decisions leave the question open to be decided in accordance with it. Campbell v. Phelps (1822) 1 Pick. (Mass.) 62, 65, 70, 11 Am. Dec. 139; Bennett v. Hood (1861) 1 Allen (Mass.) 47, 79 Am. Dec. 705. Many cases in other states are collected in Freem. Judgments (4th Ed.) § 237."

For other cases on the point see 38 Cyc. 2112, notes 24, 25, and 26; 47 Cent. Dig. "Trover and Conversion," § 314; 19 Dec. Dig. "Trover and Conversion," § 70.

the amount thereof, must both concur, to vest the right of property in the defendant. But the question occurs, to what epoch shall the title of the defendant relate on his satisfying the amount of the judgment? And we think his title relates back to the time of the conversion. If the thing converted should from any cause, whether natural or artificial, be destroyed during the interval intervening between the period of conversion and the payment of the judgment, the loss must be sustained by the defendant; and it would seem to follow, that if the thing should improve in value during that period, the benefit ought to inure to the defendant, on the principle qui sentit onus, sentire debet et commodum.

It must be borne in mind that the plaintiff in an action of trover compels the defendant to become a purchaser against his will; and from what period does he elect to consider the defendant as a purchaser, or as answerable to him for the value of the thing converted? He selects the date of conversion as the epoch of the defendant's responsibility, and claims from him the value of the property at that period, with interest, to the time of taking the verdict. The inchoate right of the defendant as a purchaser must, therefore, be considered as coeval with the period of conversion, and his right being consummated by the judgment and its discharge, must, on equal and equitable principles, relate back to its commencement. The generality of our expressions must not be misunderstood; we do not mean to decide that in all cases of trover the payment of the damages assessed vests the right of property in the defendant. Thus, if property converted is returned and received by the owner before the institution of an action of trover, as damages could only be given for a partial conversion, the payment thereof would not divest the right of property out of the plaintiff and vest it in the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

(B) Elements of the Prima Facie Cause in Trover and Conversion

It is an action of trover. * * * In form it is a fiction; in substance, a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use. The form supposes the defendant may have come lawfully by the possession of the goods. This action lies, and has been brought in many cases where, in truth, the defendant has got the possession lawfully. Where the defendant takes them wrongfully, and by trespass, the plaintiff, if he thinks fit to bring this action, waives the trespass, and admits the possession to have been lawfully gotten. Hence, if the defendant delivers the thing upon demand, no damages can be recovered in this action, for having taken it.

This is an action of tort; and the whole tort consists in the wrongful conversion. Two things are necessary to be proved, to entitle the plaintiff to recover in this kind of action: First, property in the plaintiff; and secondly, a wrongful conversion by the defendant.

Lord Mansfield, in Cooper v. Chitty (1756) 1 Burr. 20, 31.

(a) The Plaintiff's Right in Conversion [23]

WILBRAHAM v. SNOW.

(Court of King's Bench, 1670. 2 Wms. Saund. 47, 85 Reprint, 624.)

Trover, upon special verdict, the case was this: the plaintiff, being sheriff, seized goods in execution by virtue of the writ of fieri facias; and afterwards, and before they were sold, the defendant took and carried them away, and converted them to his own use; for which the plaintiff brought his action. And on the first argument it was adjudged that the action well lies; and that the plaintiff, being sheriff, has such a property in the goods, by seizing them in execution, that he may maintain an action of trespass or trover at his election; and judgment was given for the plaintiff nisi, &c. but it was not moved afterwards.[24]

ARMORY v. DELAMIRIE.

(Court of King's Bench, at Nisi Prius, in Middlesex, Coram Pratt, C. J., 1722. 1 Str. 505, 93 Reprint, 664.)

The plaintiff being a chimney sweeper's boy found a jewel and carried it to the defendant's shop (who was a goldsmith) to know what it was, and delivered it into the hands of the apprentice, who under pretence of weighing it, took out the stones, and calling to the master to let him know it came to three halfpence, the master offered the boy the money, who refused to take it, and insisted to have the thing again; whereupon the apprentice delivered him back the socket without the stones. And now in trover against the master these points were ruled:

1. That the finder of a jewel, though he does not by such finding

[23] "The 'right to possession' which is necessary to found an action of trover is often described as a 'special property' in the goods. This is a most unfortunate expression: for in one of the best known cases it is expressly laid down that the term 'special property' includes interests which do not carry the right to possession, and which, therefore, are not sufficient to found actions of trover. See Webb v. Lawrence (1797) 7 T. R. at p. 398, per Lawrence, J. On the other hand, a person whose goods have been distrained for rent can sue a third party in trover. Turner v. Ford (1846) 15 M. & W. 212." J. C. Miles, in Dig. Eng. Civ. Law, Bk. II, Part III, 414.

[24] Elaborate notes to this case, by Serjeant Williams in 1802, and by later hands, touching many points in the doctrine of trover, will be found in the reports named.

acquire an absolute property or ownership, yet he has such a property as will enable him to keep it against all but the rightful owner, and consequently may maintain trover.[25]

2. That the action well lay against the master, who gives a credit to his apprentice, and is answerable for his neglect.

BUCKLEY v. GROSS et al.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1863. 3 Best & S. 566, 122 Reprint, 213, 129 R. R. 457.)

This was an action for the conversion of certain goods and chattels of the plaintiff, that is to say, a quantity of fat and tallow mixed together: to which the defendants pleaded Not guilty, and a traverse of the goods and chattels in the declaration being the goods and chattels of the plaintiff: on both of which pleas issue was joined.

[25] Accord: Bridges v. Hawkesworth (1851) 21 L. J. Q. B. 75, 91 R. R. 850: (P. had called at D.'s shop on business. As P. was leaving he noticed and picked up a small parcel which was lying on the floor. He immediately showed it to one of the shopmen and on opening it found that it contained bank notes to the value of £55. P. told D. that he had found a parcel of notes and requested D. to keep them to deliver to the owner. D. advertised for the owner, but without response. Three years having elapsed, and no owner appearing, P. applied to D. for the notes, offering to pay the expense of the advertisements and to indemnify D. against any claim. The latter refused to deliver the notes. P. sues for conversion.)

Compare McAvoy v. Medina (1866) 11 Allen (Mass.) 548, 87 Am. Dec. 733: (P., being a customer in D.'s barber shop, saw and took up a pocketbook which was lying upon a table there, and said, "See what I have found." D. came to the table and asked where P. found it. P. laid it back in the same place and said, "I found it right there." D. then took it and counted the money, and P. told him to keep it, and if the owner came to give it to him; otherwise to advertise it, which D. promised to do. Subsequently P. made three demands for the money, and D. never claimed to hold the same till the last demand. It was agreed that the pocketbook was placed upon the table by a transient customer of D. and accidentally left there, and was first seen and taken up by P., and that the owner had not been found. Said Dewey, J., delivering the opinion: "It seems to be the settled law that the finder of lost property has a valid claim to the same against all the world except the true owner, and generally that the place in which it is found creates no exception to this rule. 2 Parsons on Cont. 97; Bridges v. Hawkesworth (1851) 7 Eng. Law & Eq. R. 424. But this property is not, under the circumstances, to be treated as lost property in that sense in which a finder has a valid claim to hold the same until called for by the true owner. This property was voluntarily placed upon a table in the defendant's shop by a customer of his who accidentally left the same there and has never called for it. The plaintiff also came there as a customer, and first saw the same and took it up from the table. The plaintiff did not by this acquire the right to take the property from the shop, but it was rather the duty of the defendant when the fact became thus known to him, to use reasonable care for the safe keeping of the same until the owner should call for it. In the case of Bridges v. Hawkesworth the property, although found in a shop, was found on the floor of the same, and had not been placed there voluntarily by the owner, and the court held that the finder was entitled to the possession of the same except as to the owner.")

On the trial, it appeared that, in June, 1861, a severe fire broke out among some wharves and warehouses on the Surrey side of the river Thames below London Bridge. In those warehouses were deposited large quantities of fat and tallow, the property of different persons, which, being melted by the fire, flowed down into the main sewers, and was by them conveyed into the river, from both of which large portions of it were unwarrantably taken by different persons. Among these was one B., a servant in the employ of the Metropolitan Board of Works, who, having obtained some of the tallow, whether from the sewer or river did not appear, sold it to the plaintiff. Early on the morning of the 1st July, a policeman in one of the streets of the metropolis stopped a cart with the plaintiff and a boy in it conveying this tallow, which the plaintiff, on being questioned, said belonged to one M. The policeman took possession of the tallow, and charged the plaintiff and the boy before a magistrate with the possession of tallow supposed to have been stolen or unlawfully obtained, who dismissed the charge, but ordered the tallow to be detained under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, § 29, for regulating the police courts in the metropolis. The tallow was accordingly detained, and deposited in a yard with other portions of tallow which had been seized by the police from other persons, until, the whole becoming a nuisance, it was, in the course of a few days, taken away and sold by direction of Sir Richard Mayne, the Commissioner of the Police of the metropolis. The defendants were the purchasers of the tallow in question, and, having refused to deliver it up to the plaintiff on demand, this action was brought.

On this evidence a verdict was, under the direction of the learned Judge, entered for the defendants, with leave reserved to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for £12., the value of the tallow, if the Court should be of opinion that he had a sufficient property in it to maintain the action, it being agreed that the Court should be at liberty to draw any inferences of fact from the evidence that a jury might properly draw.

A rule nisi was accordingly obtained and argued.

CROMPTON, J. It is clearly established that possession alone is sufficient to maintain trover or trespass against a wrong-doer who takes property from a person having possession of it. It is not clear, however, that the plaintiff, or the person from whom he purchased this tallow, was a finder of it within the principle of Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Str. 505, and other cases. I think, on the evidence and the inferences to be fairly drawn from it, that he is more in the position of a person who has unlawfully or feloniously, perhaps the latter, obtained possession of it, whereas I look on the term "finder" in those cases to mean an innocent finder. This action must be founded on possession; here the possession was divested out of the plaintiff, and he cannot revert to a right of property to re-establish it. I agree with my LORD CHIEF JUSTICE that where possession is lawfully divested out of a man, and the property is ultimately converted by a person who does not claim through an original wrong-doer, the party whose possession was so divested had no property at the time of the conversion. Here, in my mind, the plaintiff's possession was gone. The goods were properly taken from him, and there is no such doctrine as that it will reinvest in him in the manner contended for; otherwise every person who was possessor of goods for any time, however short, might bring an action against any person afterwards found in possession of them, however he may have come by it. That would be pressing too far the doctrine of sufficient title against a wrong-doer. But here the plaintiff obtained the goods under circumstances which show that he knew they came from these burning warehouses. I cannot think that when property of different persons is mixed together, any third person does not commit a crime in taking it—I think he does. Neither is this a derelict—it is, as my brother Blackburn says, more like property seized by wreckers; and if I were obliged to draw an inference, I should say that the plaintiff came by it feloniously. I consider that it was the duty of the constable to take the tallow and the plaintiff into the custody of the law, and that even without reference to Stat. 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71. The defendants here do not claim under the constable, and, supposing they did, the constable did nothing wrong.[26]

Rule discharged.

AVERILL v. CHADWICK.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1891. 153 Mass. 171, 26 N. E. 441).

Tort for the conversion of two rabbits. At the trial there was evidence tending to show the following facts:

The plaintiff kept a provision store in Salem, and on March 2, 1889, exposed therein a pair of rabbits for sale. The defendant came to the store, and, after looking at the rabbits, told the plaintiff that he was an officer and should have to take them away. The plaintiff supposed from his statement that he was an officer, and, as he testified, let the defendant "take them; I did not give them to him or sell them; he (the defendant) said he should take them away, and he took them away." The defendant was a deputy of the board of game commissioners, and had no further authority either as a constable or otherwise. He acted upon the occasion in question under a direction of the game commissioners, to seize and remove all game unlawfully offered for sale. He had no warrant, and had received no order from any court to make the seizure, and his purpose was, as he testified, "to enforce the law as I understood the statute."

The judge ruled that there was no question of fact for the jury, and ordered a verdict for the plaintiff; the defendant alleged exceptions.

[26] The arguments of counsel are omitted, and the opinions of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Blackburn, J., with whom Crompton, J., concurred.

By the Court.[27] The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice Devens, and was adopted as the opinion of the court after his death by the Justices who sat with him at the argument.

We have no occasion to consider whether the rabbits, for the conversion of which this action is brought, were unlawfully exposed for sale in violation of the St. of 1886, c. 276, § 5, nor whether, upon proper proceedings had, they might have been adjudged to be forfeited. Without so deciding, we assume these positions in favor of the defendant's contentions. His own statement, which in the present posture of the case must be taken as correct, does not show him to have been either a constable or police officer, even if these officers could have made a seizure of the property without a warrant, which again we do not intend to decide. He was a deputy of the board of inland fisheries and game commissioners, and he stated that he had orders from them to seize and remove whatever of this nature was offered for sale unlawfully. He did not pretend that he had orders from any court, or any warrant, but took the rabbits to destroy them. It is quite clear that neither the commissioners nor their deputy could, without power, seize, remove, and destroy property, even though the same was unlawfully exposed for sale. No right to do this is given by the statute, nor is any authority cited to us which justifies it.

Even if the taking of the rabbits was unlawful, yet, the possession of them being illegal, it is the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff cannot avail himself of this illegal possession to maintain the action. In Commonwealth v. Rourke, 10 Cush. 397, it is held to be well established at common law that property unlawfully acquired may, nevertheless, be the subject of larceny; and it is said that "even he, who larceniously takes the stolen object from a thief whose hands have but just closed upon it, may himself be convicted therefor, in spite of the criminality of the possession of his immediate predecessor in crime." In Commonwealth v. Coffee, 9 Gray, 139, where the article stolen was intoxicating liquor, purchased in violation of the statute of Massachusetts, and intended to be sold in violation of the act, it was held to be the subject of larceny. Even, therefore, if, as we have assumed in the case at bar, the plaintiff might have forfeited and lost his property if it had been seized upon proper legal process, and it had appeared that it was kept for an illegal purpose, he was only to be deprived of it upon such proof, and by the methods which the law points out. In the plaintiff's hands the rabbits were still property, even if unlawfully kept for sale. If deprived of them by a wrongful seizure, the party taking them should be made responsible to him for their value. * * *

Exceptions overruled.

[27] A part of the opinion, on a question of defense, is omitted.

On the general principle involved compare the opinion of Mitchell, J., in Anderson v. Gouldberg (1892) 51 Minn. 294, 53 N. W. 636.

JONES v. WINSOR.

CORSON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order overruling his demurrer to the complaint. It is alleged in the complaint, in substance:

That on or about the 1st of April, 1907, the plaintiffs, being desirous of securing a franchise for a city railway system in the city of Sioux Falls, employed the defendant to act as an attorney for them in securing or attempting to secure an ordinance from the city council granting the plaintiffs such license; that carrying out their purpose, or attempting to carry out the same, it became necessary for the plaintiffs to make a deposit with the city treasurer, and on said day the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant the sum of $2,500 to be by him deposited with the said treasurer of the city, and which money was so deposited, as appears by the receipt of the treasurer of said city copied in the said complaint; that on or about the 4th day of April the defendant received a further sum of $130, which was to be used by the defendant for these plaintiffs in securing or attempting to secure the said franchise; that the said franchise which plaintiffs were attempting to secure from said city was not granted to these plaintiffs, and thereupon, about the 17th day of April, the city treasurer returned to the defendant the said sum of $2,500 "as money belonging to these plaintiffs and for their use and benefit"; that on or about the same day the said defendant rendered to these plaintiffs an account of all moneys received by him for and on account of these plaintiffs, with an itemized statement of all disbursements, and in connection therewith a pretended charge for his services or fee of $1,250, and with said account was a draft drawn in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,012.25; that the pretended charge of the defendant of the sum of $1,250 as shown upon said account and alleged to be for services rendered by him is unjust, unlawful, and fraudulent, and the reasonable value of the services rendered by the defendant was not and is not of the value of more than $250; that of the moneys so received by the defendant for and on behalf of these plaintiffs and for their use and benefit there remains in his hands the sum of $1,000, which he has refused and still refuses to pay over to these plaintiffs, although frequently requested so to do, and "he has wrongfully and fraudulently converted to his own use the said sum of $1,000"; that on or about the 10th day of September, 1907, the plaintiffs demanded of the said defendant payment of the aforesaid sum of money, being "the amount wrongfully and fraudulently retained by the said defendant at the time he made to the plaintiffs his accounting as aforesaid," and remitted to them by draft the sum of $1,012.25, with interest upon the said sum from April 17th, "but the said defendant then and there refused and still refuses to pay the same or any part thereof to the plaintiffs and has wrongfully converted the same to his own use." Wherefore "plaintiffs demand judgment against the said defendant for the sum of $1,000 and interest thereon from the 17th day of April, 1907, for the wrongful conversion of said property and for the costs of this action."

To this complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer on the ground that "said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

It is contended by the appellant that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in trover or conversion, for the reason that the complaint nowhere alleges ownership by the plaintiffs of the property alleged to have been converted at the time the action was brought; nor does it allege ownership or possession of the property in the plaintiffs at the time it is alleged to have been converted which is absolutely essential in the form of action. Assuming that the complaint in this case was intended to state an action for the conversion of this money by the defendant, it is clearly insufficient in not alleging that the plaintiffs, at the time the defendant is charged with having converted it, were the owners or in possession of the money so alleged to have been converted. In Irving v. Hubbard et al., 12 S. D. 67, 80 N. W. 156, this court, in discussing a similar question, uses the following language: "In actions for conversion the pleader must, of course, allege ownership or possession of the property in the plaintiff at the time it is alleged to have been taken." Smith v. Force, 31 Minn. 119, 16 N. W. 704; Sawyer v. Robertson, 11 Mont. 416, 28 Pac. 456; Kennett v. Peters, 54 Kan. 119, 37 Pac. 999, 45 Am. St. Rep. 274. * * *

The order of the circuit court overruling the demurrer is reversed.[28]

NICHOLS & SHEPARD CO. v. MINNESOTA THRESHING MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1897. 70 Minn. 528, 73 N. W. 415.)

Action of trover against the Minnesota Threshing Manufacturing Company. Finding for defendant. The plaintiff appeals from an order denying a new trial.

CANTY, J. The complaint alleges in substance, that in June, 1892, one Kenitzer was the owner of a threshing machine and engine, which was then in South Dakota, where Kenitzer then resided; that on that day he mortgaged the same to the plaintiff corporation to secure the payment of $325 then due by him to it, and that the mortgage was then duly recorded in the proper office in the county of his residence; that thereafter, in 1893, while said mortgage was in full force and effect, and after the conditions thereof were broken, and when plaintiff was entitled to the immediate possession of the mortgaged property, the defendant corporation obtained possession of all of the property, and "wrongfully converted the same to its own use." The answer is a general denial. On the trial before the court without a jury, the court found for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals. * * *[29]

2. The trial court found all of the facts hereinbefore stated, and found as a conclusion of law that plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The court seemed to be of opinion that these facts do not show a conversion. We are of the opinion that they do. True, the mortgage

[28] In an omitted portion of the opinion, the question whether, under the principle of the one form of action, the complaint could be construed as setting up a cause for money had and received, was considered at length, and answered in the negative.

[29] Part of the opinion is here omitted.

did not pass the title of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee, but is a mere lien. It is also true that the mortgagor had a vendible interest in the property. Defendant could not be held guilty of conversion if nothing more appeared than that it purchased the property from the mortgagor for an adequate consideration, which implies good faith. Kellogg v. Olson, 34 Minn. 103, 24 N. W. 364; Sanford v. Elevator Co., 2 N. D. 6, 48 N. W. 434. But something more does appear. Defendant sold the property to Hayden. The sale implies a warranty against incumbrances, including this lien (Benj. Sales [6th Ed.] 632), unless the contract of sale expressly provided to the contrary; and it does not appear that it did so provide. Then the finding that defendant sold the property to Hayden amounts to a finding that it "exercised dominion over the property in exclusion and defiance of the rights" of plaintiff, which will, in a case where the mortgage passes the legal title, amount to a conversion. See 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 108; Bish. Noncont. Law, 406. The same is true where the plaintiff has but a mere lien, if it entitled him to the immediate possession. 1 Jones, Liens (2d Ed.) 1035; Sanford v. Elevator Co., supra. The fact that it was not in the power of defendant to deprive plaintiff of its rights in the property is not the test of whether trover will lie. The defendant, being in possession, may be taken at its word; and, if it exercises a dominion over the property hostile to and inconsistent with the rights of plaintiff, the latter may maintain an action for conversion.

This disposes of the case. The order appealed from is reversed, and a new trial granted.

RAYMOND SYNDICATE v. GUTTENTAG.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1901. 177 Mass. 562, 59 N. E. 446.)

The superior court gave judgment for the plaintiff; the defendant brings exceptions. It appeared that the plaintiff's chattels were attached by the defendant while they were in the possession of one Wyman under a contract that he should have the use of them for a term not yet expired and then either purchase or return them.

BARKER, J. The declaration alleges "that the defendant has converted to his own use the property of the plaintiff." The bill of exceptions purports to state the facts of the case, and that the defendant requested rulings that the plaintiff could not recover upon the evidence, and that upon the evidence the plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of the goods, and consequently could not maintain the action. Both briefs are addressed to the question whether, upon the facts stated, the action would lie upon the declaration, and we therefore consider that question.

The declaration follows a statute form first given in St. 1851, c. 233, and which is also found in St. 1852, c. 312, Gen. St. c. 129, and

Pub. St. c. 167. None of these statutes abolished the action of trover. Each of them enacted that there should be only three divisions of personal actions, one of which divisions, actions of tort, has always included the action of trover by that name, the two first statutes designating it as the action "now known as trover," and the two last as the action "heretofore known as trover." St. 1851, c. 233, § 1; St. 1852, c. 312, § 1; Gen. St. c. 129, § 1; Pub. St. c. 167, § 1. Under the old practice, the owner of chattels could not maintain trover for their conversion, unless when the acts complained of were done he had possession or the right to immediate possession. Fairbank v. Phelps, 22 Pick. 535, and cases cited. The owner's remedy for damage to his reversionary interest in chattels, done when he had neither possession nor the right to immediate possession, was an action on the case. Ayer v. Bartlett, 9 Pick. 156; Forbes v. Parker, 16 Pick. 462. After the adoption of the practice acts, it was held that they made no change in the rules of evidence applicable to the causes of action comprehended under the designation of actions of tort, and that it was still necessary, under the statute form given for trover, that the evidence should be such as would have proved a conversion in an action of trover at common law. Robinson v. Austin, 2 Gray, 564; Winship v. Neale, 10 Gray, 382.

It is settled that to maintain tort under a declaration like the present one the plaintiff must show possession or the right to immediate possession. Winship v. Neale, 10 Gray, 382; Landon v. Emmons, 97 Mass. 37; Ring v. Neale, 114 Mass. 111, 19 Am. Rep. 316; Clapp v. Campbell, 124 Mass. 50; Baker v. Seavey, 163 Mass. 522, 526, 40 N. E. 863, 47 Am. St. Rep. 475; Field v. Early, 167 Mass. 449, 451, 45 N. E. 917. The ground of action of one not in possession, or having the right to immediate possession should be set forth in a different form. Baker v. Seavey, supra.

The facts stated show that, when the plaintiff's chattels were attached by the defendant, the plaintiff had neither possession nor the right to possession. There is nothing to show that the attachment of the goods worked a forfeiture of Wyman's right to retain and use them under his contract with the plaintiff, or gave the latter a right to retake them. See Ayer v. Bartlett, 9 Pick. 156, 160. Therefore the plaintiff could not recover in the action upon the facts, and the jury should have been instructed to that effect, in accordance with the defendant's requests. * * *[30]

[30] A portion of the opinion, on a question of the proper evidence of damage in conversion, is omitted

Compare Gordon v. Harper (1796) 7 T. R. 10: (Goods leased by P. to B. as furniture with a house were taken on execution by D., a sheriff, under an execution against S. The levy is wrongful. P. brings trover. The lease is still in force.)

(b) THE DEFENDANT'S ACT

(aa) As Part of the Plaintiff's Case

ATTERSOL v. BRIANT.

(At Nisi Prius, Adjourned Sittings in London, 1808. 1 Camp. 409.)

Trover for 5000 bricks. The case opened on the part of the plaintiff was, that the bricks in question had been sent to the defendant, to be carried by him as a common carrier, and delivered to one Stiles; that he had asserted to the plaintiff he had delivered them to Stiles accordingly; but that in truth he had not done so, and they had never reached Stiles's hands. Under these circumstances, it was contended, the defendant must be taken to have converted the bricks to his own use.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, however, said, that the facts stated were not sufficient evidence of a conversion to support an action of trover. Although the defendant might have been guilty of a tort respecting the bricks, it did not appear that he was guilty of the specific tort mentioned in the declaration. The action was therefore misconceived.

Plaintiff nonsuited.

DRUDE v. CURTIS.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1903. 183 Mass. 317, 67 N. E. 317, 62 L. R. A. 755.)

The plaintiff, an infant, made a contract of purchase from the defendant, also an infant, and paid the consideration. After the seller had spent the money so paid him, the plaintiff elected to avoid the contract, and brought trover for the consideration. The superior court ruled in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant brought exceptions.

HAMMOND, J. Both parties being infants at the time of the contract, either could avoid it without a return of the consideration. But neither could avoid it in part. He must avoid it wholly, if at all. And if the infant, when avoiding the contract, has in his hands any of the specific fruits, the act of avoiding the contract by which he acquired such property will divest him of all right to retain the same, and the other party may reclaim it. Chandler v. Simmons, 97 Mass. 508, 514, 93 Am. Rep. 117. The plaintiff, who was the buyer, sought first to exercise his right to avoid, and brought this action to recover the money; and, if the defendant also had not been an infant, he would have had no defense, upon the count in contract, because the law would have implied a contract upon his part to refund the money. But the difficulty with the plaintiff's case is that the defendant is meeting the plaintiff with a weapon like that used by him, to wit, avoidance of a contract on the ground of infancy. And while the infancy of the plaintiff is a shield to him, it does not prevent the defendant from relying upon his own infancy in turn as a shield to him. So far as respects the right of the defendant to take advantage of his own infancy, it is immaterial whether the plaintiff be an infant or an adult. Can the plaintiff recover in this action the money paid by him to the defendant? The defendant spent it before the plaintiff avoided the contract. His plea of infancy is a complete defense to the counts in contract. So the court ruled, and we do not understand that the correctness of this ruling is contested by the plaintiff. If at the time the plaintiff elected to avoid the contract the defendant had in his possession the same money which he received from the plaintiff, then since, by reason of the avoidance, the defendant had no right further to hold it, the plaintiff perhaps might have maintained replevin, or, upon proper proceedings taken, have maintained trover as for a subsequent conversion.

The plaintiff contends that trover will lie even if, at the time he avoided the contract, the money had been spent. But one great difficulty upon the facts in this case is to find any conversion, any tortious dealing with the money. There was no tortious act on the part of the defendant in obtaining it. It was paid to him to be held and used by him as his own money, in accordance with the terms of a contract which is not claimed to have had in it any element of fraud. There was nothing tortious in that. Having received it as his own money, he spent it as such, and all this the plaintiff, not yet having avoided the contract, must be held to have expected and consented to. There was, therefore, nothing tortious in any act of the defendant, with reference to the money, before the contract was avoided. Nor has the defendant been guilty of any tortious act since, unless it be his failure to refund an equal sum to the plaintiff; but that failure at the most can be considered only as a breach of an implied contract, and this the law permits him to avoid. To hold that, while for this failure to pay over under these circumstances he cannot be held in contract, but still can be held in tort, is to convert that which arises out of a contract into a tort, and to take away the shield which the law throws around the infant for his protection. Upon this theory money lent to an infant might be recovered. The plaintiff finds himself where any one is likely to be who places money into the hands of an infant with the right to spend it as his own money, and the right has been exercised. Upon this general subject see Slayton v. Barry, 175 Mass. 513, 56 N. E. 574, 49 L. R. A. 560, 78 Am. St. Rep. 510, and cases cited; Carr v. Clough, 26 N. H. 280, 59 Am. Dec. 345.

The plaintiff relies upon Walker v. Davis, 1 Gray, 506, as decisive in favor of the right to maintain this action, but an examination of the case will show that the ground upon which the decision was based in no way conflicts with the conclusion to which we have come. In that case, which was trover for the conversion of a cow, it appeared that the defendant, an infant, plied the plaintiff, who was an old man, with liquor until he became drunk, and then took advantage of the plaintiff's incompetent condition to trade for a cow. The defendant took the cow, and gave his note in payment. When the note became due, the plaintiff brought a suit upon it, in which the defendant prevailed upon the plea of infancy. The plaintiff then brought the suit in trover. The defense was that the plaintiff had waived the tort, and affirmed the contract, and also that, when the note fell due, the defendant had sold the cow, and parted with all control over her. The court held the action maintainable, disposing of the first ground of the defense by saying that, since the defendant also had avoided the contract, the plaintiff's attempted affirmance did not become operative, and, as to the second ground, that there had been a conversion, and consequently trover would lie. But the conversion relied upon was not the sale of the cow, but the taking at the time of the contract. The contract was voidable by the plaintiff upon the ground of fraud. Upon coming to his senses, the plaintiff might have rescinded the contract, and, without any demand, have brought trover for the cow upon the ground that she had been tortiously taken from him under a fraudulent contract (Thurston v. Blanchard, 22 Pick. 18, 33 Am. Dec. 700); and since, at the time of this suit, his right to rescind still existed, the remedy still existed. And the plea of infancy was no defense, because, in the language of Thomas, J.: "The defendant obtained the possession of * * * the cow by fraud, a fraud to which infancy would constitute no defense." It is thus seen that the action was sustained upon the ground that the original taking, being fraudulent, was tortious. No question seems to have been made as to whether infancy would have been a defense to such a fraud. The court assumed that it would not be a defense, and, having so assumed, held that the taking of the cow at the time of the contract was tortious. Walker v. Davis is therefore no authority for the contention that the subsequent spending of the money by the defendant in this case was tortious.

Exceptions sustained.

McCARTHY et al. v. HEISELMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, 1910. 140 App. Div. 240, 125 N. Y. Supp. 13.)

The action was against three defendants, for an alleged conversion. Two of the defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings, and appeal from an order refusing this judgment.

CARR, J. This action is to recover for an unlawful conversion of moneys belonging to the plaintiffs. There are three defendants. One is a boy, under age, and the other two are his parents. The complaint alleges that the boy was hired by the plaintiffs to work in their store with the consent of the parents, and that during the employment he turned over his wages to them. It then alleges that the boy from time to time "in the due course and line of his employment and without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, * * * took from the possession of the plaintiffs and unlawfully and illegally retained and kept, and converted to the use of the defendants, various small sums of money, aggregating, however, to about $1,000."

The defendant parents have moved for judgment on the pleadings, claiming that, as against them, the complaint states no cause of action. On a motion of this character the complaint is to be searched as on demurrer. A demurrer cannot be sustained simply because the facts in a complaint are averred imperfectly or informally, but the pleading will be deemed to allege whatever can be implied from its statements by fair and reasonable intendment. Kain v. Larkin, 141 N. Y. 144, 36 N. E. 9.

It will be noted that the complaint does not state that the parents have received from the boy the moneys which he stole, nor aver that the stealing was done at their suggestion or with their consent. The pleading does state that the boy gave his wages to the parents, and the pleaders contend that there is a fair implication that he likewise turned over his stealings to them. To hold this would push the doctrine of fair intendment or implication to an absurd length. It is clearly not permissible here. It is true that the essence of a conversion is not an evil intent, and that the exercise of an unlawful dominion over the chattel or personal property, even in good faith, may constitute a conversion. Boyce v. Brockway, 31 N. Y. 490. And, where a complaint sets forth the receipt or possession of the chattel by the defendant in order to charge conversion, it is not necessary to specify in detail the tortious acts of dominion exercised by the defendant, and a mere statement that he "converted it to his own use" will be held sufficient. Decker v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. 313.

Yet, in this pleading, the charge is that the boy converted the moneys, not simply to his own use, but "to the use of the defendants," including himself and his parents. As to them, there is no allegation of a taking or possession on their part on which can be based any implication of the exercise by them of a dominion over the chattels. If, however, the action be treated as one for money had and received, there is likewise no sufficient allegation in the complaint that the parents ever received and had the moneys in question. The complaint states a good cause of action for conversion by the boy, but none as against the parents, unless they are to be held liable for the boy's tort. The general rule of the common law is that a parent is not liable for the torts of a child without some participation on his part in the unlawful act. Tifft v. Tifft, 4 Denio, 175; 29 Cyc. 1665. Such participation is to be alleged and proved. It is not presumed, as a matter of law, from the simple relation of parent and child.

The facts of the case as developed on a trial may give rise to a presumption of fact, as in Beedy v. Reding, 16 Me. 362, and Hower v. Ulrich, 156 Pa. 410, 27 Atl. 37. In both these cases the parent was held liable for the trover of minor children who carried away wood and corn from third persons, and the parent kept and used the articles. These cases were decided, however, on the theory that the parent by his acts had either constituted the child as his agent or had subsequently ratified an implied agency. The liability arose clearly not from the relation of parent, but from the principles of agency. In the pleading before us, there is no fact alleged to indicate any agency of the boy for the parents in the conversion or the disposition of the proceeds of the conversion. Was the boy in this case, while employed by the plaintiffs, the agent of his parents in any aspect? It is true he went into the plaintiffs' service with the consent of his parents, and turned over his wages to them. This fact alone does not make him the servant of his parents while engaged in the service of another. To hold otherwise would enlarge the scope of a parent's liability for the torts of a child beyond reasonable limits, and lead to a result not only most inconvenient, but contrary to the common understanding.

The order should be reversed with $10 costs and disbursements, and the motion for judgment granted, unless within 20 days the plaintiffs apply at Special Term and obtain leave to serve an amended complaint. All concur.

(bb) Conversion through Demand and Refusal

MAGEE v. SCOTT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1851. 9 Cush. 148, 55 Am. Dec. 49.)

SHAW, C. J. This is an action of trover for furniture, in which a verdict was found for the plaintiff, and the case comes before us on the defendant's exceptions. This cause has been very elaborately argued, but, when understood, it appears to us to be governed by a few plain principles. It turns upon the directions of the judge, who tried the cause, in matter of law.

It is to be regretted that the facts appearing on the trial, showing the relations of the parties, and the circumstances under which the goods, admitted to be the property of the plaintiff, came into the possession of the defendant, are not stated, in order to show the application of the rule of law laid down by the court. Such circumstances will usually indicate what was the nature and character of such change of possession, whether in consequence of a sale or temporary loan, or how.

The plaintiff is proved to be the owner of the property, and that right of property will continue until a change proved as by sale, lien, or voluntary loan. Whoever relies on such change must prove it; the proof lies on him. All that appears in the present case is, that the property came into the possession of the defendant, with the plaintiff's consent.

How? On what trust or contract? This does not appear. Demand of the goods was made, and a refusal to deliver them by the defendant to the plaintiff, on such demand, before action brought, and this is evidence of a conversion, conclusive, if not rebutted.[31] We are then called on to consider the directions given by the judge on the trial.

The first was, that presumption of ownership continues until some alienation is shown. This is correct. A party having this ownership does not lose it, by permitting another to be in possession. The ordinary mode of proving property is, proving that it was purchased and paid for, and it will be deemed in law to be the purchasers' until something is shown to change the title, and merely parting with the possession affords no conclusive evidence of such change. Possession is prima facie evidence of title, good against everybody but one proving property; that is, against any one but the right owner. Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Stra. 505. This case of the chimney sweeper's boy, from Strange, well illustrates these principles. A chimney sweeper's boy, having found a jewel, carried it to a goldsmith, to ascertain its value, but the goldsmith, by his apprentice, detained it, and refused to restore it. The boy having brought trover, it was held that his possession was some evidence of property, good against any one but the true owner, and that he could maintain trover for it, on such prima facie proof of title; and that refusal to restore it to him, on demand, was evidence of a conversion.

The defendant's possession was prima facie evidence of title in him, but it was rebutted by proof of prior possession, and actual ownership, on the part of the plaintiff. The burden of proof was on her, and she sustained it by proof of title.

Exceptions overruled and judgment on the verdict for the plaintiff.

SEVERIN v. KEPPEL.

(At Nisi Prius, Sittings after Term, at Westminster, 1803. 4 Esp. 156.)

This was an action of trover, for several articles of plate and plated goods, stated in the declaration.

The defendant was a silversmith; and they had been delivered to him for the purpose of putting glasses into them. He had been applied to, on many occasions, for the articles so delivered to him; he made excuses, and said, the glass was not come from the glass-blower's; there was no denial at any time to deliver the goods, but rather excuses for not delivering them: however, in one instance, the defendant admitted that the glass was come home; but he then said, his wife was out, and he could not deliver them. He afterwards delivered the plated goods, and said he had sent the silver ones home, which was not true.

[31] Compare the remark of Coke, C. J., in Isaack v. Clark (1613) 2 Bulst. 306, 314: "In this case we do all of us agree in this, that prima facie, a denyer upon a demand is a good evidence to a jury of a conversion; but if the contrary be shewed, then the same is no conversion."

And see the remark of Holt, C. J., in Baldwin v. Cole (1704) 6 Mod. 212: "The very denial of goods, to him that has a right to demand them, is an actual conversion, and not only evidence of it, as has been holden." On the point see also Salmond, Torts (2d Ed.) 297, 298.

It was objected by the defendant's counsel, that on the evidence given, there was no conversion sufficient to support the action of trover.

Erskine, for the plaintiff, contended, That the defendant having, in the last instance, admitted his possession of the goods, and having made a frivolous and false pretence for not delivering the articles, after his repeated excuses before made, that it was evidence of conversion sufficient to go to the jury; particularly from the circumstance of his having returned the plated goods, and pretended to have sent home the other; which was not the case.

Lord Ellenborough said, he thought the plaintiff should be non-suited, as there was no evidence to sustain the action in its present form: that what begins in contract, a non-performance of what the party so undertakes to do; or a bare non-delivery of what he undertakes to deliver, is not to be considered as of itself amounting to a tortious conversion. There was a case in the Court of King's Bench some time ago, in which that principle was recognized. It was an action of trover against a carrier, for not delivering goods. If a carrier says he has the goods in the warehouse, and refuses to deliver them, that will be evidence of conversion, and trover may be maintained; but not for a bare non-delivery, without any such refusal. So in this case, the goods were delivered to the Defendant to work upon. There was no evidence of any refusal by him to deliver them; but, on the contrary, he makes excuses for not doing it. The plaintiff must be called.[32]

[32] Compare Whiting v. Whiting (1913) 111 Me. 13, 87 Atl. 381: D. held eight $1,000 bonds for his brother, who assigned them to his wife, P. She made a demand upon D. at his residence in his last illness, shortly before his death. D. kept the bonds in a safe deposit box away from his residence, and when the demand was made said that he could not deliver the bonds because the grandfather of his brother's children by his first wife had requested him not to do so. Held that, as there was no evidence of a negation of the owner's right, there was no conversion. And see, in general, as to what amounts to a refusal, 38 Cyc. 2039–2040, notes 18–24: 47 Cent. Dig. RUSHWORTH v. TAYLOR.

Trover for a gun. Plea, not guilty. On the trial before Lord Denman, C. J., it appeared that the plaintiff, in July or August, 1839, put the gun into the possession of one Cross, to be sold. Cross, with the view of obtaining a purchaser, lent it to one Todd; and Todd lent it to the defendant to try. Defendant overcharged the gun, and burst it. Plaintiff afterwards wrote to the defendant as follows:

"Mr. George Taylor: I hereby give you notice that the double-barrelled gun you received from Robert Todd, which he received from Thomas Cross, who had previously received the same from me for the purpose of making sale thereof, is my property; and I hereby demand the same of you, and require you forthwith to deliver the same to me in the same plight and condition as the said gun was in at the time you received the same from the hands of the said Robert Todd. Dated this 11th day of March, 1840.

"John Rushworth."

Defendant said that he would not pay for the repair of the gun. He afterwards redelivered it to Todd, for the purpose, as he said, of his taking it to a gunmaker's; and it was then taken (but by whom it did not distinctly appear) to a gunsmith at Hull, and remained in the possession of the gunsmith or of the defendant, never having been restored to the plaintiff, when this action was brought.

The Lord Chief Justice thought it difficult to say that the qualified demand contained in the letter (that the gun should be delivered up "in the same good plight," &c.), and the refusal which followed, were, of themselves, proof of a conversion; and he directed the jury to find for the defendant on the first count, if, in their opinion, there had been no denial of the plaintiff's right. Verdict for defendant on all the issues.

W. H. Watson now moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and contended that the demand and refusal, if not of themselves evidence of a conversion, fully proved it when coupled with the other facts of the case, to which the jury's attention had not been sufficiently directed in the summing up. (LORD DENMAN, C. J. The claim in trover was founded on a demand and refusal; and the demand was that the gun should be delivered in the same good plight as when the defendant received it. Refusal of such a demand is different from refusing altogether to restore.)

WILLIAMS, J. The case was properly put to the jury as to the demand and the refusal. A demand of the article in statu quo was not a demand on which, in case of refusal, a charge of conversion could be founded. The rest of the evidence did not bear out the declaration.

COLERIDGE, J. I am of the same opinion. The qualified demand could not be complied with; and the rest of the evidence was not clear enough to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

LORD DENMAN, C. J., and WIGHTMAN, J., concurred.

Rule refused.

SMITH v. YOUNG.

(At Nisi Prius, 1808. 1 Camp. 439.)

Trover by Smith, as assignee of a bankrupt, for a lease assigned by the bankrupt to the defendant after an act of bankruptcy. * * *

When the lease was demanded the defendant said "he would not deliver it up; but it was then in the hands of his attorney, who had a lien upon it for a small sum of money due to him."

Garrow, for the plaintiff, contended that the attorney's possession of the lease was in law the possession of the defendant, who must be considered as having a complete control over it, and that the lien did not, under these circumstances, prevent the refusal to deliver up the deed from amounting to a conversion.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. The defendant would have been guilty of a conversion if it had been in his power; but the intention is not enough. There must be an actual tort. To make a demand and refusal sufficient evidence of a conversion, the party when he refuses must have it in his power to deliver up or to detain the article demanded.[33]

Plaintiff nonsuited.

WRIGHT v. FRANK A. ANDREWS CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1912. 212 Mass. 186, 98 N. E. 798.)

This was an action by Wright, in tort or contract, for the conversion of a diamond ring or for breach of contract in failure to deliver the ring. The court refused the following request presented by the defendant:

"Eighth. If at the time of the demand upon the defendant by the plaintiff for the delivery of the ring, the ring was not then in the possession of the defendant, the refusal of the defendant to deliver the ring would not constitute conversion."

There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions.

SHELDON, J. The jury could find that the plaintiff purchased a particular diamond of the defendant, the title to which at once passed to [33] Part of the case, raising a question of evidence, is omitted. Reporter's query: "If the defendant had said he had delivered the deed to his attorney, would this have amounted to evidence of a conversion?"

Accord: De Young v. Frank A. Andrews Co. (1913) 214 Mass. 47, 100 N. E. 1080: "When the plaintiff relies upon demand and refusal as independent and basic evidence of conversion, it must appear that at the time of the demand and refusal the defendant has the control of the article so as to be able to comply with the demand; and the burden of proving all this is upon the plaintiff. Lord Ellenborough in Smith v. Young (1808) 1 Camp. 439, 441; 2 Greenl. on Ev. 644, and cases cited. See also, Johnson v. Couillard (1862) 4 Allen (Mass.) 446; Gilmore v. the plaintiff, but that he left it with the defendant to be set in a ring, for the whole price of $500, of which he paid down the sum of $100. They also could find that the stone was set in the ring to his satisfaction and acceptance, and that the defendant then retained it until he should make full payment therefor. The plaintiff, as it could be found, could not then pay the residue of the price, and after a considerable delay made an offer to the defendant to rescind the purchase and take back what he had paid; but the defendant did not accept this offer. After still further delay he tendered the balance due to the defendant and demanded the ring, and the defendant merely answered that it did not then have the ring but could get it. By the tender any lien which the defendant had upon the ring was ended, and the plaintiff was entitled to immediate possession thereof, as could be found, but the defendant refused to give it to him. If so, he was entitled to maintain an action for its conversion. Gilmore v. Newton, 9 Allen, 171, 85 Am. Dec. 749; Milliken v. Hathaway, 148 Mass. 69, 19 N. E. 16, 1 L. R. A. 510. The jury need not believe the defendant's testimony that it was not then in possession of the ring. * * *

The eighth request contained a correct statement of the law so far as it went. Johnson v. Couillard, 4 Allen, 446. But it ought not to have been given without leaving it also to the jury to say whether before the demand and refusal the defendant had parted with or converted the ring, or otherwise by its merely wrongful act had disabled itself from delivering it to the plaintiff (Gilmore v. Newton, 9 Allen, 171, 85 Am. Dec. 749; Milliken v. Hathaway, 148 Mass. 69, 19 N. E. 16, 1 L. R. A. 510), or whether the ring, even if not in the immediate possession of the defendant, was yet not within its full control, as the statement of its president testified to by the plaintiff indicated.

DUNLAP v. HUNTING.

(Supreme Court of New York, 1846. 2 Denio, 643, 43 Am. Dec. 763.)

Dunlap sued Hunting before a justice in trover for two law books; and the case was as follows:

The plaintiff was a constable of Ovid, Seneca Co., and had a warrant from the president of a court-martial to collect a fine from the defendant. The plaintiff went to the defendant's office in Farmerville, and levied upon two of his law books, which were left in the defendant's possession on his agreeing to deliver them to the plaintiff at some future time. The plaintiff afterwards saw the defendant at Ovid, and demanded the books. The defendant replied, either that he had not got the books, or that he would not give them up; the impression of the witness was, that he said he had not got the books.

BRONSON, C. J. The proof leaves it somewhat uncertain where and when the books were to be delivered. But assuming that they were to be delivered at the defendant's office in Farmerville on demand, it was not indispensable to a right of action that the demand should be made at that place. Property may be demanded of a bailee wherever he may be at the time, and although he is not bound to deliver it at that place. And then if the bailee answer that he is ready to deliver at the proper place, there will be no breach of his duty. But if he deny the right of the bailor and refuse to deliver the property at all, there could be no use in making another demand, and the bailee will be answerable in the proper action. Scott v. Crane, 1 Conn. 255; Higgins v. Emmons, 5 Id. 76, 13 Am. Dec. 41; Slingerland v. Morse, 8 Johns. 474; Mason v. Briggs, 16 Mass. 453; 2 Kent, 508. Now here, although the demand was made at Ovid, if the defendant's answer was that he would not give up the books, that was a full denial of the plaintiff's right, and no further demand could be necessary. If the answer was that he had not got the books, that would make a more doubtful case. But as the defendant did not intimate that he had lost the books, or that anything had happened to discharge his obligation as a bailee, the answer involved a denial of the bailment and amounted to a refusal to deliver the property. At least, the answer may have been so understood by the jury. A bailee is not at liberty to be silent when a reasonable demand is made, though not at the place for delivery. Higgins v. Emmons, 5 Conn. 76, 13 Am. Dec. 41. Here, there was nothing like a satisfactory answer, and I think the evidence was sufficient to carry the cause to the jury. * * *[35]

3. It was held by the court on the verdict that if in trover and conversion an actual taking of goods is given in evidence, this is sufficiently good without proving a demand and denial, as the taking of my cap from my head; for that is actual conversion; but when the thing comes by trover, there ought to be an actual demand, etc.[36]

IRISH v. CLOYES et al.

(Supreme Court of Vermont, 1836. 8 Vt. 30, 30 Am. Dec. 446.)

Trover. Verdict for the defendants. The plaintiff excepted to the charge to the jury.

REDFIELD, J. In relation to the first point decided by the court here, the question arose in reference to certain "mill logs," which were on the land, conveyed by plaintiff to defendants. There was evidence in the case, that the plaintiff had also sold this lumber to defendants. But this point being controverted, it became necessary to inquire whether any sufficient evidence of a conversion by defendants had been given. The only evidence relied upon was, that after the conveyance of the land, some stranger wishing to purchase the logs, applied to defendants for permission to purchase them of plaintiff. The defendants refused to give any such permission or consent, on the alleged ground that they had already bought the logs of plaintiff. The case finds that the defendants had not in any other way whatever interfered with the property in question.

For the purposes of the consideration of this question it is to be conceded that the "logs" were the property of the plaintiff. And we have no doubt that the mere assertion by defendants, that the property belonged to them, is not in any sense evidence of a conversion, or from which a conversion can be inferred. If this assertion had been made in plaintiff's presence, and at a time when he claimed to take possession of the logs, and for the purpose of deterring him therefrom, it might merit a different consideration. But made as it was to a stranger, and not in the presence of plaintiff, or within view of the logs, it would be too much to say this is evidence from which the jury could be permitted to infer a conversion of the property by defendants.

This is in accordance with the decisions which have been had upon analogous cases. Any mere assertion of the right of dominion is never permitted to go to the jury, in cases of trover, as evidence of a conversion, unless the assertion is made in view of the property, and in presence of the owner, and in order to deter him from exercising his just control over it. A demand and refusal are evidence of a conversion only when the defendant had, at the time of the demand, the actual custody of the property, so that he might have delivered it if he would. Hence in the case of title deeds, which had been wrongfully pledged to an attorney, but were in the custody of the attorney, it was held at nisi prius, and the decision has always been acquiesced in, that a demand upon the defendant and a refusal, under the circumstances, lowing comment on this case: "The actual taking there described is a taking intentionally without or against the consent of the person in possession. The trover implies an actual possession, but is held to be insufficient to constitute a conversion, because consistently with it the defendant may not be claiming anything more than the mere custody of the goods."

was not evidence of a conversion. Smith v. Young, 1 Com. 439, 1 Camp. 439. And a false assertion by a carrier that he had delivered the goods, does not amount to a conversion. Attersol v. Briant, Id. 409, 1 Camp. 409. And in every case where a demand and refusal is permitted to go to the jury as evidence of a conversion, it must be preceded by evidence that the goods are in defendant's possession, or what is equivalent, in the possession of his servant, with his knowledge or by his consent, either express or implied. Bull. N. P. 44, cited 3 Stark. Ev. 1497, and also 2 Salk. 441, Jones v. Hart.

ELDRED v. OCONTO CO.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1873. 33 Wis. 133.)

This is an action to recover the possession of 1,446 pine saw logs, which the complaint alleges were unlawfully detained by the defendant from the plaintiff. The complaint is in the usual form, alleging that the plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the logs. The answer is the general denial. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment, and the defendant appealed.

LYON, J. * * * The court refused to give the following instructions prayed for on behalf of the defendant:

"If the logs, taken from the land of the plaintiff, were taken by a party or parties other than the defendant, and the defendant purchased said logs in good faith, without knowledge how they came into the possession of said third party or parties, then the defendant is not liable in this action without a previous demand."

* * * The testimony tends to show that the logs in controversy were purchased in good faith by the defendant, of parties who wrongfully took the same from the lands of the plaintiff * * * the defendant supposing and believing that their vendors owned the logs; and no demand therefor was made before this action was commenced. The question is, whether, under these circumstances, a demand is necessary before an action to recover the logs can be maintained against the defendant.

It must be conceded that in New York the courts have uniformly held, that where property which has been wrongfully taken from the owner, comes into the hands of an innocent third party, an action to recover it cannot be maintained by the owner against such bona fide holder thereof, until after demand. But we find a decided weight of authority the other way, and we are satisfied that the New York rule is not sound in principle.

The subject is fully discussed and numerous authorities cited, in the cases of Stanley v. Gaylord, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 536, 48 Am. Dec. 643; Galvin v. Bacon, 11 Me. 28, 25 Am. Dec. 258; and Smith v. McLean, 24 Iowa, 322. The head note to the latter case is as follows: "Demand of possession before commencing an action of replevin need be made only in those cases where it is necessary to terminate the right of possession in the defendant and confer it upon the plaintiff. Where both parties claim title and the right of possession incident thereto, no demand is necessary." This is precisely such a case. Both parties here "claim title and the right of possession incident thereto." In the Maine and Massachusetts cases above cited it was held that if the bailee of a chattel, without authority to retain or sell it, does sell or mortgage such a chattel, even to a person who believes that he may lawfully do so, and the purchaser or mortgagee takes possession of the same, trover or replevin can be maintained therefor against such innocent purchaser or mortgagee, by the owner, without previous demand. These are not as strong cases for the plaintiff as this, because in this case there was never any bailment of the logs. It is not deemed necessary to enter into a full discussion of the question. It is sufficient to say that we approve of the doctrine of the above cases, and adopt the same as the law of this case.

But it is said that this doctrine is only applicable where the complaint charges a wrongful taking. We do not think that this position can be maintained. By omitting to allege in his complaint that the original taking was tortious, the plaintiff does not admit that the taking was lawful, or preclude himself from showing that it was, in fact, a wrongful taking. And by proving its tortious character he demonstrates that the detention of the logs by the defendant is unlawful. In other words, by proving a state of facts which renders a demand unnecessary, he proves the gravamen of his action, to wit, the unlawful detention of the logs. * * * [37]

(2) Different Forms of Such Conversion

DENCH v. WALKER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1780. 14 Mass. 500.)

Trover for four hogsheads of rum. On the trial, the evidence appeared thus: Walker undertook to transport from Boston to Springfield the four hogsheads of rum for the plaintiff. At the time of the delivery to Walker, the rum was good; but on its arrival at Springfield, it was much adulterated and greatly lessened in value; and whether it was thus adulterated by the defendant himself, or by his servant, the teamster, did not appear. It was objected that trover did not lie in this case.

But CUSHING, C. J., with the rest of the Court, held that it will lie For the alteration of the quality of the liquor undertaken to be transported, whether it was done by the defendant or his servant, was an unlawful conversion. Vide Holt, 528.

[37] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point.

KEYWORTH v. HILL et ux.

(Court of King's Bench, 1820. 3 Barn. & Ald. 684, 106 Reprint, 811.)

Trover against husband and wife, for a bond and two promissory notes. The declaration stated that the defendants converted and disposed of the same to their own use, plea, not guilty. After verdict for the plaintiff, a rule was obtained in last Easter term for arresting the judgment, on the ground that no action could be supported against the husband and wife for converting goods to their own use, inasmuch as the wife could acquire no property, and the conversion must be by the husband only, and Berry v. Nevys, Cro. Jac. 661, was cited.

ABBOTT, C. J. The question, in this case, arises upon a motion in arrest of judgment. The ground of the objection is, that inasmuch as a married woman cannot acquire property, the conversion of the property can only be the act of the husband, and must be so charged. If the allegation in the declaration, that the defendants converted the property to their own use, necessarily imported an acquisition of property by them, there would be considerable weight in the objection. It seems to me, however, that that is not the necessary import of the expression, for a conversion may be by an actual destruction of the property. And if the allegation does not necessarily import that the defendants acquired a property, we are bound, after the verdict, to consider the conversion to have taken place by other means than by the acquisition of property. I am, therefore, of opinion that the declaration is sufficient, and that this rule should be discharged.

BAYLEY, J. It is quite clear that in trespass the husband and wife might be jointly sued. The reason of which is, that the action is founded on the wrongful act of the defendants. Now, it seems to me, that the action of trover is founded on the tort also. The cases cited on the part of the defendant proceed upon the supposition that the conversion could only take place by the defendants acquiring a property. It seems to me, however, that in trover the foundation of the action is not the acquisition of property by the defendants, but the deprivation of property to the plaintiffs. If the wife were to take up a book, and her husband desired her to put it in the fire and burn it and she did burn it, that would be a conversion, and yet the husband and wife would acquire no property; so, if a man takes my horse and rides it, I may bring trover for the temporary conversion. And if there can be any case of a conversion without an ultimate change of property, we are bound, after verdict, to imply that it was such a conversion as the wife might be guilty of.

Rule discharged.[38]

[38] The arguments of counsel and the concurring opinions of Holroyd and and Best, JJ., are omitted. Best, J., remarked: "There may be a distinction between detinue and trover: in the former, the plaintiff seeks to recover the goods in specie; in the latter he only asks for damages." And see

CROSSIER v. OGLEBY.

(Court of King's Bench, 1717. 1 Str. 60, 93 Reprint, 385.)

Trover by an administrator for rum taken and converted in the intestate's life. Upon evidence it appeared, that the rum was taken in the intestate's life, but not used till after his death. And the question was, whether this evidence of not using it till the administrator's time would not overthrow the declaration of a conversion in the intestate's life.

Sed PER CURIAM. The time of using the rum lay in the breast of the defendant, who ought to have disclosed that matter by his plea: and the taking in the life of the intestate, and keeping it till his death, is a trover and conversion sufficient to maintain this declaration. Wherefore the plaintiff had judgment, this being a point reserved at nisi prius.[39]

TINKLER v. POOLE et al.

(Court of King's Bench, 1770. 5 Burrows, 2657, 98 Reprint, 396.)

This was an action of trover for goods seized by a Custom-House officer. It was a parcel of herrings seized by him for not having satisfied the salt-duty, and carried by him to the King's warehouse. It was agreed that they were not seizable: and the only question was "whether this species of action lay against the officer, for seizing them and carrying them away."

Serjeant Glynn, for the plaintiff, argued that it did. The conversion, he said, was the substantial part of the action: the trover is fictitious. The defendant had no authority to take them. He took them wrongfully. He was a wrong-doer. He acquired a tortious property of them in himself. * * *[40]

Isaac v. Clarke (1613) 2 Bulstr. 308, per Doddridge, J.: "If goods are delivered to husband and wife, no action of detinue lies against them both for these, but against the husband alone."

[39] "Trover also became concurrent with trespass. In 1601 the Court of King's Bench decided that trover would lie for a taking. In the same year the Court of Common Pleas was equally divided on the question, but in 1604, in the same case, it was decided, one judge dissenting, that the plaintiff might have his election to bring trespass or case. The Exchequer gave a similar decision in 1610, Leverson v. Kirk, 1 Roll. Ab. 105, (M), 10. In 1627, in Kinaston v. Moore, Cro. Car. 89, 'semble per all the Justices and Barons, * * * although he take it as a trespass, yet the other may charge him in an action upon the case in a trover if he will.' In all these cases the original taking was adverse." James Barr Ames, in "History of Trover," 11 Harv. Law Rev. 384, 3 Anglo-Amer. Leg. Essays, 442. See also the opinion of Parke, J., in Norman v. Ball (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 190.

[40] In the omitted portion of the argument two nisi prius cases of half a century before were discussed by counsel and Judges: Etriche v. An Officer of the Revenue (1720) Bunbury, 67, and Israel v. Etheridge (1721) Bunbury, 80. In the former, "upon an information of seizure of goods, there had been a verdict for the defendant, who afterwards brought trover against the officer, for the goods. The Attorney General objected, that trover did not lie for these goods, for that the seizure of them and putting them into the Custom-House warehouse could not be said to be any conversion to its own use, but trespass, or trespass upon the case; and Mr. Attorney insisting upon a special verdict, and the Chief Baron inclining to be of that opinion, 'that trover would not lie,' the plaintiff chose to be nonsuited." Lord Mansfield said: "Mr. Bunbury never meant that those cases should have been published; they are very loose notes."

LORD MANSFIELD, who tried the present cause, said he saved this point, upon the cases cited out of Bunbury, by the counsel for the defendants. But nothing is clearer, than "that trover lies." It is a wrongful conversion; let the property be in whom it will.

The case of Chapman v. Lamb, in 2 Strange, 943, was mentioned by Mr. Wallace; which was subsequent to the others, being in Michaelmas term 6 G. II. It was trover against a Custom-House officer for 14 shirts, a nightgown, and cap, seized for non-payment of duty; which were stated, negatively, and "not to be imported as merchandize." The plaintiff had judgment; without any objection to its being an action of trover.

The court ordered the postea to be delivered to the plaintiff.

In the latter case Baron Price is reported as saying "that trover did not lie against an officer, for seizure absque probabili causa; but trespass would." Baron Montague was of opinion "that neither trover nor trespass would lie, because the seizure is not contra pacem: but that trespass upon the case, setting forth that the seizure was absque probabili causa, would lie."

See also Professor Ames' remark: "Trespass, as the learned reader will remember, would not lie, originally, for a wrongful distress; the taking in such a case not being in the nature of a disseisin. In time, however, trespass became concurrent with replevin. History repeats itself in this respect, in the development of trover. In Dee v. Bacon (1595) Cro. El. 435, the defendant pleaded to an action of trover that he took the goods damage feasant. The plea was adjudged bad as being an argumentative denial of the conversion. Salter v. Butler, Noy, 46, and Agars v. Lisle (1613) Hutt. 10, were similar decisions, because, as was said in the last case, 'a distress is no conversion.' The same doctrine was held a century later in two cases in Bunbury. But in 1770, in Tinkler v. Poole, 5 Burr. 2657, these two cases, which simply followed the earlier precedents, were characterized by Lord Mansfield as 'very loose notes,' and ever since that case it has been generally agreed that a wrongful distress is a conversion. This last step being taken, trover became theoretically concurrent with all of our four actions, appeal of larceny, trespass, detinue, and replevin, and in practice the common remedy in all cases of asportation or detention of chattels or of their misuse or destruction by a defendant in possession. The career of trover in the field of torts is matched only by that of assumpsit, the other specialized form of action on the case, in the domain of contract." History of Trover (1898) 11 Harv. Law Rev. 385, 3 Anglo-Am. Leg. Essays, 444.

RAMSBY v. BEEZLEY.

(Supreme Court of Oregon, 1883. 11 Or. 49, 8 Pac. 288.)

LORD, J. This was an action of trover, and the only question involved in the case is, what will constitute a conversion? It originated in the refusal of the court to give certain instructions asked by the defendant, and an exception to an instruction given, based upon evidence tending to show about this state of facts: That the plaintiff was the owner of the cattle in controversy by purchase from one Smith, which were running at large on the range; that the defendant sold them to Strickland, and received therefor the sum of $500, and that the plaintiff has never seen nor had possession of the cattle since. The defendant admitted that he sold the cattle to Strickland, received the money for them, and "believed and supposed that Strickland had took them," but there was no evidence that the defendant ever exercised any other actual control or dominion over the cattle than such sale to Strickland, or that he actually delivered them to him, or that Strickland ever gathered the cattle in pursuance of such sale, except what may be inferred from the fact that the plaintiff has never seen, nor had possession of his cattle, since the sale, and the payment for the cattle, and the admission of the defendant that he believed and supposed that Strickland had taken the cattle.

Upon this state of facts the court gave the following instruction to the jury, to which the defendant excepted:

"Any assertion of title to or any act of dominion over personal property inconsistent with the rights of the owner is a conversion. A sale of the property of one person by another is a conversion. Therefore, if you find the plaintiff was the owner of the cattle at the time of the alleged taking, and that the defendant sold them without the plaintiff's consent, or in any way appropriated them to his own use without plaintiff's consent, you should find for the plaintiff in such sum as he was damaged thereby. But if you find that the plaintiff was not the owner of the cattle, or that the defendant did not so convert them, you should find for the defendant."

The effect of the instruction asked and the point raised is that, to maintain an action of trover, the defendant must have actual or virtual possession of the property. A conversion is defined to be "any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exerted over one's property in denial of his right, or inconsistent with it." Cooley, Torts, 448. "It may be laid down as a general principle," says Mr. Bigelow, "that the assertion of a title to or an act of dominion over personal property inconsistent with the right of the owner is a conversion." Bigelow, Torts, 428; 2 Hil. Torts, § 3, p. 97. Of the different ways by which a conversion of personal property may be effected, one is, where a party sells the property of another without his authority or consent. Such sale is the assumption of ownership, of dominion over, or right to control the property, inconsistent with, and in denial of the rights of the true owner. Hence, it is said, "Every assuming by one to dispose of the goods of another is a conversion." "Trover,"

Bac. Abr. 631. Or "the assumption of authority over property, and actual sale, constitutes a conversion." Gilman v. Hill, 36 N. H. 324. No actual force need be used, (Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 128,) nor any manual taking or removal of the property, (Reynolds v. Shuler, 5 Cow. [N. Y.] 326; Connah v. Hale, 23 Wend. [N. Y.] 465,) nor proof that the defendant had actual possession of the property, (Fernald v. Chase, 37 Me. 289,) for, in the language of Shepley, C. J.: "The exercise of such a claim of right or dominion over the property as assumes that he is entitled to the possession, or to deprive the other party of it, is a conversion." See, also, Anonymous, 6 Mod. 212; McCombie v. Davies, 6 East, 540; Reid v. Colcock, 1 Nott & McC. (S. C.) 601, 9 Am. Dec. 729; Dickey v. Franklin, 32 Me. 572.

As applied to the facts, the instruction was not objectionable. The defendant had assumed to himself the property and the right of disposing of the plaintiff's cattle. He sold them, received the money for them, authorized the purchaser to take them, and swears he believed and supposed the cattle were taken. The gist of conversion is the owner's deprivation of his rightful dominion and control over his property. Under this state of facts, the sale of the defendant was a wrongful assumption of authority and dominion, subversive of the rightful dominion and control of the plaintiff over his property. The judgment must be affirmed.[41]

THURSTON et al. v. BLANCHARD.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1839. 22 Pick. 18, 33 Am. Dec. 700.)

Trover, to recover the value of certain goods alleged to have been obtained by the defendant, from the plaintiffs, by means of false and fraudulent pretences.

It appeared on the trial that the goods were purchased of the plaintiffs by the defendant, by means of false representations, for the sum of $677.77; that the defendant gave his negotiable promissory note for the amount, payable in six months; that this note had been in the possession of the plaintiffs ever since it was given; that they had never offered to give it up to the defendant; and that they had not made a demand upon him, for the goods, before commencing this suit. The plaintiffs, however, produced the note in court, at the trial, and 41 Compare Mead v. Thompson (1875), 78 Ill. 62: (D. brought an attachment against T., an absconding debtor, and levied on T.'s corn. At the time, P., the landlord of T., had a lien on this corn for rent. Judgment was obtained by D. in his attachment suit, and the corn so levied on being sold at public sale by a constable, D. bid it off and transferred his bid to E., who paid for the property and took it away. There was no further possession or intermeddling by D. In P.'s suit for conversion, it is contended that, however it may be as to E., there is no liability for conversion on the part of D.) there offered to give it up, or to put it on the files of the court; but the defendant declined taking it, and it was placed on the files.

The defendant offered no evidence in his defence, but relied upon the facts, that the note had not been given up or tendered to him by the plaintiffs, and that no demand had been made upon him for a return of the goods. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, by consent.

If the Court should be of opinion, that the action could be maintained, judgment was to be rendered on the verdict; otherwise, the plaintiffs were to be nonsuited.

Choate and S. Parker, for the defendant. * * * A demand of the goods was necessary on the part of the plaintiffs. The sale was voidable and not void, even if the evidence proved that the goods were obtained under false pretences. The title therefore passed, voidable only at the election of the vendor.

SHAW, C. J. We are now to take it as proved in point of fact, to the satisfaction of the jury, that the goods, for which this action of trover is brought, were obtained from the plaintiffs by a sale, but that this sale was influenced and effected by the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant. Such being the case, we think the plaintiffs were entitled to maintain their action, without a previous demand. Such demand, and a refusal to deliver, are evidence of conversion when the possession of the defendant is not tortious; but when the goods have been tortiously obtained, the fact is sufficient evidence of conversion. Such a sale, obtained under false and fraudulent representations, may be avoided by the vendor, and he may insist that no title passed to the vendee, or any person taking under him, other than a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, and in such case the seller may maintain replevin or trover for his goods. Judgment on the verdict for the plaintiffs.

HIORT v. BOTT.

(Court of Exchequer, 1874. L. R. 9 Exch. 86.)

Action of trover for barley, tried before Archibald, J., at the Staffordshire Summer Assizes, 1873. The facts were as follows: The plaintiffs, who were corn merchants, trading under the name of Brochner & Co., at Hull, had been in the habit of employing one Grimmett as their broker. In consequence of a telegram from Grimmett, they, on the 8th of June, 1872, fowarded to the London & North Western Railway station at Birmingham 83 quarters of barley, and at the same time sent to the defendant, who was a licensed victualler carrying on business at Deritend, Birmingham, a letter, inclosing an invoice for the barley, in which it was stated to be "sold by Mr. Grimmett as broker between buyer and seller," and a delivery order, which made the barley deliverable "to the order of consignor or consignee." The barley had in fact never been ordered by the defendant, who had had no previous dealings with either the plaintiffs or Grimmett. A day or two after the receipt of these documents by the defendant, Grimmett called; the defendant produced the documents, and said, "What does this mean? I never bought any barley through you off Brochner & Co." Grimmett said: "It was a mistake of Brochner & Co.; they had no doubt confused the defendant's name and some other name; they were doing a large business, and might have made a mistake." Grimmett then asked the defendant to indorse the order, telling him that he could not get the barley without, and that by not sending the order back expense would be saved. Thereupon the defendant indorsed the delivery order to Grimmett, who took it to the railway station, obtained delivery of the barley, disposed of it, and absconded.

In answer to a question by the learned judge, the jury found that the defendant, in signing the order, had no intention of appropriating the barley to his own use, but was anxious to correct what he believed to be an error; and, on the learned judge adding, "and with a view of returning the barley to the plaintiffs," they assented. The learned judge then directed the verdict to be entered for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter the verdict for them for £180, the value of the barley. A rule nisi was obtained accordingly.

BRAMWELL, B.[43] I think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover; though, so far as concerns the defendant, whose act was well meant, I regret the result. Mr. Bosanquet gave a good description of what constitutes a conversion when he said that it is where a man does an unauthorized act which deprives another of his property permanently or for an indefinite time. The expression used in the declaration is "converted to his own use"; but that does not mean that the defendant consumed the goods himself; for, if a man gave a quantity of another person's wine to a friend to drink, and the friend drank it, that would no doubt be as much a conversion of the wine as if he drank it himself. Now here the defendant did an act that was unauthorized. There was no occasion for him to do it; for the delivery order made the barley deliverable to the order of the consignor or consignee, and if the defendant had done nothing at all it would have been delivered to the plaintiffs. And there is no doubt that by what he did he deprived the plaintiffs of their property; because, by means of this order so indorsed, Grimmett got the barley and made away with it, leaving the plaintiffs without any remedy against the railway company, who had acted according to the instructions of the plaintiffs in delivering the barley to the order of the consignee. The case, therefore, stands thus: that by an unauthorized act on the part of the defendant, the plaintiffs have lost their barley, without any remedy except against Grimmett, and that is worthless. It seems to me therefore, that this was assuming a control over the disposition of these goods, and a causing them to be delivered to a person who deprived the plaintiffs of them. The conversion is therefore made out.

Various ingenious cases were put as to what would happen if, for instance, a parcel were left at your house by mistake, and you gave it to your servant to take back to the person who left it there, and the servant misappropriated it. Probably the safest way of dealing with that case is to wait until it arises; but I may observe that there is this difference between such a case and the present one, that where a man delivers a parcel to you by mistake, it is contemplated that if there is a mistake, you will do something with it. What are you to do with it? Warehouse it? No. Are you to turn it into the street? That would be an unreasonable thing to do. Does he not impliedly authorize you to take reasonable steps with regard to it—that is, to send it back by a trustworthy person? And when you say, "Go and deliver it to the person who sent it," are you in any manner converting it to your own use? That may be a question. But here the defendant did not send the order back; but at Grimmett's request indorsed it to him, though, no doubt, as the jury have found, with a view to the barley being returned to the plaintiffs. There is therefore a distinction between the case put and the present one. And there is also a distinction between the case of Heugh v. London & North Western Ry. Co., Law Rep. 5 Ex. 51, which was cited for the defendant, and the present case; because there it was taken that the plaintiff authorized the defendants to deliver the goods to a person applying for them, if they had reasonable grounds for believing him to be the right person.

On these considerations I think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. But I must add one word. This is an action for conversion, and I lament that such a word should appear in our proceedings, which does not represent the real facts, and which always gives rise to a discussion as to what is, and what is not, a conversion. But supposing the case were stated according to a nonartificial system of pleading, thus: "We, the plaintiffs, had at the London & North Western Railway station certain barley. We had sent the delivery order to you, the defendant. You might have got it, if you were minded to be the buyer of it; you were not so minded, and therefore should have done nothing with it. Nevertheless, you ordered the London & North Western Railway Company to deliver it, without any authority, to Grimmett, who took it away." Would not that have been a logical and precise statement of a tortious act on the part of the defendant, causing loss to the plaintiffs? It seems to me that it would. I think, but not without some regret, that this rule should be made absolute, to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs.

Rule absolute.

MULTERER v. DALLENDORFER.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1914. 158 Wis. 268, 148 N. W. 1084.)

Action to recover the value of a quantity of lumber claimed to have been wrongfully taken from plaintiff by defendants and converted by the latter to their own use.

The major question at issue was whether the lumber passed to defendants under a bill of sale made to them by Theresa Multerer, October 4, 1912, when they purchased a farm of her and some personal property, located on and used in connection with it. The lumber was then on the place. Her grantor had piled it there in 1906 for farm building purposes. He sold her farm and the lumber some six years later. The bill of sale made by her in 1912 to defendants described the personal property intended to be conveyed with the place, as follows: "Seven cows, four calves, 30 chickens, 3 pigs, 114 sacks of oats, 18 sacks of barley, 5 tons of hay, one Deering binder, one Deering mower, one rake, one tedder, one Monitor seeder, 2 drags, 1 plow, 1 cultivator, 1 wagon, 3 buggies, one double harness, one single harness, all corn and 30 bushels of potatoes, all small tools such as sacks, forks, etc., including everything but household furniture."

Without taking possession of the farm defendants sold it and the personalty they supposed they obtained with it to one Felton. Thereafter he took possession of the property he supposed to be included in his purchase. There was evidence tending to show that defendants claimed to own the lumber and authorized Felton to take possession of it; that he did so and was in such possession claiming as owner under a conveyance from such defendants when the action was commenced. There was some controversy as to whether the lumber was spoken of, particularly, at the time of the sale to defendants, and some as to whether the bill of sale was changed after its execution.

The cause was submitted to the jury for a special verdict without any question as to whether the lumber was part of the land at the time of the sale to defendants. The jury found as follows: Plaintiff and defendants did not agree, in making the bargain and sale as to the farm and personalty, that the lumber was part of the latter. The bill of sale was not changed after it was signed by plaintiff.

The court decided that the lumber, at the time of the sale to defendants, was not a fixture; that the assertion of right thereto by defendants and taking possession thereof by their grantee by their authority was a wrongful conversion of the property and that the description contained in the bill of sale did not include such property.

Judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor.

MARSHALL, J. The objections to the judgment are efficiently answered by the following:

1. Whether the lumber at the date of the deed to defendants, was a fixture and so part of the realty, in the most favorable view for respondent, was a mixed question of law and fact, and no request having been made for a finding by the jury in respect thereto, it is presumed that the decision of the matter was left to the court and the result cannot be disturbed, since it is not clearly contrary to the evidence.

2. The verdict of the jury is broad enough to negative there having been any occurrence characterizing the sale of the land to defendants constituting an express or implied agreement that the lumber should pass as part of the subject of the sale transaction, or in the light of which either the bill of sale or the deed should be read as including such property, and the decision in that regard is fairly supported by the evidence.

3. The meaning of the language of the bill of sale to defendants, as regards whether the parties intended thereby to include the lumber, so far as not covered in plaintiff's favor by the verdict, was a matter for the court to determine, and it seems that its construction of the paper is the most reasonable one which can be given. The words "etc., including everything but household furniture" following the long schedule of articles such as, generally, characterize a farm property, in the absence of pretty clear circumstantial indications to the contrary, or express explanation in the writing, should be read as referring to articles of like nature as regards being for and in use as part of the farm property. As said by the trial court, the rule of "noscitur a sociis"; the meaning of a word may be discovered by looking to the plain meaning of the words associated with it, applies. That is very familiar doctrine.

4. The consummated intention of defendants of placing their grantee in possession of the lumber as owner, was a sufficient appropriation of the property to their own use to render them liable in conversion, though there was no manual interference by them with such property.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHEELOCK v. WHEELWRIGHT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1809. 5 Mass. 104.)

The declaration was in case, and alleged that the defendant, on the 15th of January, 1806, hired a horse and sleigh of the plaintiff to ride from Boston into the country four miles, and to return at 7 o'clock in the evening; yet the defendant so carelessly and immoderately drove and rode the said horse and sleigh, and neglected to take proper care of said horse, and exposed him after said immoderate driving and riding for so long a time to the extreme coldness of the weather, that by means thereof the said horse died, and the said sleigh was broken, &c.

The defendant pleaded the general issue of not guilty, and the cause was tried on the review at the last November term in this county, before the Chief Justice, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court, upon the following case agreed by the parties, viz.:

On the 15th of January, 1806, between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the weather being extremely cold, the defendant hired of the plaintiff in Boston the horse mentioned in the declaration, with a sleigh, to ride to the Punch Bowl in Brookline, distant about 4½ miles, the defendant saying that he should return by 7 o'clock in the evening. No express price for the hire was agreed upon. After the defendant had rode to the Punch Bowl, and tarried there about 15 minutes, he rode on about 4½ miles further to Watertown. After staying there until past 9 o'clock in the evening, he returned with the horse and sleigh to Gen. W.'s door in Boston, one of the general's family being in the sleigh, after 10 o'clock. Having remained at the general's about five minutes, he took the horse and sleigh to return them to Wheelock; and having rode about two rods, the horse, after rearing up, fell dead on one of the shafts of the sleigh, which was broken by the fall. The sleigh was returned to Wheelock, and notice given by Wheelwright that the horse was dead. It was agreed that the defendant did not ride the horse immoderately, or neglect to feed or cover him properly with cloths.

If the Court should be of opinion that on this evidence the plaintiff can, in this action, recover damages on account of the horse it was agreed the verdict should stand; otherwise it should be set aside, and a general verdict entered for the defendant, and judgment be rendered accordingly.

PARSONS, C. J. Upon comparing the evidence with the declaration, we are satisfied that the case agreed has negatived the gravamen alleged by the plaintiff in his declaration, and that in this action the plaintiff cannot recover.

The defendant, by riding the horse beyond the place for which he had liberty, is answerable to the plaintiff in trover. For thus riding the horse is an unlawful conversion; and if the horse had been returned to the plaintiff, the defendant might have given it in evidence in mitigation of damages. As the horse was not returned, the defendant might have recovered the value of the horse in damages. What that value was, must be settled by a jury. If the horse in fact labored under a mortal distemper, although unknown before his death, the damages would have been the value of a horse so diseased. But it would have been incumbent on the defendant to have proved that from any causes the horse was not worth the apparent value; and if he failed to satisfy the jury of the reduced value, the plaintiff ought to recover the apparent value.

According to the facts, the plaintiff's action is misconceived. It should have been trover, and not case for improperly using the horse. And if this verdict should stand, it would not be a bar to an action of trover for a conversion by riding the horse to a place without the contract.

The verdict must be set aside, and a general verdict entered for the defendant.[44]

DAUGHERTY v. REVEAL.

(Appellate Court of Indiana, 1913. 54 Ind. App. 71, 102 N. E. 381.)

Action by Daugherty, a livery stable keeper, to recover damages for the death of a horse which the plaintiff had hired to the defendant. The complaint was in four paragraphs or counts. The first charged a conversion; the second, a breach of contract; the third negligence; the fourth, willful injury. The evidence revealed the following facts:

On June 18, 1910, defendant came to plaintiff's livery barn and asked whether he could get a horse early the next morning to drive to a Mr. Sullivan's. Defendant stated that he would put the horse in the barn at Sullivan's and leave it there until he was ready to return. He was informed that the cost of such hiring would be $2. On the morning of Sunday, June 19, accordingly, defendant procured the [44] "In the case of Wheelock v. Wheelwright (1809) 5 Mass. 104, which in the facts, as well as the principles, is similar to this, it was decided, not only that case for improperly using the horse would not, but that trover was the only action which would lie." Per Morton, J., in Homer v. Thwing (1826) 3 Pick. (Mass.) 492, 494. In this case a recovery in trover was permitted against an infant who, having hired a horse to drive to the Punch Bowl in Brookline, drove in a different direction and without leave, to Fresh Pond in Cambridge, and then to the Punch Bowl. "The driving of the horse beyond the place to which the defendant had permission to go, was a conversion, and trover is the proper remedy."

See also the remarks of Perley, J., in Woodman v. Hubbard (1852) 25 N. H. 67, 57 Am. Dec. 310: "When the defendant voluntarily drove the horse beyond the limits for which he was hired, he acted wholly without right. He then took the horse into his own control, without any authority or license from the owner. The conversion was in law as complete, the wrongful invasion of the plaintiff's right of property was as absolute, as if, instead of driving the horse a few miles beyond the place for which he had hired him, he had detained and used him for a year, or any other indefinite time, or had driven him to market and sold him. If taking the wrongful control of the horse, and driving him ten miles, was not a substantial conversion, how far must the defendant have driven him? How long must he have detained him? And what other and further wrongful acts was it necessary that he should do in order to make himself a substantial and real wrong-doer? It would seem to be quite clear that if the original act, assuming control over the horse, was not a substantial invasion of the plaintiff's right of property, no subsequent use or abuse of the horse by the defendant could make it so; and that if the defendant can not on the facts of this case be charged for the conversion of the horse, he could not have been if he had sold or willfully destroyed him. In other words, the plaintiff having delivered the horse into the defendant's hands on a contract that was illegal, but which nevertheless left the general property in the plaintiff the defendant may do what he will with the horse, and the plaintiff can have no remedy, because whatever he does can be no more than a breach of his unlawful contract to return the horse. This does not appear to be a reasonable conclusion."

horse and drove to Sullivan's. The plaintiff knew at the time that the defendant was under age.

The evidence further showed that in the forenoon of June 19, the defendant, in company with the daughter of Mr. Sullivan, drove to and from Sunday school a mile and a half or two miles from Sullivan's residence; that between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon he went out driving and returned to Mr. Sullivan's between 5 and 6 o'clock; that on his return the horses were hitched in front of the house for a time and then the horse driven by appellee was again put in the barn about 7 o'clock p. m.; that the horse was driven slowly and was not in any way injured or affected by such use; that later in the evening, when defendant went to turn the horse around, to start home, the horse fell and broke his neck. The defendant thereupon telephoned plaintiff of the accident.

On these facts, there was a directed verdict for the defendant, with judgment accordingly. The plaintiff appeals.

FELT, J. (after stating the facts and holding that there was a failure of proof under the paragraphs of complaint which charged negligence and willful injury and that there was no valid claim for breach of contract). If liable at all, appellee must be held liable on the theory of a conversion by driving the horse beyond the destination fixed by the contract of hiring. * * *[45]

Where there is a bailment the law implies a duty on the part of the bailee to use ordinary care and diligence to protect the property from injury and to return it at the time and place agreed upon. A mere neglect to perform such duty would not subject either a minor or an adult to a suit for conversion of the property. But if the bailee does any willful and positive act in violation of such duty or in repudiation of the contract of bailment, to the injury or loss of the property, the bailor is entitled to the immediate possession thereof and may have his right of action for damages for any tort so committed. Rice v. Boyer, 108 Ind. 472–479, 9 N. E. 420, 58 Am. Rep. 53; Campbell v. Stakes, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 137, 19 Am. Dec. 561; Eaton v. Hill, 50 N. H. 235, 9 Am. Rep. 189–193; Humphrey v. Douglass, 33 Am. Dec. 177, notes; Lowery v. Cate, 108 Tenn. 54, 64 S. W. 1068, 57 L. R. A. 673, and notes page 680, 91 Am. St. Rep. 744; Collins v. Gifford, 203 N. Y. 465, 96 N. E. 721, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 202, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 969–974.

The facts of this case do not tend to show any intention on the part of appellee to repudiate the contract of hiring or to willfully and intentionally injure the horse. They at most only show a deviation from the terms of the bailment of a character insufficient to bring the case within the rule applicable where a tort has been committed in connection with the property bailed of a character independent of and beyond the contract to such an extent as to show repudiation thereof or a negligent or willful injury of the property. Appellee did put the horse in the barn at the place agreed upon, and it was at Sullivan's residence when the accident occurred. Appellant knew appellee was a minor and understood the purpose of his visit to Mr. Sullivan's when he dealt with him. Viewed in this light, the deviation from the strict terms of the bailment was not sufficient to enable appellant to assert a liability for conversion of the property. Schouler's Bailments (3d Ed.) §§ 139–141; 2 Kent Com. (12th Ed.) § 241; Churchill v. White, 58 Neb. 22, 78 N. W. 369, 76 Am. St. Rep. 64; Caswell v. Parker, 96 Me. 39, 51 Atl. 238; Towne v. Wiley, 23 Vt. 355, 56 Am. Dec. 85; Gilson v. Spear, 38 Vt. 311, 88 Am. Dec. 659; Lowery v. Cate, supra.

In Young v. Muhling, 48 App. Div. 617, on page 619, 63 N. Y. Supp. 181, on page 183, the court said: "The doctrine that a person who hires a horse for a specified journey is liable for conversion if he drives the horse further than the stipulated journey, or on another and different trip, cannot be pressed so far as to make the hirer chargeable as for a tort merely by reason of slight and immaterial departures from the general course of the direction outlined in the contract."

It is generally held to be the law that a bailor may sue in tort for damages to the property bailed, resulting from a violation of the contract of bailment or from a negligent or willful injury to the same. The great weight of authority limits such recovery to loss or injury resulting from such violation of the contract or to cases where the act or omission evinces an intent to convert the property and destroy or defeat the interest of the bailor therein.

Schouler's Bailments (3d Ed.) § 139, states that the suit for the tort is permitted, "not, we may say, on the ground that the hirer has, in the ancient sense of the word, converted the thing let to him, but because the bailee's gross, willful, or wanton violation of his bailor's rights makes it reasonable to treat the bailment as virtually ended." The same author in section 140 states: "On the other hand, it is not difficult to conceive that technical misuse might occur without on actual abuse of the terms of hire and where it would be harsh to visit deviation with such disastrous penalties. A conclusion is reached in one case, after a searching review of the authorities, that in a bailment for hire upon a certain term, and not merely during pleasure, the hirer's use of the property differently in purpose or manner from what had been mutually intended will not amount to a conversion justifying trover, unless the chattel's destruction was thereby occasioned, or, at least, unless the act was done with intent to convert. * * * In truth, the leaven of common sense, which keeps our law in constant ferment, is here at work, recalling the injustice of visiting blameworthy and blameless deviation with the same penalties of absolute or insurance accountability."

In Harvey v. Epes, 53 Va. 153, pages 176, 178, 182, we have a long and exhaustive discussion of the question and a review of the English and American decisions. Among other things it is said: "Upon the whole, I am of opinion that in the case of a bailment upon hire for a certain term, * * * the use of the property by the hirer during the term, for a different purpose or in a different manner from that which was intended by the parties, will not amount to a conversion for which trover will lie, unless the destruction of the property be thereby occasioned, or at least unless the act be done with intent to convert the property, and thus to destroy or defeat the interest of the bailor therein. * * * The act of misuser, to be a conversion, must occasion the loss of the property or be done with the actual intent to convert it. * * * A contrary doctrine would be attended with very harsh and unjust consequences. The true rule on the subject is not, properly speaking, a general rule subject to exceptions but is a simple rule to this effect: That if hired property be used by the hirer for a purpose or in a manner not authorized by the terms of the hiring, and the loss of the property be occasioned by such misuser, he is liable in trover for its value." See, also, Story on Bailments (9th Ed.) § 413 et seq., and notes; Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) p. 184; Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bingham, 716, 722–724; 19 Eng. Com. Law, 321; Spencer v. Pilcher, 35 Va. 565.

In Churchill v. White, supra, the Supreme Court of Nebraska approved an instruction which stated at page 26 of 58 Neb., at page 371 of 78 N. W. (76 Am. St. Rep. 64): "The rule that one who hires property of this kind for one purpose and uses it for another or different purpose from that contemplated by the parties in the contract of hiring is liable for any harm that may happen it while he is so using it applies to minors as well as to adults."

There is no evidence in this case tending to show that the death of the horse was in any way connected with or occasioned by any use of the horse outside the strict terms of the contract of hiring as given by appellant himself. Nor is there any evidence tending to show that appellee had any intention of converting the property and depriving appellant thereof. There being a failure of evidence tending to connect the death of the horse with any violation of the terms of the bailment and to show any intention to convert the property, the court did not err in directing a verdict or in overruling appellant's motion for a new trial. * * * Judgment affirmed.

(C) The Defense in Trover and Conversion

(a) In General

[Historical Note.—In the action of trespass at common law, a plea of "not guilty" was deemed to deny the act of trespass charged against the defendant but not the wrongfulness of that act. If the physical act, committed vi et armis by the defendant against the plaintiff, was shown, there was, without more, an apparent wrong; the plaintiff's cause was prima facie complete. There might be, of course, cotemporaneous facts which, in legal effect, rendered the defendant's act not wrongful, as when, for instance, the act charged against him in trespass for assault and battery was a blow struck by him in self-defense. In these cases the defendant who would use this cotemporaneous fact must plead it affirmatively, in confession and avoidance in excuse. Although a possibly vital fact in the occurrence, it was not within the case presented by the plea of not guilty.

In trover and conversion, however, the plea of "not guilty" was deemed at common law to deny both the physical act charged against the defendant and the wrongfulness of this act. The effect was that in trover a defendant who had pleaded merely "not guilty" could introduce evidence of various states of fact having the general character of those which in an action of trespass he could show only if he had alleged them affirmatively, through a plea in confession and avoidance.

For instance, in trover for the conversion of personal property, the fact that it was destroyed by the executive officer of the board of health, as required by law, to prevent the spread of disease, can be shown under the plea of "not guilty"; but, in trespass for taking away personal property, the fact that the act was done under legal process cannot be shown under a plea of "not guilty."

A further effect of this doctrine appears now and again in the trover cases. A well-established rule of the common-law procedure required that a plea which amounted to the general issue should be so pleaded, under risk of a special demurrer. But, from the nature of the common-law theory of trover and conversion, nearly every possible plea of excuse amounted to the general issue. "As the conversion, which is the gist of the action in trover, is, ex vi termini, a tortious act, which cannot in law be justified or excused, it is manifest that any plea alleging matter of justification or excuse (as a license from the plaintiff, an authority derived from the law, etc.) is equivalent to the plea of not guilty, since it must involve a denial of the conversion." Thus, in detinue the detention was to be denied or justified, but in trover both results were reached by a denial of the conversion. "Conversion is always a wrongful act and cannot be confessed and avoided."

This deviation from the principles of scientific pleading was corrected, in large part, in England, by the Rules of Hilary Term of 1833. Regularly, under the American Codes and the English Judicature Acts, if the defendant in an action of tort admits the prima facie case charged against him, but wishes to show that it was not wrongful, he must plead his justification specially, by way of confession and avoidance. But in some of the trover cases under the Codes, the older theory still finds an echo.

Where this view prevails, whether at common law or under the Code, the doctrine of excuses for conversion lacks a clear-cut edge. —Ed.]

ROCKWOOD v. FEASAR.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1590. Cro. Eliz. 262, 78 Reprint, 517.)

Action of trover in London. The defendant pleaded, that long time before the conversion supposed to be, J. S. was possessed of these goods, as of his own goods, at B. in Norfolk; and that he before the conversion supposed did casually lose them and they came to the hand of J. Palmer by trover, who gave them to the plaintiff, who lost them in London; and the defendant found them, and afterward did convert them to his own use, by the command of the said J. S. as it was lawful for him to do. It was moved, that this is no plea, for it amounts to the general issue.[46]

But all the justices held it a good plea; for it confesseth the possession and property in the plaintiff, against all but the lawful owner.

Nota.—This plea was devised by Coke to alter the trial.[47]

HARTFORD v. JONES.

(Court of King's Bench, 1698. 2 Salk. 654, 91 Reprint, 556.)

In trover and conversion the defendant pleaded, that the goods were cast away, and they saved and detained them till they were paid for their pains. On demurrer, HOLT, C. J., held that they might retain for payment, as a carrier for his hire; and salvage is allowed by all nations: he that serves another ought in reason to be paid for his service; but the plea is naught; for if the detainer be lawful, he does not confess a conversion: I never knew but one special plea good in trover, viz. Yelv. 198.[48] And the rule was in the principal case, to waive the plea and plead not guilty.

[46] On this point see the note to Hartford v. Jones, infra.

[47] Compare Ward v. Blunt (1588) Cro. Eliz. 146: In trover for divers loads of corn and hay. The defendant pleaded that he had cut the corn and hay on his own land and was possessed of them until he lost them; that the plaintiff found them, but lost them; that they then came to the hands of the defendant, and he converted them, as it was lawful for him to do. Held open to demurrer, as amounting to the general issue.

(Court of King's Bench, 1831. 2 Barn. & Adol. 190, 109 Reprint, 1114.)

Trover for wheat, &c. Plea, not guilty. At the trial before Parke, J., at the Carlisle Spring Assizes, 1831, it appeared, that in November preceding, the defendant was employed to take toll of corn for the Earl of Egremont in Cockermouth market. The toll was taken by putting the hand into the sack of corn as it stood in the market, taking out a handful, and placing it in a bowl held near the top of the sack: and the complaint in this action was, that the defendant had varied from the mode previously used, so as to bring away a quantity exceeding the lawful toll. The regular mode was described as lifting, that practised by the defendant as sweeping. It was objected, on behalf of the defendant, that trover was not maintainable. The learned Judge overruled the objection, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with nominal damages.

F. Pollock now moved for a new trial. The question in this case is as to the form of action, which has subjected the defendant to the expense of proving title to the tolls, when it ultimately turned out that the real matter of complaint was only an excessive taking. If the defendant had been a wrong-doer in the whole of his proceeding, there would have been no difficulty; but here, the right to some toll being admitted, the action is brought in respect of part of the corn taken. How is that part to be distinguished in a mixed quantity? * * *

Lord Tenterden, C. J. The plaintiff, by adopting this form of action, has certainly subjected the defendant to considerable difficulty and expense, in consequence of the generality of the pleadings. On the other hand, the proceeding has its conveniences; but the question is not, now, on which side the advantage preponderates; we must take the law as we find it. The defendant in this case was entitled to take, as toll, a certain quantity of corn, amounting perhaps to a pint. He takes a pint and a half. There is no doubt that he is a wrong-doer: the question is as to the form of action. If the declaration had been in trespass, the defendant must have justified by a prescription to take so much corn for toll, and on proof that he had taken more, he would undoubtedly have been liable on account of the excess. If this would have been so in an action of trespass, I think in the present form of action the result must be the same.

[48] "The plea in Yelverton was, that the defendant took the wine mentioned in the declaration for prisage due to the King. The following pleas in trover have been also held good: a former recovery in trespass for the same goods, Show. 146; a recovery in trover against a stranger, Cro. Jac. 73; or against the defendant, 2 Str. 1078; that an innkeeper detained a horse for his meat, 2 Bulst. 289; the Statute of Limitations, Lut. 99. Vide Bull. N. P. 48."—Reporter's Note.

PARKE, J. This case may be made clear by considering how it would have stood if this defence had been specially pleaded in an action of trespass. Suppose, to a declaration in that form, the defendant had pleaded a prescription to take a certain toll of corn, amounting to one handful, and that he took in pursuance of such prescription; and the plaintiff had alleged in his replication or new assignment a taking of two handfuls, or more than one handful, would such replication or new assignment have been good as supporting the declaration, or would it have been bad on demurrer? If bad, the present application is rightly made; if good, it is not; and if the plaintiff, on such pleadings in trespass, would have been entitled to recover, he is certainly entitled to recover in this action of trover; for a plaintiff may always bring an action of trover where an action of trespass de bonis asportatis would lie. Now it appears to me that a replication, in trespass, that the defendant had taken more than the quantity claimable under the prescription, would clearly have been sufficient in point of law; and, therefore, this action may be supported.[49]

WHITE v. SPETTIGUE.

Trover for books; pleas, not guilty and not possessed. At the trial, it appeared that the plaintiff, a solicitor, had missed from day to day several volumes of the Statutes at Large, which he suspected to have been stolen by a young man who was at that time a clerk in his office. The defendant, a bookseller carrying on business in London, became possessed of the books by a bona fide purchase of them on different days, from a young man who brought them to his shop and offered them for sale. The defendant having sold the books, this action was brought to recover the value of them.

On the above facts appearing in evidence, it was objected for the defendant, that, as the plaintiff had done nothing to prosecute the person who has stolen the books, he could not maintain the action. Grimson v. Woodfull, 2 Car. & P. 41; Peer v. Humphrey, 41 R. R. 471, 2 Ad. & El. 495, 4 Nev. & M. 430. The learned Judge, however, told the jury that there was no evidence to show who stole the books, and that the property in the goods, being originally in the plaintiff, could not be taken out of him by any act of a third party; and he directed them to find for the plaintiff, unless they believed the defendant received the goods knowing them to have been stolen, in which case the right would then merge in the felony, and the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. The jury having found for the plaintiff, Merewether now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection.

PARKE, B. I think there is not the least foundation for a rule in this case. In the first place, independently of the point of law, there are neither pleadings to warrant the defence, nor facts to support it. The only pleas on the record are Not guilty, which puts in issue the conversion, and Not possessed, which puts in issue the plaintiff's title at the time of conversion. * * * [50]

Rule refused.

NICHOLS & SHEPARD CO. v. MINNESOTA THRESHING MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1897. 70 Minn. 528, 73 N. W. 415.)

CANTY, J.[51] * * * It is assigned as error that the court permitted defendant to prove a certain statute of South Dakota, against the objection that it was not pleaded in the answer, which statute, as the courts of that state have construed it, provides that a chattel mortgage shall not pass the title to the property covered by it until after foreclosure, but that it shall confer on the mortgagee merely a lien as security for the payment of the indebtedness. We are of the opinion that the evidence was competent, if material. The plaintiff did not allege the manner in which defendant converted the property and under its complaint might have proved that defendant converted it in any one of several different ways. The proof was that defendant received the mortgaged property from the mortgagor in exchange for other property, and then sold the mortgaged property to one Hayden. The defendant was not obliged to anticipate this proof in the answer, but had a right to meet it by any evidence that showed that it was not guilty of converting the mortgaged property. Johnson v. Oswald, 38 Minn. 550, 38 N. W. 630, 8 Am. St. Rep. 698; Adamson v. Wiggins, 45 Minn. 448, 48 N. W. 185.

[50] The statement of the case is slightly abridged. Only so much of Baron Parke's opinion is given as relates to the one point. There were concurring opinions by Pollock, C. B. ("Moreover, the defense sought to be raised is not admissible under these pleas"), Alderson, B. ("I also think that this defence ought to be specially pleaded"), and Rolfe, B.

[51] For the statement of facts and the opening portion of the opinion, see this case, ante, p. 462.

KERWOOD v. AYRES.

(Supreme Court of Kansas, 1898. 59 Kan. 343, 53 Pac. 134.)

The action, by Kerwood, resulted in a judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff brings error.

DOSTER, C. J. The defendant in error, as sheriff, levied an attachment upon certain goods as the property of one Denny. The plaintiff in error, claiming ownership of the goods by purchase from Denny, brought an action against the sheriff for damages for their conversion. The petition, however, did not characterize the act of conversion as performed by the defendant in his official capacity. To this petition only a general denial by way of answer was filed. The jury found in defendant's favor. Judgment was rendered in accordance with the verdict, and the plaintiff prosecutes error to this court.

Upon the trial the district court, over the plaintiff's objections, received evidence tending to show that the claim of purchase of the goods from Denny was fraudulent. The admission of this evidence constitutes the principal ground of complaint. The argument is that, in actions for damages for conversion of goods, affirmative defenses, such as justification or impeachment of plaintiff's title, are not admissible under the general denial; that under such denial the defendant is limited to counter evidence of the charge of conversion. The plaintiff in error is mistaken. The rule is the same in actions for conversion as in replevin. According to repeated decisions of this court, the filing of a general denial in the last-mentioned class of actions fully puts in issue the plaintiff's title to the property claimed. Wilson v. Fuller, 9 Kan. 176; Holmberg v. Dean, 21 Kan. 79. The courts apply the same rule in actions for conversion. "A general denial traverses, not only the conversion, but also the plaintiff's title; and hence a defendant may, under such a pleading, show the sources from which he claims title, or that he has no title, or that the property belonged to a third person, who transferred it to the plaintiff without consideration and with intent to cheat the third person." 1 Kinkead, Code Pl. § 474. In Steel Works v. Bresnahan, 66 Mich. 489, 33 N. W. 834, the supreme court of that state said: "We are cited by the plaintiff's counsel to the general rules of practice, 4 Wm. IV (1833), as authority for his position that the general issue in trover is a denial of the conversion only, and not of the plaintiff's title to the goods. But these rules have not been adopted into our practice, and the general issue in this state, as formerly in England, puts the whole declaration in issue. To entitle the plaintiff to recover, two points are essential to be proved: First, property in himself, and a right of possession at the time of conversion; and, second, a conversion of the goods by the defendant to his own use; and under the general issue the defendant may prove by any competent evidence that the title to the goods was in himself, either absolutely as general owner, or specially as bailee, or by way of lien." * * *[52]

Judgment affirmed.

(b) THE DEFENSE WHEN THE CONVERSION WAS THROUGH A DEMAND AND REFUSAL

BALDWIN v. COLE.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1705. 6 Mod. 212, 87 Reprint, 964.)

Trover. The case, upon evidence, was this: A carpenter sent his servant to work for hire to the Queen's yard; and having been there some time, when he would go no more, the surveyor of the work would not let him have his tools, pretending a usage to detain tools to enforce workmen to continue until the Queen's work was done. A demand and refusal was proved at one time, and a tender and refusal after.

HOLT, C. J. The very denial of goods to him that has a right to demand them is an actual conversion, and not only evidence of it, as has been holden; for what is a conversion, but an assuming upon one's self the property and right of disposing another's goods, and he that takes upon himself to detain another man's goods from him without cause, takes upon himself the right of disposing of them: so the taking and carrying away another man's goods is a conversion: so if one come into my close, and take my horse and ride him, there it is conversion: and here if the plaintiff had received them upon the tender, notwithstanding the action would have lain upon the former conversion, and the having of the goods after would go only in mitigation of the damages: and he made no account of the pretended usage, but compared it to the doctrine among the army, that if a man came into the service, and brought his own horse, that the property thereof was immediately altered, and vested in the Queen; which he had already condemned.

And here one of the particulars in the declaration being ill laid, the defendant was found not guilty as to that, and guilty as to the rest.

SMITH v. YOUNG.

(At Nisi Prius, 1808. 1 Camp. 439.)

See ante, p. 473, for a report of the case.

[52] Part of the opinion is omitted.

LOPARD v. SYMONS.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Term, 1904. 85 N. Y. Supp. 1025.)

The action was by Lopard. The judgment was for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

FREEDMAN, P. J. The facts that are undisputed in this case are as follows:

Plaintiff, a diamond dealer, on October 7, 1902, intrusted to the defendant, at his request, a diamond stud. The defendant was a proposed purchaser, and took the stone for the purpose of having it appraised. He executed a writing by which he agreed to return the stone on demand. It was shown upon the trial, without objection, that the defendant was to return the stud within an hour. Subsequently, and a few hours later on the same day, the plaintiff called at the defendant's place of business and asked for the return of the stone, saying that he had another customer for it. The defendant thereupon promised to return it within half an hour. This he did not do, but, instead, took it home; and some time during that night his room was entered by a burglar, who stole the diamond, together with defendant's watch, chain, money, etc.

Upon suit being brought by plaintiff for conversion, the defendant interposed this theft as his defense, and succeeded in the court below. The judgment must be reversed.

Upon failure by the defendant to return the stone upon the demand made by the plaintiff, the defendant assumed to exercise act of control over the property of the plaintiff in hostility to his rights as owner, and was then liable in an action for conversion. Boyce v. Brockway, 31 N. Y. 490. He could not excuse himself from refusing to return the stud upon demand by showing that the property was subsequently stolen from him, even if he showed that he exercised the greatest care in its preservation.

Judgment reversed. New trial ordered, with costs to the appellant to abide the event. All concur.

ALEXANDER v. SOUTHEY.

(Court of King's Bench, 1821. 5 Barn. & Ald. 247, 106 Reprint, 1183, 24 R. R. 348.)

Trover for printing types and other goods. Plea, general issue. At the trial at the last Guildhall sittings before Best, J., it appeared that the defendant, who was the servant of the Albion Insurance Company, had in his custody in a warehouse, of which he kept the key, certain goods belonging to the plaintiff, saved from a fire at the plaintiff's house, and which had been carried to the warehouse by the servants of the company. The only evidence of a conversion was, that when the plaintiff demanded the goods from the defendant, the latter said that he could not deliver them up without an order from the Albion Office. The learned Judge left it to the jury to say, whether this qualification of the defendant's refusal was a reasonable one, telling them, that if so, he was of opinion, that there was not sufficient evidence of a conversion. The jury accordingly found a verdict for the defendant. And now

Denman moved for a new trial, on the ground of a misdirection.

BAYLEY, J. If the plaintiff in this case had informed the defendant that he had previously made application to the Insurance Company, and that they had refused permission for the delivery of the property, or had told the defendant, that he expected him to go and get an order, authorizing the delivery of the property, and after that, the defendant had refused either to deliver the goods or to go and get such order, I think it would have amounted to a conversion on his part: but here the defendant had the goods in his possession as the agent of the Insurance Company, and he would not have done his duty if he had given them up without an application to his employers. He only gave, as it seems to me, a qualified, reasonable, and justifiable refusal.

BEST, J. I thought at the trial that I might properly have nonsuited the plaintiff, but that the safer course was to leave the question to the jury. An unqualified refusal is almost always conclusive evidence of a conversion; but if there be a qualification annexed to it, the question then is whether it be a reasonable one. Here, the jury thought the qualification a reasonable one, and that the refusal did not amount to a conversion of the property, and I think they were right in that conclusion.

Rule refused.[53]

VAUGHAN v. WATT.

(Court of Exchequer, 1840. 6 Mees. & W. 492, 55 R. R. 712.)

Trover for different articles of wearing apparel, &c. Pleas: First, not guilty; secondly, that the goods were not the property of the plaintiff: on which issues were joined. At the trial, before Rolfe, B., the following appeared to be the facts of the case:

On the 24th of July, 1839, the goods in question were pledged with the defendant, a pawnbroker, by a female of the name of Hubbard, in the name (as the defendant understood it) of Mary Warne, and the duplicate was so made out. On the next day he was sent to by that person (whom he did not then know, but who afterwards proved to be the plaintiff's wife), to say that she had lost the duplicate, and she demanded and obtained from him a copy thereof, and also a form of a declaration of the loss of it, pursuant to the Stat. 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 99, § 16, and 5 & 6 Will. IV, c. 62, § 12.[54]

[53] The concurring opinions of Abbott, C. J., and Holroyd, J., are omitted. See the comment on this case by Mr. Justice Blackburn in Hollins v. Fowler, when that case was before the House of Lords in 1875. L. R. 7 H. L. 757, 767.

[54] By the terms of this statute the person obtaining the copy "shall thereupon prove his or her property in or right to such goods and chattels, to the satisfaction of some justice of the peace of the place where the goods or chattels shall have been pledged."

Some days afterwards, upon an allegation that this document also was lost, she obtained from the defendant another similar form. On the 6th of August, the plaintiff Vaughan produced the duplicate to the defendant, and demanded the goods, tendering the amount of the pledge and the interest. The defendant refused to give them up, on the ground of the declarations having been obtained from him. On the 7th, the plaintiff made an application to a police magistrate, for the purpose of compelling the restoration of the goods, and a summons was granted for the defendant's appearance. The plaintiff stated that it was his wife by whom the goods had been pledged; but the magistrate, after hearing the circumstances, declined to interfere. The plaintiff then brought this action.

It was contended for the defendant, that there was no evidence of such an absolute refusal by him to deliver up the goods to the plaintiff, as constituted a conversion; and that he was justified in refusing to do so, by the circumstance of the declarations having been obtained by another party claiming to be the owner. The learned Judge thought that the mere fact of these documents having been obtained was no defence as against the real owner of the goods, who might, in that case, never have it in his power to recover possession of them and under his Lordship's direction, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, damages £10, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

A rule for a nonsuit or for a new trial was accordingly obtained and argued.[55]

PARKE, B. The learned Judge was incorrect in telling the jury that the mere refusal to deliver the goods to the real owner was a conversion. It was a question for the jury whether the defendant meant to apply them to his own use, or assert the title of a third party to them, or whether he only meant to keep them in order to ascertain the title to them, and clear up the doubts he then entertained on the subject, and whether a reasonable time for doing so had not elapsed, without which it would not be a conversion. It ought therefore to have been left to the jury, whether the defendant had a bona fide doubt as to the title to the goods, and if so, whether a reasonable time for clearing up that doubt had elapsed. The party obtaining the declaration is bound to go before a magistrate, and satisfy him by evidence that he is the real owner of the goods; and if a reasonable time had elapsed in this case for doing so, the defendant had no longer any reasonable ground for detaining them on the 6th of July, for a supposed defect of title. That was a question for the jury. The statute supposes that the party will go before the magistrate immediately; and if three or four days elapse without his doing so, the jury would be well warranted in finding that the reasonable time had elapsed. But it is all for the jury; however strong the facts, the Judge cannot take it upon himself to refuse to leave the question to them.

[55] The argument on the rule is omitted.

Therefore, although the result will clearly be the same, in strict law the defendant is entitled to have the facts submitted to the jury. There must therefore be a new trial.[56]

BOARDMAN v. SILL.

(At Nisi Prius, Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1809. 1 Camp. 410, note.)

Trover for some brandy which lay in the defendant's cellars, and which when demanded he had refused to deliver up, saying it was his own property. At this time certain warehouse rent was due to the defendant on account of the brandy, of which no tender had been made to him. The Attorney General contended that the defendant had a lien on the brandy for the warehouse rent, and that till this was tendered trover would not lie.

But Lord ELLENBOROUGH considered, that as the brandy had been detained on a different ground, and as no demand of warehouse rent had been made, the defendant must be taken to have waived his lien, if he had one, which would admit of some doubt. The plaintiff had a verdict.[57]

ALLGEAR v. WALSH.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals, Missouri, 1887. 24 Mo. App. 134.)

PHILIPS, P. J. The plaintiff sued the defendant in trover for the conversion of a barrel of whiskey. The answer, after tendering the general issue, pleaded that prior to the general state election in 1884, the plaintiff made a bet with one Flaisig, to the effect, that the plaintiff wagered $100 against one barrel of whiskey, the property of Flaisig, that Marmaduke would be elected governor of the state; that prior to this bet the said Flaisig, in order to induce defendant to go on a note with him as surety to the Saxton National Bank, of St. Joseph, for the sum of $2,200, agreed to, and did, turn over to defendant thirty barrels of whiskey as collateral security; that he accordingly executed said note, which has not been paid off or satisfied; that at the time of the making of the said bet the plaintiff and Flaisig came to him, when plaintiff asked if he (defendant) had a barrel of whiskey belonging to Flaisig, to which he answered that he had, but without explaining to [56] The concurring opinions of Lord Abinger, C. B., and of Rolfe, B., are omitted.

[57] Compare: Marine Bank v. Fiske (1877) 71 N. Y. 353: (P. demands a larger quantity of wheat than he is entitled to; D. refuses upon the ground that no part of the wheat belongs to P.) Singer Mfg. Co. v. King (1884) 14 R. I. 511: An agent who had received a chattel from his principal refused to deliver it to the owner, not in order to consult his principal as to the title, but in co-operation with his principal in the unlawful withholding from the owner.

plaintiff how he held the same. The answer alleged that he held said barrel by reason of said pledge, and that the wager between the said parties was illegal, etc. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant has appealed.

The appellant presents his case on the theory, first, that this action, in its essence, is to enforce a wagering contract, or to recover from a stakeholder property won on a bet on an election. It is manifest, from the instructions given and refused by the court, that it tried the case on the theory that plaintiff's cause of action was predicated on a transaction independent of the wagering contract, and which supervened after the performance by the parties. * * *

In Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. Ed. 468, while the general rule was recognized, that the courts will not enforce contracts growing immediately out of, or connected with, an illegal act, yet it was held that if the promise on which the action is predicated be disconnected from the illegal act, and founded on a new undertaking, it is not affected by such act, though it was known to the promisee, who abetted the illegal act. In recognition, no doubt, of this ruling, it has been held that the test whether a claim connected with an illegal transaction be enforceable at law is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the forbidden transaction to establish his case. If he can fully develop his cause, without predicating it on the illegal matter, so that it is not in fact and law dependent thereon, the action is maintainable. Swan v. Scott, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 164; Thomas v. Brady, 10 Pa. 170; Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198, 13 Am. Rep. 737; Tyler v. Larimore, 19 Mo. App. 458; Parsons v. Randolph, 21 Mo. App. 353.

All that was necessary to enable plaintiff to make out the case stated in the petition was to prove the agreement by which Flaisig, the admitted original owner of the whiskey, consented that the defendant should turn the same over to plaintiff, and the defendant's assent to hold the same subject to plaintiff's order, the demand and refusal to return to plaintiff. This case is little distinguishable in principle from that of Gowan, Adm'r, v. Gowan, 30 Mo. 472, in which it was held that where a debtor deposits personal property in the hands of another as bailee for the purpose of fraudulently screening it from his creditors, the bailee cannot avail himself of the fraudulent intent of the depositor, to defeat an action brought against him by the bailor for the recovery of such property. Napton, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, very appositely observed: "The plaintiff simply asks that the bailment may be enforced; that as he put the property in the defendant's hands, subject to his order, he shall now have it again when demanded. No document or fact is alleged to show that the transaction was any otherwise than it appeared to be."

The same principle, in effect, was again recognized by the Supreme Court in Watson v. Harmon, 85 Mo. 443, where the vendor of goods was left in possession by the vendee as a cloak to defraud the creditors of the vendee. The vendee was allowed to maintain trover against the vendor who refused on demand to surrender the goods.

So in Charles v. McCune, 57 Mo. 166, the plaintiff, who had sent certain stock from Missouri into Texas during the war, in contravention of the non-intercourse proclamation of the president, was held to be entitled to maintain trover against the defendant, who acquired the possession of the stock, and converted the same to his own use. While the violation of the proclamation rendered the stock subject to confiscation, that fact constituted no defence to the conduct of the defendant. * * *

Judgment affirmed.[58]

ENGLAND v. COWLEY.

(Court of Exchequer, 1873. L. R. 8 Exch. 126.)

Trover for household furniture. Plea: Not guilty by statute.[59] Issue.

The plaintiff was the holder of a bill of sale over the household furniture of Miss Morley, the tenant to the defendant of a house in River Terrace, Chelsea. The bill of sale contained the usual clauses enabling the plaintiff to take possession of, and remove and sell the furniture in case of default upon Miss Morley's part in payment of the sum advanced. She having made default, the plaintiff put a man in possession early in August, 1872, and upon the 11th of August sent two of his men with vans to remove the furniture from the house. It was then after sunset. The men were met at the house by the defendant, the landlord, who alleged that half a year's rent was due and in arrear, and stated that he did not intend to allow the goods to be removed, as he meant to distrain on the day following. One of the men returned, and informed the plaintiff of what had passed. The plaintiff thereupon went to the house himself, and was told by the defendant, who was in the passage, that he would not suffer any of the goods to be taken away until his rent was paid. The defendant had also engaged a policeman, whom he stationed outside, to prevent the removal of the goods. The plaintiff thereupon gave up the attempted removal and went away, leaving a man still in possession. The defendant did not himself actually take possession of or remove any of the goods upon this occasion. His object was to prevent the plaintiff's removing them in order to distrain the next day at a legal hour.

[58] The arguments and part of the opinion are omitted.

[59] The statute referred to is the Act of 11 Geo. II, c. 19, § 21 (1738), declaring that in actions of trespass or on the case against persons entitled to rent, it shall be lawful for the defendant "to plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence."

The cause was tried before Bramwell, B., at the Surrey summer assizes, 1872. In summing up the learned judge directed the jury in the following terms:

"If you are of opinion that the defendant did not deprive the plaintiff of his goods, did not take possession of, nor assume dominion over, them, but merely prevented the plaintiff from removing them from one place to another, allowing him to remain in possession of them if he liked, then there is no cause of action."

The jury answered this question in favour of the defendant, and a verdict was entered for him accordingly, with leave to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for £40, the value of the goods, if the Court should be of opinion that the learned judge ought to have directed a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule was obtained in Michaelmas Term accordingly, on the ground that the learned judge ought to have directed the jury that the conversion was proved.

MARTIN, B. I think this rule should be made absolute. The real question is whether the defendant "converted to his own use, or wrongfully deprived" the plaintiff of his goods. Now it appears that the plaintiff had a bill of sale over the goods of one Morley, whose landlord the defendant was. After sunset on the 11th of August, 1872, when a distress was impossible, the plaintiff, who had previously put a man in possession, went himself to the house, with the view of removing the goods, there having been a default under the bill of sale. The defendant could not distrain that evening, but in order to have the opportunity of distraining he told the plaintiff that he would prevent the goods being removed, and he took steps accordingly, placing a policeman to watch the house and to prevent the removal. I think this was a conversion. The plaintiff was not bound to resist the defendant, and to remove his goods at the peril of coming into collision with him. He was deprived, by the plaintiff's act, of the power over his goods which he was entitled to exercise. That is, in my opinion, enough to enable him to maintain this action. If the defendant had been in the room where the goods were, and had said to the plaintiff, "These goods shall not be removed," surely that would have been a "wrongful deprivation." The defendant was, in fact, not in the room but in the passage, with equal means, however, of stopping the removal. I can see no difference between the two cases.

KELLY, C. B. I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The defendant, in my judgment, never converted these goods to his own use. The plaintiff was himself in actual possession of them, and all the defendant did was to say, "Rent is due to me, and before that rent is paid I will not allow these goods to be removed." This is no conversion. Many illustrations might be put to shew how absurd would be the consequences of so holding. For instance; suppose a lodger was ill, and an attempt were made to remove the bed he was lying on. Someone interferes, and says to the man who wants to remove, and who is the true owner, "You shall not do so." This is an interference with his dominion over his own property; yet there would be no conversion. Indeed, it is only by relying upon the somewhat vague language which has been used about this form of action that any plausible argument can be maintained. Apart from mere dicta, no case, so far as I am aware, can be found where a man not in possession of the property has been held liable in trover unless he has absolutely denied the plaintiff's right, although, if in possession of the property, any dealing with it, inconsistent with the true owner's right would be a conversion. A limited interference with the plaintiff's property, where all along the plaintiff is himself in possession, does not constitute conversion. In the case of Fowler v. Hollins, Law Rep. 7 Q. B. 616, the cotton was in the defendant's actual possession. I thought him not guilty because he was acting as broker merely; but even assuming the case was well decided, the plaintiff was out of possession, and the defendant had full control over the goods. So also in Willbraham v. Snow, 2 Wms. Saund. 87, the plaintiff's tools were entirely under the control of the defendant. Nor does the case referred to by my Brother Martin, of Fouldes v. Willoughby, 8 M. & W. 540, really assist the plaintiff; for the dictum of Alderson, B., which at first sight appears to favour his contention, is founded upon the assumption that the plaintiff was out of actual possession of the goods.

I think, therefore, that the plaintiff must fail in this form of action. He may have another remedy by some form of action of trespass on the case, but the measure of damages would be different. It would be unjust that, under the circumstances proved, he should recover against the defendant the value of the goods. The rule must, therefore, be discharged.

Rule discharged.[60]

[60] Pollock and Bramwell, BB., concurred with the Chief Baron. In his concurring opinion Bramwell, B., remarked: "Here the defendant did not 'convert' the goods to his own use, either by sale or in any other way. Nor did he deprive the plaintiff of them. All he did was to prevent, or threaten to prevent, the plaintiff from using them in a particular way. 'You shall not remove them,' he said, but the plaintiff still might do as he pleased with them in the house. Assume that there was actual prevention, still I think this action cannot be maintained. Take some analogous cases, by way of illustration. A man is going to fight a duel, and goes to a drawer to get one of his pistols. I say to him 'You shall not take that pistol of yours out of the drawer,' and hinder his doing so. Is that a conversion of the pistol by me to my own use? Certainly not. Or, again, I meet a man on horseback going in a particular direction, and say to him, 'You shall not go that way, you must turn back;' and make him comply. Who could say that I had been guilty of a conversion of the horse? Or I might prevent a man from pawning his watch, but no one would call that a conversion of the watch by me. And really this case is the same with these."

DONNELL v. CANADIAN PAC. RY. CO.

SPEAR, J. This case, coming up on report, imposes jury powers upon the court. It is the opinion of the court that the following facts may be found upon a preponderance of evidence:

This is an action of trover for the conversion of personal property, consisting of various kinds of merchandise of the alleged value of $2,600, the amount of which is not in dispute. The plaintiff was a large dealer in groceries, provisions, and feed in the village of Presque Isle, and had been so engaged for at least seven years. The defendant is a railroad corporation, having a station, freight house, and place of business at Presque Isle.

The defendant company and the Bangor & Aroostook Railroad Company are competing roads as common carriers of freight at Presque Isle. Prior to the 7th day of June, 1909, for several years the plaintiff had an agreement with the defendant that the bulk of his freight coming in car load lots should come over the defendant road, and that in consideration for this business the defendant should set apart a portion of its freight house for the storage of his goods, and keep them separate from the goods of other shippers, and allow the plaintiff and his servants at any time to remove them, for the storage of which no charge was to be made. This arrangement was admitted by the defendant's agent, and had existed for some years prior to the date of the fire. As a necessary result the defendant, his agents, and employés had been furnished with a key, whenever called for, for the purpose of storing and removing goods from the storehouse. Previous to the day of the fire, neither the plaintiff nor any one of his employés had ever been refused the use of the key, upon request, to give them access to the building.

On the afternoon of June 7, 1909, a fire started in the western part of the village of Presque Isle, about one-half mile from the freight and store house of the defendant, which rapidly developed, threatened, and finally consumed a large part of the village, including the freight house in question. At this time the goods alleged to have been converted, together with five barrels of sugar, which were removed, were in the storehouse without insurance. When the plaintiff became alarmed at the progress of the fire, he took his team, with three servants, and proceeded to the storehouse. Immediately upon arriving, he sent one of his men, Mr. McKenney, who had long been a clerk in his store and well known to the defendant's agent as his clerk, to obtain the key to the storehouse to enable him to unlock it and remove his goods to a place of safety. This was from three-quarters of an hour to an hour before the fire was communicated to the freight house. The defendant's agent, although he said in his testimony, "I presumed he wanted the key for the purpose of removing his goods," refused to deliver the key. He also says that he gave Mr. McKenney no reasons whatever for refusing him the key. McKenney returned without the key, and the plaintiff himself then proceeded to the station, found the defendant's agent, and requested the key. As to what occurred between the plaintiff and the defendant's agent with reference to what seems to have been a fatal delay in not turning over the key to the plaintiff, there appears to be a material conflict in the testimony, which must be solved in the light of the circumstances and probabilities, because it is not controverted that the plaintiff, had he been given the key when he first approached the agent, would have been able to save all his goods. Therefore the loss of the time between the request for the key and receiving it was responsible for the burning of the goods. The defendant contends that this loss of time was due to the voluntary concession of the plaintiff, based upon the conclusion that the storehouse was not in danger. The plaintiff, however, contends that he was unable to obtain the key until the burning of the warehouse was imminent. * * *

We therefore think that the plaintiff's testimony, corroborated by the probabilities, sustains the burden of proof in favor of his contention as to the cause of the delay. Upon this conclusion of fact, did the refusal of the defendant to deliver the key to the plaintiff constitute a conversion?

Again, the circumstances under which the plaintiff was acting constitute an important element in determining, not only the facts, but his legal rights upon the question of conversion. Under ordinary conditions we should gravely doubt if the acts of the defendant's agent could be regarded as tantamount to a conversion. The right to possession of goods in the hands of a bailee may depend, however, so intimately upon immediate surrender that a delay of a few minutes even may result in the difference between salvage and partial or total loss. And the typical illustration of this rule would occur in case of fire. It is the opinion of the court that it did occur in the case at bar. While the defendant's agent did not refuse to deliver the goods, nor claim title in them, nevertheless, under the circumstances, he exercised a dominion over them, in refusing the key, more disastrous to the plaintiff than an ordinary delay for a month to allow him to enter the storehouse. Upon the plaintiff's demand, emphasized by the immediate presence of dangerous conditions, it would seem that almost any hesitancy or delay to give him the quickest possible possession of his goods was wrongful. And, as we understand the law, a wrongful detention upon proper demand will support an action of trover. In Fifield v. Me. Central R. R. Co., 62 Me. 77, it is said: "To constitute it, there must have been either a wrongful taking, or wrongful detainer, or an illegal using or a misusing, or an illegal assumption of ownership." In Fernald v. Chase, 37 Me. 289, it is said: "To make out a conversion, there must be proof of a wrongful possession, or of the exercise of a dominion over it, in exclusion or defiance of the owner's rights, or of an unauthorized and injurious use, or of a wrongful detention after demand." To the same effect is Fuller v. Tabor, 39 Me. 519. Cooley on Torts, 524, says: "Any distinct act of dominion, wrongfully exerted over one's property, in defiance of his right or inconsistent with it, is a conversion. * * * It is not necessary that it should be shown that he has applied it to his own use. Does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of the plaintiff's right? If he does, that is in law a conversion, be it either his own or another person's use." We think the rule is too well established to require further citation that, when one person exercises a dominion over personal property inconsistent with the possession of the owner, in consequence of which the property is lost or destroyed, the exercise of such dominion constitutes a conversion.

Nor, in the case at bar, can the intention with which the defendant's agent withheld the key become material. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 681, and cases cited; 38 Cyc. 2029. See also Ingalls v. Bulkley, 15 Ill. 224.

In accordance with the terms of the report the entry must be: Judgment for the plaintiff for $2,600 and interest from the date of the writ.[61]

(c) The Defense When the Conversion was through a Destruction or an Asportation

BIRD v. ASTCOCK.

(Court of King's Bench, 1615. 2 Bulst. 280, 80 Reprint, 1122.)

In a special action upon the case brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, being a carryer, a boatman, for a trover and conversion of his goods to him delivered, and they miscarryed: two actions by him brought, the one a trespass, the other a trover and conversion: upon a motion now made, the rule of the Court was, that he should proceed in one of the actions onely, in the trover and conversion.

Coke. There was a case resolved in the C. B. when I was there, concerning Gravesend Barge, in which were a great number of passengers; one there had a pack of great value, and of great weight in the barge, there suddenly happened a very great storm, and they were all in great danger, and were, for their own safety, enforced to throw out a great part of the goods, for the safeguard of their lives which were then in the barge; amongst which goods, for the lightning of the barge, this pack of goods was thrown over: afterwards, he which was the owner of this pack, brought his action upon the case against the bargeman, for these his goods thus cast over; and we all there did resolve it clearly, that this being the act of God, this sudden storm which occasioned the throwing over of the goods, and could not be avoided, and for this cause he recovered nothing; upon this reason is the case in 6 Eliz. in Dalison's Reports, where one was bound to keep and maintain the sea walls from overflowing; if this happen by his negligence, this shall be wast, otherwise if it so happen by the act of God suddainly, and so unavoidable; the whole Court agreed with him herein.

BUSHEL v. MILLER.

(At Guildhall, Coram Pratt, C. J., 1718. 1 Str. 128, 93 Reprint, 428.)

Upon the Custom-House quay there is a hut, where particular porters put in small parcels of goods, if the ship is not ready to receive them when they are brought upon the quay. The porters, who have a right in this hut, have each particular boxes or cupboards, and as such the defendant had one. The plaintiff being one of the porters puts in goods belonging to A. and lays them so that the defendant could not get to his chest without removing them. He accordingly does remove them about a yard from the place where they lay, towards the door, and without returning them into their place goes away, and the goods are lost. The plaintiff satisfies A. of the value of the goods, and brings trover against the defendant. And upon the trial two points were ruled by the C. J.

1. That the plaintiff having made satisfaction to A. for the goods, had thereby acquired a sufficient property in them to maintain trover.

2. That there was no conversion in the defendant. The plaintiff by laying his goods where they obstructed the defendant from going to his chest, was in that respect a wrong-doer. The defendant had a right to remove the goods, so that thus far he was in no fault. Then as to the not returning the goods to the place where he found them; if this were an action of trespass, perhaps it might be a doubt; but he was clear it could not amount to a conversion.[62]

[62] Compare Shea v. Milford (1887) 145 Mass. 525, 14 N. E. 769: (P. had a contract with D. to build a house on land owned by D. Before the house was finished D. requested P. to remove certain chattels, then on the land and used by P. in building the house, to another part of the lot. P. neglected to do this, and D. then removed them to another part of the lot, doing no unnecessary damage. P. sued for a conversion of these chattels. Said W. Allen, J.: "The evidence negatived a conversion of the property by the defendants, and showed that they claimed no title to it, assumed no dominion over it, and did nothing in derogation of the plaintiff's title to it, and that all that was claimed by the defendants was the right to remove the goods from one place to another on their own land. All that was done was in assertion of their right in the land, and in recognition of the plaintiff's right of property in the chattels. If the plaintiff had the right to occupy the land which he claimed, the act of the defendants was wrongful, and they would be liable to the plaintiff for damages for breach of contract, or for the trespass, but not for the value of property converted to their own use. Farnsworth v. Lowery [1883] 134 Mass. 512; Foulds v. Willoughby [1841] 8 M. & W. 540; Heald v. Carey [1852] 11 C. B. 977.")

FORSDICK v. COLLINS.

(King's Bench [at Nisi Prius] Hilary Term, 1816. 1 Starkie, 173, 18 R. R. 757.)

Trover for the value of a block of Portland stone. The stone had been placed by the plaintiff on the land adjoining some shells of houses, which he had purchased in Hunter Street. The defendant afterwards coming into possession of the land, refused to permit the plaintiff to carry the stone away, and afterwards removed it himself to Burton Crescent Mews.

Puller, for the defendant, contended that he had a right to remove it from his own premises.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. But he is not justified in removing it to a distance. In an action of trespass at the suit of the owner, he must in his justification have alleged, that he removed it to some adjacent place for the use of the owner; he could not have justified this removal.

Puller insisted that no sufficient demand had been proved.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. A demand is unnecessary where the party has been guilty of a conversion, and he is guilty of a conversion where he oversteps the authority of law; here the defendant overstepped that authority by removing the property to a distance.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

WILSON v. McLAUGHLIN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1871. 107 Mass. 587.)

Tort for conversion of a horse. At the trial, after a general denial, the facts were found as follows:

On October 26, 1867, a horse of value of $250, belonging to the plaintiff, escaped from a pasture in Milford, and appeared a day or two afterwards in a highway in West Roxbury near an avenue which led from the travelled road into the messuage of Matthew Bolles. The defendant, who was in the employment of Bolles, supposing that the horse belonged to a neighbor, one of whose beasts had previously strayed upon the land of Bolles and done damage there, drove it from the highway into an inclosed pasture belonging to Bolles, for the purpose of preventing it from straying on Bolles's cultivated land. This was done without the direction, knowledge or authority of Bolles, who was not aware of what had been done until the horse had been in his pasture for two nights and a day, when he immediately directed the defendant to turn it into the highway again, and the defendant did so, and the plaintiff never recovered it. The defendant never caused any notice of the horse to be entered with the town clerk and posted up, or the horse to be cried.

The judge ruled that these facts would not sustain the action, and ordered judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff alleged exceptions.

AMES, J. It appears that, when the horse was taken up, he was going at large in the highway, and was supposed to be about to enter upon the premises of the defendant's employer. Under such circumstances, the act of turning him into an inclosed pasture was not an interference with the owner's possession, or a conversion of the horse to the defendant's own use. Nothing is shown at all inconsistent with a purpose on the defendant's part to keep the horse for the owner; and it has been decided that the finder of an estray may keep it for the owner, and is not liable in trover unless he uses the estray, or refuses to deliver it on demand. Nelson v. Merriam, 4 Pick. 249. We do not understand the plaintiff to complain of this act, except on the ground that the defendant afterwards violated his trust as a voluntary bailee by turning the horse into the highway again. But this, it appears to us, was the act of his employer, and not of himself. He could not keep the horse on another man's land, against the will of such other man. The turning out into the highway was therefore an act which he could not prevent, and for which he cannot be held responsible; and the plaintiff has no cause of action under his first count. * * *

Exceptions overruled.[63]

RYAN v. CHOWN.

(Supreme Court of Michigan, 1910. 160 Mich. 204, 125 N. W. 46, 136 Am. St. Rep. 433.)

Action by Daniel W. Ryan against Eunice Chown. A justice's judgment for plaintiff was reversed on appeal to the circuit court, and plaintiff brings error.

BROOKE, J. The plaintiff in July, 1907, was the owner of a hen turkey and 14 young ones. Defendant, who also owned turkeys, resided about a mile and a half distant from plaintiff's farm. One of defendant's hen turkeys had been astray for some weeks. About the middle of July, defendant, while driving along the highway, in the vicinity of plaintiff's farm, found a hen turkey and chicks in the road. She seems to have believed that the mother bird was the one belonging to her own flock, which was astray. At any rate, she caught the mother and brood of 10, conveyed them to her home and shut them up that night. Upon the same day, she was advised by one Thick, a neighbor of both plaintiff and defendant, who had passed her while she was securing the brood, that he believed she had made a mistake, that he thought the turkey she had taken belonged to plaintiff and that her turkey was on the corner. Plaintiff, missing his brood, and being advised by Thick of the fact that defendant had taken a brood, which he (Thick) believed belonged to Ryan, drove over to defendant's farm to make inquiries about his property. There, defendant admitted possession of the brood, said she did not know whether it belonged to Ryan or not, but that if he said it did, he might take it. At that time, the brood was in a field of standing oats and it could not be seen or captured. The oats were cut the following week. A few days later, and after the oats were cut, a note was written by plaintiff, demanding a return of the property, and threatening suit if it was not returned. Upon receipt of this note, defendant claims to have taken the turkey and her brood, one night after dark, back to the place in the highway where she had found them, and there liberated them, without notice to plaintiff, and he has never regained possession of them. Plaintiff, knowing nothing of the return (if such return was made), commenced suit in trover on August 29th, which resulted in a judgment in his favor for $22. Defendant appealed from said judgment to the circuit court, where it was reversed. Plaintiff has removed the case to this court for review on writ of error.

[63] The statement is abridged. The argument for the plaintiff and the opinion on a second count are omitted.

The trial court charged the jury in part as follows:

"I charge you, further, that in order for defendant to avoid the liability in an action for trover she must have returned the turkeys to plaintiff, before suit, and the fact that the turkeys were in the neighborhood some time after the commencement of the suit would be no defense to this action. Now, counsel ask me to say to you that if she turned the turkeys loose in the highway, that would not be a return, but I decline to give it in that form, and leave it a question for the jury to determine, whether leaving the turkeys where they were found in the highway was a return of the turkeys to the plaintiff. I say to you that if you find, considering the nature of the turkeys in view of all the circumstances of this case, that that was a proper, fair, and reasonable return of the property to Mr. Ryan, if they were his turkeys, and she did that before the suit, and she is sure about the date, then she would not be liable, but if you find that the leaving of them that distance from his house, at that time of day, or evening, or night without giving him any notice was not a fair and reasonable return of the property, then there is no question but that she was liable, if the turkeys were Mr. Ryan's."

We think error is properly assigned upon this instruction. The record shows that it is the nature of turkeys to wander. The alleged return, the fact of which, as to time, is not clear upon the record, was not such a return as would relieve defendant from liability, because the property was not in fact, placed in plaintiff's possession, nor was he notified of defendant's act. Assuming that defendant did just what she claims, her act indicated rather a desire to avoid liability than a purpose in good faith to repossess plaintiff of his property.

Plaintiff assigns error upon the admission of an advertisement, inserted by plaintiff, in a local newspaper, to the effect that 10 stray turkeys came to his place about October 12th. We think the exception well taken. Plaintiff had recovered judgment against defendant for the value of the property on September 20th. That judgment put an end to his right to reclaim the property, even supposing the property advertised to have been identical with that in litigation, which is not shown. Kenyon v. Woodruff, 33 Mich. 310. But the admission of the advertisement may have led the jury to infer that plaintiff had recovered his property, and was therefore not entitled to relief. * * *

The judgment is reversed and a new trial granted.[64]

GURLEY v. ARMSTEAD.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1889. 148 Mass. 267, 19 N. E. 389, 2 L. R. A. 80, 12 Am. St. Rep. 555.)

Tort for the conversion of certain articles of personal property belonging to the plaintiff. The case was submitted to the superior court, and, after judgment for the defendant, to this court, on appeal, on an agreed statement of facts, which, so far as material, appears in the opinion.

DEVENS, J. The defendant, who was a job teamster, removed the goods alleged to have been by him converted from a room in the dwelling-house of one Whittier to the store of one Davis, and there delivered them to Whittier, by whose direction he had acted. Although the goods were in the house of Whittier, they were in a room hired by the plaintiff from him. The contract between them was one for rent, and not for storage, Whittier reserving no control over the room. It was, however, neither locked nor fastened, although no goods were in it except those of the plaintiff. In all that he did the defendant acted in good faith, without any intention of depriving the rightful owner of her property, and in ignorance of the fact that the plaintiff was such owner, neither asserting title in himself nor denying title to any other, nor exercising any act of ownership except by the removal above stated.

The legal possession of the goods was, under these circumstances, undoubtedly in the plaintiff, and as they were in the room hired by her, the actual possession was also hers. The apparent control of them was, however, in Whittier, as they were in his house, and he had further the present capacity to take actual physical possession, as the room in which they were was neither locked nor fastened.

It is conceded that whoever receives goods from one in actual, although illegal, possession thereof, and restores the goods to such person, is not liable for a conversion by reason of having transported them. Strickland v. Barrett, 20 Pick. 415; Leonard v. Tidd, 3 Metc. 6. And this would be so apparently, even if the goods thus received were restored to the wrongful possessor, after notice of the claim of the true owner. Loring v. Mulcahy, 3 Allen, 575; Metcalf v. McLaughlin, 122 Mass. 84.

Upon the precise question raised, we have found no direct authority, nor was any cited in the argument; but the principle on which the decisions above cited rest is not unreasonably extended when it is applied to the circumstances of the case at bar. The act of removing goods by direction of the wrongful possessor of them is an act in derogation of the title of the rightful owner; but the party doing this honestly is protected because from such actual possession he is justified in believing the possessor to be the true owner. He does no more than such possessor might himself have done by virtue of his wrongful possession.

The defendant was a job teamster, and thus in a small way a common carrier of such wares and merchandise as could appropriately be transported in his team or wagon. He exercised an employment of such a character that he could not legally refuse to transport property such as he usually carried, which was tendered to him at a suitable time and place with the offer of a reasonable compensation. If he holds himself out as a common carrier, he must exercise his calling upon proper request and under proper circumstances. Buckland v. Adams Express Co., 97 Mass. 124, 93 Am. Dec. 68; Judson v. Western Railroad, 6 Allen, 486, 83 Am. Dec. 646. His means of ascertaining the true title of the freight confided to him are of necessity limited. He must judge of this as it is fairly made to appear. If Whittier had actually gone into the room, as he might readily have done, and taken physical possession of the goods, the defendant upon well established authority would have been justified in obeying the order, and transporting the goods to Whittier at another place; and he should not be the less justified where Whittier, in apparent control of the goods in his own house, and capable of immediately taking them into his actual custody, by entering the room through the unlocked door, has directed the removal.

If a person standing near and in sight of a bale of goods lying on the sidewalk belonging to another, and thus in the legal possession of such other, is able at once to possess himself of it actually, although illegally, and directs a carrier to remove it and deliver it to him at another place, compliance with this order in good faith cannot be treated as a conversion; and apparent control, accompanied with the then present capacity of investing himself with actual physical possession, must be equivalent to illegal possession in protecting a carrier who obeys the order of one having such control.[65]

Judgment for the defendant.

[65] Accord: Greenway v. Fisher (1824) 1 C. & P. 190: (D., a packer, acting under the orders of S., who had employed him, shipped the goods of P., in the ordinary course of business. Said Abbott, C. J.: "While he is a mere conduit pipe in the ordinary course of trade, I think he is not liable.") Nanson v. Jacob (1887) 93 Mo. 331, 6 S. W. 246, 3 Am. St. Rep. 531; Leuthold v. Fairchild (1886) 35 Minn. 99, 27 N. W. 503, 28 N. W. 218; Hodgson v. St. Paul Plow Co. (1899) 78 Minn. 172, 80 N. W. 956, 50 L. R. A. 644, and note 652; Walker v. First National Bank (1903) 43 Or. 102, 72 Pac. 635.

Compare Liefert v. Galveston L. & H. Ry. Co (1900, Tex. Civ. App.) 57 S. W. 899: A railway company employed by P. to transport his goods to Galveston as their destination, by mistake there delivered them to D., a steamship company, for transportation to New York. "In this case," said the court, "the steamship company received the goods from the Laporte Company, who had neither authority nor consent from the owner to export them. The rule seems to be that there is no lien in favor of the carrier where the goods have been received from a wrongful holder or from one not authorized to ship them. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 403, note. And in such a case the true owner can maintain an action for conversion, however innocent the defendant may be."

KNAPP v. GUYER.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire, 1909. 75 N. H. 397, 74 Atl. 873.)

The action was by Knapp for the alleged conversion of 5,875 pounds of potatoes. There was a judgment in the superior court for the plaintiff, after which the case was transferred to the Supreme Court.

The plaintiff was a farmer at Piermont, and the defendant was a merchant at Hanover. In May, 1908, one Blood, an innkeeper at Hanover, was in financial difficulties. He desired to purchase 100 bushels of potatoes, intending to use most of them himself, and to sell the remainder, and arranged with the defendant for the shipment of potatoes to Hanover in the latter's name. Blood called at the plaintiff's farm, purchased 100 bushels of potatoes, informed the plaintiff that the purchase was for Guyer, paid $10, and took a receipt therefor in his own name, and directed that the potatoes be billed to the defendant. Shipment was made in accordance with Blood's instructions. When the potatoes arrived at their destination, the station agent notified the defendant, who replied that he was not expecting potatoes, and did not know about them. Shortly thereafter Blood called at the station and inquired for the potatoes, and was informed that they were billed to the defendant. He thereupon left the station, but soon returned with an order written and signed by the defendant, directing the delivery of the potatoes to Blood. The order was complied with and Blood took possession of the potatoes, which were immediately attached by his creditors and held for his debts. Blood had no authority from the defendant to purchase potatoes in his name, and the latter derived no benefit from the transaction. He merely acted for the accommodation of Blood, and permitted the shipment of potatoes as above stated.

BINGHAM, J. It is clear from the facts found that the plaintiff did not sell the property in question to the defendant, although he billed it to him upon the representation of Blood that the defendant was the purchaser. It is equally clear that he did not sell it to Blood, and that in delivering it to the railroad billed to the defendant he parted with the possession, but not with his title and right of possession. Having the title and right of possession at the time that the defendant gave the order to the railroad to deliver the property to Blood, the order was an act in itself implying an assertion of title or right of dominion over the property, inconsistent with the plaintiff's title and right of possession, and was in law a wrongful act and a conversion. Brown v. Ela, 67 N. H. 110, 111, 30 Atl. 412; Baker v. Beers, 64 N. H. 102, 105, 6 Atl. 35; Evans v. Mason, 64 N. H. 98, 99, 5 Atl. 766.

If the defendant could be said to have honestly mistaken his rights, that fact would be of no consequence in this case. "The defendant's act in assuming dominion over the property was none the less an invasion of the plaintiff's right * * * because he did not intend a wrong, or know that he was committing one. An encroachment upon a legal right must constitute a legal wrong; and it is familiar law that intention is of no account in a civil action brought by one man to recover damage for a wrongful interference with his property by another. The law gives the plaintiff compensation for the injury he has sustained, whether the defendant intended such injury or not." Farley v. Lincoln, 51 N. H. 577, 579, 12 Am. Rep. 182. At any rate, the purpose or intention of the defendant would become material only when the act done would not in itself imply an assertion of title or right of dominion. Evans v. Mason, 64 N. H. 98, 99, 5 Atl. 766.

The original act of the defendant in asserting dominion over the property being wrongful, a demand was not necessary. Porell v. Cavanaugh, 69 N. H. 364, 366, 41 Atl. 860; Farley v. Lincoln, 51 N. H. 577, 581, 12 Am. Rep. 182; Bartlett v. Hoyt, 33 N. H. 151, 169.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

(d) The Defense When the Conversion was through User

DRAKE v. SHORTER.

(At Nisi Prius, 1803. 4 Esp. 165.)

Trover for a boat. Plea of the general issue. The case stated on the part of the plaintiff was, that the defendant, who was employed in an invention for making a vessel sail against wind and tide, had employed the plaintiff to work on her; that while the vessel was so working on, she took fire; that the defendant took a boat belonging to the plaintiff, to endeavour to extinguish it; but that she sunk, and was lost.

Garrow, for the defendant, states his defence to be, that while the plaintiff was working on the vessel, it was his duty to have taken care of her; and that the interference, in this case, was to prevent the fire spreading, by means of which the accident happened; which he contended was lawful.

Lord Ellenborough said, That if the fact was so, he thought it amounted to a defence: that what might be a tort under one circumstance, might, if done under others, assume a different appearance. As for example: If the thing for which the action was brought, and which had been lost, was taken to do a work of charity, or to do a kindness to the party who owned it, and without any intention of injury to it, or of converting it to his own use; if, under any of these circumstances, any misfortune happened to the thing, it could not be deemed an illegal conversion; but as it would be a justification in an action of trespass, it would be a good answer to an action of trover.

The defendant failed in proving the circumstances as to the ship being in the plaintiff's care; so that the accident of the fire proceeded from the defendant himself; and the plaintiff had a verdict.

WARING v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO., for Use, etc.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1874. 76 Pa. 491.)

This was an action of trover against Waring, surviving member of the firm of Waring & Lafferty, oil refiners. The action was brought for the value of three car loads of crude oil delivered by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company by mistake to Waring & Lafferty. The oil belonged to other persons. It was delivered by the plaintiffs by running a train of tank cars into the siding of Waring & Lafferty at the refinery, and leaving the cars intended for them without further notice. The cars were, as soon as could be, unloaded by pumping them into the refiners' tanks. There were no marks on the cars indicating to whom the oil was consigned. The oil had been received from the consignors by the Allegheny Railroad Company, the use-plaintiffs, and they had paid the owners of the oil for it upon ascertaining that it had not been delivered to them.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant took a writ of error.[66]

GORDON, J. Lord Mansfield defines the action of trover to be, "a remedy to recover the value of personal chattels wrongfully converted by another to his own use." 1 Chit. Plead. 146. The taking may have been lawful, hence the gist of the action lies in the wrongful conversion. Where one has the lawful possession of the goods of another, and has not converted them, this action will not lie until there has been a refusal to deliver them upon demand made. Ordinarily where such goods have been converted by the bailee, the law presumes it to be wrongful, and the action may be brought without a previous demand; but such presumption may be rebutted, showing a permission from the plaintiff to convert the property. So we may suppose a case of this kind: A. purchased a ton of wheat flour from B., a miller, B. delivers to A. a ton of wheat flour belonging to C., and A. converts it to his own use. Now it cannot be that B., as bailee of C., can maintain trover against A., without first explaining to him the mistake, and demanding of him a return of C.'s flour; for here the conversion is not wrongful, but permissive, there being nothing in the transactions which would lead A. to suppose that he had gotten any but his own property.

This example will apply to the case in hand. The defendant offered to prove that he had received from the railroad company no more car loads of oil than he was entitled to. This, as we understand the offer, not by way of recoupment, which was not permissible, but to show that he received the oil in good faith, supposing it to be his own. By his subsequent offers, he proposed to prove, that if he received the oil in dispute at all, it was by a delivery from the plaintiffs' agents; if there was an error, it was produced by the plaintiffs, and finally that the defendant received the property "at the instance and request of the plaintiffs."

The offers should not have been overruled. Had the proof therein proposed been produced, it is clear the plaintiffs had no case.

On such showing the defendant did no wrong, there was no wrongful conversion, and the action of trover would not lie. We observe no error in the charge, or in the answer to the points. Under the evidence, as admitted, they were correct. A wrongful conversion of the oil in question by the defendant, would sustain the action, and if he, or the firm of which he was a member, knowingly took advantage of the mistake of the plaintiffs' agents, and appropriated the property of another to the use of the firm, it would be such a conversion. This is the substance of the charge, and is, so far as it goes, a sound exposition of the law.[67]

The judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

HOMER v. THWING.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1826. 3 Pick. 492.)

Trover for a horse. One of the defendants was defaulted. Thwing, who was an infant, defended by guardian.

The plaintiff offered evidence that the horse was let by him to the defendants to drive in a chaise to the Punch Bowl in Brookline, and

[67] Compare Tidey v. Kent Circuit Judge (1914) 179 Mich. 580, 146 N. W. 224: (A limited copartnership, of Hamilton, Ontario, being indebted in the sum of $425 to the "Grand Rapids Textile Machinery Company," then located in Grand Rapids, Mich., sent their check for said amount to Grand Rapids for the purpose of paying this indebtedness; the check was made out and mailed to the "Grand Rapids Machinery Company," the word "Textile" being omitted by a clerical error. D. was doing business at Greenville, Mich., under the name of the "Grand Rapids Machinery Company," and had formerly done business in Grand Rapids in that name, selling secondhand machinery, and after he went to Greenville he instructed the Grand Rapids postmaster to forward his mail to the latter place. D. had authorized his wife to look after his business affairs in his absence, to open his letters, read his mail, and cash his checks. The letter containing the check in question was forwarded from Grand Rapids to Greenville, where it was received by relator's wife in his absence, the check taken out and indorsed by her, as relator's agent, "Grand Rapids Machinery Company, A. L. Tidey," and cashed at the Greenville bank, the money being received thereon and delivered to D., who spent it. "The fact," said Steere, J., delivering the opinion, "that relator [D.] acted under mistake, in ignorance of who was the actual owner, or even in the belief that the money was his own instead of that of another, does not constitute a defense in trover. 38 Cyc. 2011; Gibbons v. Farwell [1886] 63 Mich. 349, 29 N. W. 855, 6 Am. St. Rep. 301; Kenney v. Ranney [1893] 96 Mich. 617, 55 N. W. 982.") that they went to Fresh Pond in Cambridge without leave, and afterwards to the Punch Bowl, and that the horse was returned much injured.

The counsel for Thwing contended that, as this was a transaction arising originally on contract, in which the infancy of Thwing would have been a good defence, the plaintiff should not recover upon the same facts by changing the form of his action to tort.

But the jury were instructed, for the purposes of this trial, that the action would lie against Thwing, notwithstanding his infancy; and a verdict was found for the plaintiff.

If the Court should be of opinion, that the instruction to the jury was wrong, the plaintiff was to be nonsuited; but otherwise judgment was to be entered according to the verdict.[68]

Morton, J. The defence in this case is infancy. It is contended, that this action is founded in contract, and that the defendant cannot be ousted of this defence by changing the form of action from contract to tort.

Infants are liable in actions arising ex delicto, but not in those arising ex contractu. The defendant however contends, that there is a qualification of this rule, and that infants are liable for positive wrongs only, and not for constructive torts. But we know of no such distinction, and in the case of Jennings v. Rundall, 8 T. R. 335, so much relied upon by the defendant's counsel, it is expressly rejected. It is true, that an infant cannot become a trespasser by any prior or subsequent consent. But he may be guilty of torts, as well by omissions of duty, as by the commission of positive wrongs. 1 Chit. Pl. 65 (6th Amer. Ed. 87); Co. Litt. 180b, Butler's note 56. He is also liable for frauds, as well as for torts. And his liability is to be determined by the real nature of the transaction, and not by the form of the action. 1 Dane's Abr. 143; 1 Esp. Rep. 172.

Although an infant shall not be charged in trover for goods sold to him with a knowledge of his infancy (Manby v. Scott, 1 Sid. 129), and although an action will not lie against an infant for affirming himself to be of full age in the execution of a contract (Johnson v. Pie, 1 Lev. 169, and 1 Keb. 905), yet detinue will lie against an infant for goods delivered upon a special contract for a specific purpose, after the contract is avoided; Mills v. Graham, 1 New Rep. 140; and assumpsit will lie against an infant for money embezzled; for the Court will look through the form of the action into the tortious nature of the transaction. 1 Esp. Rep. 172.

It has been holden, that trover will not lie against an infant for immoderately using a horse which he had contracted to use moderately, on the ground that the action could only be supported upon the contract. Jennings v. Rundall, before cited. But in the case at bar, the driving of the horse beyond the place to which the defendant had permission to go, was a conversion, and trover is the proper remedy. In the case of Wheelock v. Wheelwright, 5 Mass. 104, which in the facts, as well as the principles, is similar to this, it was decided, not only that case for improperly using the horse would not, but that trover was the only action which would lie.

Whenever trover is the proper form of action, it will lie against an infant. The defence therefore is insufficient, and judgment must be entered on the verdict.

STEPHENS et al. v. ELWALL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1815. 4 Maule & S. 259, 105 Reprint, 830, 16 R. R. 458.)

Trover for goods by the assignee of two bankrupts. Plea, not guilty. At the trial before Le Blanc, J., at the last Lancaster assizes the case was this:

The bankrupts being possessed of the goods in question sold them after their bankruptcy to one Deane, to be paid for by bills on Heathcote, who had a house of trade in London, and for whom Deane bought the goods. Heathcote was in America, and the defendant was his clerk, and conducted the business of the house. Deane communicated to the defendant information of the purchase on the day it was made, and the goods were afterwards delivered to the defendant, and he disposed of them by sending them to America to Heathcote. No demand was made upon the defendant until nearly two years after the purchase.

The learned Judge inclined to think, and so stated to the jury, that if the defendant was acting merely as the clerk of Heathcote he was not liable; but if he was transacting business for himself, though in the name of another, then he would be liable. The jury found a verdict for the defendant. A rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, in order to question the accuracy of the learned Judge's direction in point of law.[69]

Lord Ellenborough, C. J. The only question is, whether this is a conversion in the clerk, which undoubtedly was so in the master. The clerk acted under an unavoidable ignorance and for his master's benefit when he sent the goods to his master; but nevertheless his acts may amount to a conversion; for a person is guilty of a conversion who intermeddles with my property and disposes of it, and it is no answer that he acted under authority from another, who had himself no authority to dispose of it. And the Court is governed by the principle of law, and not by hardship of any particular case. For what can be more hard than the common case in trespass, where a servant has done some act in assertion of his master's right, that he shall be liable, not only jointly with his master, but if his master cannot satisfy it, for every penny of the whole damage; and his person also shall be liable for it; and what is still more, that he shall not recover contribution?

LE BLANC, J. I think the rule of law is very different from what I considered it at the trial. The great struggle made at the trial was, whether the goods were for Heathcote or not; but that makes no difference if the defendant converted them. And here was a conversion by him long before the demand.

PER CURIAM. Rule absolute.

LOESCHMAN v. MACHIN.

(At Nisi Prius, 1818. 2 Starkie, 311, 20 R. R. 687.)

This was an action of trover, brought to recover the value of two pianofortes.

The plaintiff was a maker of pianofortes, and the defendant was an auctioneer. The plaintiff had lent one of the pianos, the larger, to a person of the name of Brown, whose wife was a musical teacher, on hire, for which Brown was to pay at the rate of 18s. per month, if he kept it for the whole year; and if for a less period, he was to pay a guinea per month. With respect to the other piano, it did not appear very clearly on what terms it had been delivered by the plaintiff to Brown, whether upon hire, or that he might dispose of it for the plaintiff. Brown had sent both these pianos to the defendant, to be sold by auction, and he, upon the plaintiff's application to deliver the pianos to him, refused to deliver them unless the plaintiff would pay the amount of certain expenses which had been incurred.

ABBOTT, J., in summing up to the jury said: I wish you to find whether the smaller piano was let on hire, or sent to be sold by Brown, if an opportunity offered; this is a question of fact for your consideration; and although I am of opinion that it will make no difference as to the verdict, it will give the party an opportunity of making the distinction. The general rule is, that if a man buy goods, or take them on pledge, and they turn out to be the property of another, the owner has a right to take them out of the hands of the purchaser; except, indeed, in the case of a sale in market overt. With that exception, it is incumbent on the purchaser to see that the vendor has a good title. And I am of opinion that if goods be let on hire, although the person who hires them has the possession of them, for the special purpose for which they are lent, yet, if he send them to an auctioneer to be sold, he is guilty of a conversion of the goods; and that if the auctioneer afterwards refuse to deliver them to the owner, unless he will pay a sum of money which he claims, he is also guilty of a conversion.

The jury found that the smaller piano had been sent to Brown for the purpose of a sale, and the plaintiff had a verdict for the value of both the pianos.

Leave was given to Marryatt, for the defendant, to move the point.[70]

GENEVA WAGON CO. v. SMITH.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1905. 188 Mass. 202, 74 N. E. 299.)

The Geneva Wagon Company sued Ida Smith for conversion of certain wagons. The court found for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted.

HAMMOND, J. The evidence warranted a finding that the title to the wagons was to remain in the plaintiff until paid for in money, and that they never were so paid for; and therefore that the title never passed to the Hendersons. Upon the uncontradicted evidence, the wagons were included in the mortgage. The language of the mortgage included them, and Henderson, both as mortgagor and as agent for the defendant, the mortgagee, intended that they should be included. After the mortgage, Henderson had the key to the building in which the wagons were kept, and the court could properly find upon the evidence that he acted as agent for the defendant, so far as respected her supposed rights as mortgagee, and kept them for her under a claim of right inconsistent with the rights of the plaintiff. This was a tortious act on the part of the defendant, and no demand was necessary before bringing the suit. Baker v. Lothrop, 155 Mass. 376, 29 N. E. 643, and cases cited. We see no error in the rulings given by the court.

Exceptions overruled.

[70] "In Loeschman v. Machin, p. 687, a sound and important rule is laid down perhaps for the first time in a civil action (it is really identical with the doctrine of 'breaking bulk' in the law of larceny, which dates from the fifteenth century), but the reasons are not given. These are supplied in several later cases, and especially by the judgment of Parke, B., in Fenn v. Bittleston (1851) 7 Ex. 152, 21 L. J. Ex. 41. The latest reported application of the principle appears to be in Nyberg v. Handelaar (1892) 2 Q. B. 202, 61 L. J. Q. B. 709. Although the bailee has lawful possession and the immediate right to possess, he destroys that right by parting with the possession in a manner wholly unauthorized by the terms of the bailment, and at common law, therefore, not only is guilty of a conversion, but confers no right to possession as against the bailor, not even a qualified one, on a person who receives the chattel from him, however innocently." Per Sir Frederick Pollock, in preface to Vol. XX of Rev. Rep. p. vi.

DEVEREUX v. BARCLAY.

(Court of King's Bench, 1819. 2 Barn. & Ald. 702, 106 Reprint, 521, 21 R. R. 457.)

Trover for oil; plea not guilty. At the trial, before Abbott, C. J., the plaintiffs proved a purchase of four tuns of sperm oil, then lying in the defendants' warehouses, from a person of the name of Collinson. The following delivery order was given, dated 13th February, 1818:

"To Messrs. A. and W. Barclay, Leicester Square.

"Please to deliver to the order of Messrs. Devereux and Lambert, the under-mentioned goods (enumerating them). Charges from 27th February, to be paid by Messrs. Devereux & Co. Edward Collison."

Soon after this transaction, Collinson, who had in the meantime purchased from Mr. Gamon, a broker, without the defendants' knowledge, some dark sperm oil of inferior value, then also lying at the defendants' warehouse, sold this latter quantity, about three tuns, to a third person, and gave the following delivery order, dated 3d March, 1818:

"To Messrs. A. and W. Barclay.

"Please to deliver to Mr. Dale's carts my dark sperm oil."

The defendants, not being aware that the two parcels of oil both belonged to Collinson, by mistake, delivered the first parcel of oil to the second delivery order, the first delivery order not having been at the time presented to them by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, on the 28th of March, presented their delivery order, and demanded the oil. Abbott, C. J., being of opinion that this misdelivery, by mistake, did not amount to a conversion, so as to entitle the plaintiffs to maintain trover, directed a nonsuit. A rule nisi for a new trial having been obtained, Scarlett and Manning now shewed cause: The mistake which has occurred is solely imputable to the negligence of the plaintiffs, in not sooner sending their delivery order to the defendants. The conversion must be an injurious act. A mere mis-delivery by mistake will not do. * * *

Abbott, C. J. What effect the production of further evidence may have, the Court cannot anticipate at present; it is quite sufficient to say that this cause having been stopped too soon, the plaintiffs are entitled to a new trial. This is not the case of an innocent delivery, for it is one contrary to the knowledge which, in point of law, the defendants ought to have had. There is a great distinction between an omission and an act done. In the case cited from Burrow [Ross v. Johnson (1772) 5 Burr. 2825] no act was done, and Lord Mansfield expressly said that it was a mere omission. But here there is an act done by the defendants, which, in its consequences, is injurious to the plaintiff. Upon this evidence therefore, I am now of opinion that trover may be maintained.

BAYLEY, J. The case of Youl v. Harbottle [1791] 1 Peake, N. P. 49, shews that a carrier is liable in trover for a mis-delivery.

Rule absolute.[71]

POGGI v. SCOTT.

Action by Poggi to recover $2,000 damages for an alleged conversion by Scott, the sole defendant, of some 210 barrels of wine, stored in a room in the cellar of a business building in San Diego. This building was rented to a Laundry Company, who sub-rented the cellar-room to Poggi at $2 a month. The full barrels were in tiers along the wall. Near the door were empty barrels. Poggi, who lived 15 miles from San Diego, kept the door of this room locked, but came to San Diego about twice a month, and on each visit looked after his wine. Once a year he racked it off.

Before the tenancy of the Laundry Company had expired, the owner of the building sold it to Scott. In due course the Laundry Company moved out, but Poggi's wine was left where it was. Knowing nothing of the change of ownership, Poggi supposed that he should pay his rent to the former owner of the building. In this state of things, two Italians, Bernardini and Ricci, called upon Scott and told him that there were some empty barrels in the cellar of his laundry building which they desired to buy. Scott replied that he did not know that there were any barrels there, and made an appointment with them to visit the place the next day. He did so, meeting Bernardini alone. Bernardini took him to where the barrels were stored. There was no lock on the door, and exposed to view were some broken barrels. Further back, as Scott subsequently testified in criminal proceedings against Bernardini and Ricci, there were more barrels, apparently whole. "I went back and tapped them, and so far as I could discover they were empty." He told Bernardini that he knew nothing of the value of the barrels, and asked what they were worth. Bernardini said they were worth $10 or $15. Scott regarded the barrels as old junk, and offered Bernardini to sell them for $15, provided Bernardini would clean the whole cellar out. This offer being accepted, Bernardini and his companions carted off the wine in barrels and shipped it away. They were subsequently arrested and tried for the fraud and theft.

[71] Part of the argument of counsel is omitted. Holroyd and Best, JJ., concurred.

In the light of these facts, the trial court, in Poggi's action for conversion, granted a nonsuit. From the judgment which followed, the plaintiff appealed.[72]

In support of the non-suit the respondent argued that as Scott thought that he was disposing of so much junk or rubbish in the form of barrels, he could not be held for the conversion of full barrels of wine, or for the value of wine in barrels. It was further argued that the asportation of the wine could not be charged to any act of Scott.

HENSHAW, J. (after stating the facts). The foundation for the action of conversion rests neither in the knowledge nor the intent of the defendant. It rests upon the unwarranted interference by defendant with the dominion over the property of the plaintiff from which injury to the latter results. Therefore neither good nor bad faith, neither care nor negligence, neither knowledge nor ignorance, are of the gist of the action. "The plaintiff's right of redress no longer depends upon his showing, in any way, that the defendant did the act in question from wrongful motives, or, generally speaking, even intentionally; and hence the want of such motives, or of intention, is no defense. Nor, indeed, is negligence any necessary part of the case. Here, then, is a class of cases in which the tort consists in the breach of what may be called an absolute duty; the act itself (in some cases it must have caused damage) is unlawful and redressable as a tort. 1 Bigelow on Torts, p. 6. And says Judge Cooley (Cubit v. O'Dett, 51 Mich. 347, 16 N. W. 679): "Absence of bad faith can never excuse a trespass, though the existence of bad faith may sometimes aggravate it. Every one must be sure of his legal right when he invades the possession of another." And without further quotation, reference may be made to 1 Street on Foundations of Legal Liability, pp. 231, et seq.; 38 Cyc. p. 2015; Horton v. Jack, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 758, 37 Pac. 653; s. c., 126 Cal. 526, 58 Pac. 1051; Budd v. Multnomah Co., 12 Or. 271, 7 Pac. 99, 53 Am. Rep. 355; Bolling v. Kirby, 24 Am. St. Rep. 795, Prof. Freeman's note; Isle Royal Mining Co. v. Hertin, 37 Mich. 332, 26 Am. Rep. 520; Galvin v. Bacon, 11 Me. 28, 25 Am. Dec. 258; Donahue v. Shippee, 15 R. I. 453, 8 Atl. 541; Hobart v. Hagget, 12 Me. 67, 28 Am. Dec. 159; Davis v. Tacoma Ry. & Power Co., 35 Wash. 203, 77 Pac. 209, 66 L. R. A. 802; Cook v. Monroe, 45 Neb. 349, 63 N. W. 800; Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 128.

In consonance with the principles of law thus declared, no question can arise of the defendant's responsibility under the evidence. Conceding all that may be argued as to the absence of improper motives on the part of the defendant, the all-important fact yet remains, under his own testimony, that he sold barrels that did not belong to him, and which did with their contents belong to the plaintiff. That he did not know that the barrels contained wine did not excuse his conduct. He had no legal right to sell the barrels whether or not they contained wine. He was exercising an unjustifiable and unwarranted dominion and control over the property of another, and from his acts great loss resulted to that other. * * *

An appellate court is always reluctant to review evidence the primary duty of weighing which rests with a jury. It does so only, as here, under compulsion. The views which it is forced to express are not to be taken as conveying anything beyond what the necessities of the consideration require. So here, those views are to be considered as expressing merely this court's conviction that the evidence offered by plaintiff demanded the consideration of the case by the jury, and that the trial court was therefore in error in withholding that consideration from the jury and in granting a nonsuit.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.[73]

We concur: MELVIN, J.; LORIGAN, J.

CERNAHAN v. CHRISLER.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1900. 107 Wis. 645, 83 N. W. 778.)

This action was brought in justice court to recover for the conversion by defendant of a horse, buggy, and harness. The trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for six cents damages and costs. The case was appealed to the circuit court, and was tried and disposed of upon the justice's return of testimony. The judgment of the court below was affirmed. The defendant brings this appeal. The following facts are shown by the record:

Plaintiff purchased the property of Mrs. Lowe, a widow, who at his direction left it at a livery stable in the city of Eau Claire. Mrs. Lowe eloped, leaving several children. William Lowe, a brother of her deceased husband, took charge of the children. He came to Eau Claire to look up any property she may have left, and at his request the defendant, who was undersheriff, assisted him. The defendant found the property at the livery stable, and directed the persons in charge not to let any one have it. He returned soon afterwards with Mr. Lowe, and directed the livery stable keeper to deliver the property to him, and it was taken away. He acted on the supposition that it belonged to Mrs. Lowe. The following day he was informed by plaintiff that he owned the property. He replied that he had acted a little too quick in the matter, and that he would have the horse brought in the next day. After the suit had been commenced, and before trial, Lowe brought the property back to the stable, and made claim for keeping of the horse. Plaintiff declined to pay, and took the property and sent it to his farm.

BARDEEN, J. Two questions are suggested by the record: (1) Does the evidence show that defendant was guilty of a conversion of the [73] Only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point. In the testimony there were facts which tended to show that the defendant had some knowledge of the plaintiff's tenancy, and a suspicion that the barrels were not empty.

property sued for? (2) Was the taking of the property by plaintiff pending the suit a waiver of his cause of action for conversion?

1. We will first inquire what acts of a party constitute a conversion. Perhaps as terse a definition as can be found in the books is given in Cooley, Torts (2d Ed.) 524. The learned author says: "Any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exercised over one's property in denial of his right, or inconsistent with it, is a conversion." It is not necessary that there should be a manual taking, or that it should be shown that he applied it to his own use. The test is, does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of the plaintiff's rights? If he does, that, in law, is conversion, be it for his own or another person's use. Neither is it any defense to say that he acted as agent. "But one who assists in a wrongful taking of goods is liable, though he acted as agent merely, for agency cannot be recognized as a protection in wrongs." Id. 529. Neither is the motive which controlled the party available as a defense, except, in cases where exemplary damages are claimed, it may be shown in mitigation. Railroad Co. v. O'Donnell, 49 Ohio St. 489, 32 N. E. 476, 21 L. R. A. 117, 34 Am. St. Rep. 579; Tobin v. Deal, 60 Wis. 87, 18 N. W. 634, 50 Am. Rep. 345. In view of these rules, it seems entirely unnecessary to discuss the evidence. The defendant clearly exercised dominion over the plaintiff's property in defiance of his rights. It does not serve to excuse him that he was ignorant of plaintiff's title, or supposed title was in Mrs. Lowe, or that he was acting in the interest of Mr. Lowe. We say, therefore, that there is evidence to support the plaintiff's cause of action.

2. After this suit was commenced the plaintiff took possession of the property, and it is now claimed by defendant that he waived his right to further prosecute his action. We are referred to Collins v. Lowry, 78 Wis. 329, 47 N. W. 612, as an authority sustaining that proposition. This was an action for the conversion of certain shares of stock. Pending the action the defendant brought such shares into court and tendered them to plaintiff. At the trial plaintiff announced his readiness to accept the stock, and thereupon introduced the stock certificate in evidence. He claimed also the right to recover damages for his time, trouble, and expense in attempting to secure a return of the stock. The court directed a verdict for nominal damages. The recovery being less than $50, judgment for costs was entered for defendant. In this court the plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to recover for his expenses, etc. In denying a recovery under the circumstances, the following language was used:

"The theory of the case is that the defendant is only answerable for the value of the property, and that he or his vendee or transferee is to be regarded as the owner. Such being the nature of the action, a verdict for the value of the property converted necessarily covers and includes the damages for such conversion, and the acceptance by the plaintiff of the thing converted necessarily covers and includes its value, and hence such acceptance extinguishes the alleged cause of action for such value. In other words, the plaintiff pending such action, cannot waive the alleged tortious conversion by taking back the property, and at the same time continue the action and recover the full or partial value of the thing converted, not even to recover costs."

It will be observed that no cases are cited to sustain this proposition. It is true that in actions for conversion of property the measure of damages is generally the value of the property at the time and place of the conversion, with interest; but, when the circumstances show special damage over and above the value of the property, the almost universal current of authority is that such damage may be recovered in such action. This rule was recognized in Churchill v. Welsh, 47 Wis. 39, 1 N. W. 398, is incidentally referred to in Ingram v. Rankin, 47 Wis. 406, 2 N. W. 755, 32 Am. Rep. 762, and is expressly stated in Parroski v. Goldberg, 80 Wis. 339, 50 N. W. 191. In Churchill v. Welsh, 47 Wis. 39, 1 N. W. 398, and again in Warder v. Baldwin, 51 Wis. 450, 8 N. W. 257, this court discussed the circumstances under which there may be a return of the property converted, in mitigation of damages, pending the suit. The conclusion arrived at was that in case of such return, and in the absence of evidence showing special damage, the recovery should be limited to nominal damages. In Farr v. Bank, 87 Wis. 223, 58 N. W. 377, 41 Am. St. Rep. 40, the rule is again referred to and affirmed. It is there distinctly said that unless the plaintiff has suffered special damages, apart from the value of the property, the recovery must be limited to nominal damages, although in that case the return was made before the action was brought. It will be observed that the court speaks of the return of the property as being in mitigation of damages, and not in extinguishment of the cause of action.

This seems to be the rule everywhere, as will be seen by reference to the following authorities: Cooley, Torts (2d Ed.) 535, note 1; 2 Add. Torts, p. 513, 534; 2 Jag. Torts, 720; Walker v. Fuller, 29 Ark. 448 (where it is explicitly stated that, although the plaintiff could not recover the full value of the goods after retaking them, yet the receipt back of the goods alone would not bar the action; the fact should have gone in mitigation of damages); Bank v. Leavitt, 17 Pick. 1 (where it is said, "It is also well settled that, if the property for which the action is brought be returned to and received by the plaintiff, it shall go in mitigation of damages"); s. c. 28 Am. Dec. 268, and note. The case of Bigelow Co. v. Heintze, 53 N. J. Law, 69, 21 Atl. 109, contains an extended discussion of this question. The court there says: "In trover the cause of action is complete upon proof of the conversion. The return of the property is no bar to the action, but is admissible in mitigation of damages." Many other cases might be cited, but to do so would incumber the record. The rule is universal, and rests upon the ground that the return of the property does not extinguish the cause of action, but simply goes in mitigation of the damages.

It being established in this state that special damages may be recovered in actions of this kind, the infirmity of the rule stated in Collins v. Lowry becomes apparent. The theory of the case is not that "the defendant is only answerable for the value of the property." He is answerable, not only for the value of the property, but for any special damage the plaintiff has sustained. Hence a return or retaking of the property goes only to mitigate the damages, and not in bar of the action. In the case at bar, however, no special damages are shown. In Hiort v. Railway Co., 4 Exch. Div. 188, 195, Bromwell, L. J., said: "A conversion cannot be purged, and if a defendant is guilty of conversion he must pay some damages. A return of the goods undoubtedly might be shown, to reduce the damages, in the case of conversion, not only when the owner voluntarily received back the goods, but when he took them back against his will. In an action of trover and conversion, the practice was for a defendant to apply to the court for a stay of proceedings on a delivery up of the goods, and on payment of nominal damages and costs; but if the plaintiff refused to accept delivery, and insisted on proceeding with his action for substantial damages, he did so at his peril, and if he failed to get substantial damages he was made to pay the costs of the action. It is clear, therefore, that on a return of the goods the plaintiff would recover, not their value, but the damages he had sustained by the wrongful act, which was called the conversion."

The rule above suggested, when a return of the property had been had, of applying to the court to stay or dismiss the action upon tender or payment of nominal damages and costs, was referred to and approved in Bigelow Co. v. Heintze, supra, and is one that furnishes ample protection to the defendant. It is certainly against the policy of the law to permit parties to carry on litigation when only the question of costs is involved. The case of Machine Co. v. Smith, 36 Wis. 295, 17 Am. Rep. 494, however, does not quite strike the situation here presented. There the payment of the note in suit extinguished the entire cause of action, and the court held there could be no judgment for costs without a judgment for damages. Here the plaintiff was entitled, at least, to a judgment for nominal damages, which was a sufficient foundation to carry costs. The defendant might easily have protected himself by setting up the facts in his answer, and tendering payment of nominal damages and costs, as hereinbefore suggested. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

IV. Seduction and Loss of Service [74]

Actions for loss of service are of great antiquity and had their origin in a state of society when service as a rule was a matter not of contract but of status. At common law if A. took the servant of B., he took what originally at any rate was regarded as the chattel of B., and thereby he committed a trespass. So if a servant was beaten this was a trespass on the property of the master. It was early settled, however, that such a trespass was not actionable per se, but that it was necessary to allege, with a per quod,[75] actual damage by reason of the loss of service. The action, therefore, though founded on a notion of trespass, was in substance for the consequential damage, and there was considerable fluctuation of opinion as to its proper form.[76] It was, however, finally settled that the plaintiff might declare either in trespass or case.

Clerk & Lindsell, Torts, 220 (1906).

[74] The torts which at the outset were characteristically of this class have developed under several distinctive heads. An important part of the law of domestic relations, including Master and Servant, Parent and Child, Husband and Wife, began in actions for injuries to a proprietary interest in the service of another. These early actions are also the starting point of the modern doctrine of tort liability for inducing a third person to break his contractual relation with the plaintiff.

Cases on this latter doctrine will be given in Part III of this volume, under the subject Torts through Malice. The earlier aspects of torts through loss of service will be given here, but briefly, with reference only to their bearings on the general doctrine of torts.—[Ed.

[75] "Per quod servitium amisit." The clause was characteristic of and essential to the cause. Compare Robert Marys' Case (1613) 9 Co. Rep. 113a: "If my servant is beat, the master shall not have an action for this battery, unless the battery is so great that by reason thereof he loses the service of his servant, but the servant himself for every small battery shall have an action; and the reason of the difference is, that the master has not any damage by the personal beating of his servant, but by reason of a 'per quod,' viz. 'per quod servitium &c. amisit:' so that the original act is not the cause of his action, but the consequent upon it, viz., the loss of his service is the cause of his action; for be the battery greater or less, if the master doth not lose the service of his servant, he shall not have an action."

[76] "The action was generally on the case, but it might be trespass: e. g., Tullidge v. Wade (1769) 3 Wils. 18, an action for seducing the plaintiff's daughter, where the declaration was in trespass vi et armis. How this can be accounted for on principle I know not, short of regarding the servant as a quasi chattel. The difficulty was felt by Sir James Mansfield, Woodward v. Walton (1807) 2 B. & P. N. R. 476, 482. For a time it seemed the better opinion, however, that trespass was the only proper form. Ibid.; Ditcham v. Bond (1814) 2 M. & S. 436. See 14 R. R. 836, note. It was formally decided as late as 1839 (without giving any other reason than the constant practice) that trespass or case might be used at the pleader's option. Chamberlain v. Hazelwood (1839) 5 M. & W. 515, 9 L. J. Ex. 87. The only conclusion which can or need at this day be drawn from such fluctuations is that the old system of pleading did not succeed in its professed object of maintaining clear logical distinctions between different causes of action." Pollock, Torts (7th Ed.) 225, note.

The offences created by the series of Labour statutes and ordinances which followed on the occurrence of the Black Death and the Peasants' Revolt, have left a permanent mark on our law.[77] It was part of the policy of that code to compel all persons under a certain rank to serve any one who was willing to employ them, at the statutory rate of wages; and severe penalties were imposed upon a servant who refused to serve or departed from his service. Naturally, the Courts regarded any attempt to seduce a servant from his employment as violating the spirit of the Acts; and, accordingly, the action of Case for seduction or harbouring of a servant made its way into the books. The form of the writ is given by Fitzherbert, who expressly bases it on the statute of 1349, and says that it lies against both enticer and servant. By a well-meaning, but rather clumsy analogy, this action was, later on, extended to cover the case of debauching a woman; but the many anomalies of that form of action show how ill fitted is the machinery to achieve its object.

Edward Jenks, Short Hist. Eng. Law, 147.

The much abused English action for seduction is quite in harmony with legal principles. The person wronged is not the girl herself, who ex hypothesi has consented to the act, but her parent, or other person entitled to her services, who is damnified by its results. It is true that English law has, on grounds of policy, allowed damages to be recovered in this action far in excess of the value of the lost service.

Holland, Elements of Jurisprudence (10th Ed.) 173.

[77] "I come then to the Statute of Labourers (23 Edw. III); and my object now is to show that nothing in the provisions or policy of that statute will warrant the action under the circumstances of this case; and that the older authorities are decidedly against it. As we learn from the preamble, it was enacted in consequence of the great mortality among the lower classes, especially workmen and servants, in a pestilence which had prevailed in 1348–49. This pestilence will be found mentioned in our historians. And in the preamble it is said: 'Many seeing the necessity of masters, and great scarcity of servants, will not serve unless they may receive excessive wages, and some rather willing to beg in idleness, than by labour to get their living; we considering the grievous incommodities, which of the lack especially of ploughmen and such labourers may hereafter come, have' &c. 'ordained.' This preamble is followed by an enactment, that every person of whatever condition, free or bond, able in body, and under the age of sixty, not living by merchandise nor having any certain craft, nor having of his own wherewith to live, nor land of his own on the cultivation of which he may occupy himself, and not being in service, shall be compelled to enter into service when required on customary wages. By the second section it is made penal by imprisonment for any mower, reaper, or other labourer or servant of whatsoever state or condition he shall be, to depart from service before the expiration of the term agreed on; and no one is to receive or retain such offender in his service under like pain of imprisonment. This ordinance is the foundation of the action for the seduction of a hired servant." Coleridge, J., dissenting in Lumley v. Gye (1853) 2 El. & Bl. 216, 261, 95 R. R. 531.

This action [of trespass vi et armis, de uxore rapta et abducta] lay at common law; and thereby the husband shall recover, not the possession of his wife, but damages for taking her away; and by statute Westm. I, 3 Edw. I, c. 13, the offender shall also be imprisoned two years, and be fined at the pleasure of the king. Both the king and the husband may therefore have this action; and the husband is also entitled to recover damages in an action on the case against such as persuade and entice the wife to live separate from him without a sufficient cause.

Blackstone, 3 Com. 139.[78]

HART v. ALDRIDGE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1774. 1 Cowp. 54, 98 Reprint, 964.)

This came before the Court on a case reserved upon the following question: Whether under the circumstances of this case the plaintiff was entitled to recover? It was an action of trespass on the case for enticing away several of the plaintiff's servants who used to work for him in the capacity of journeymen shoemakers. The jury found that Martin and Clayton were employed as journeymen shoemakers by the plaintiff, but for no determinate time but only by the piece, and had at the time of the trespass laid each of them a pair of shoes unfinished; that the defendant persuaded them to enter into his service and to leave these shoes unfinished, which they accordingly did.

Mr. Darell, for the plaintiff, stated it to be a question of common law, and that the only point for the opinion of the Court was, "whether a journeyman was such a servant as the law takes notice of?" In support of which proposition he insisted that a journeyman is as much a servant as any other person who works for hire or wages; that neither in reason nor at common law is there any distinction between a servant in one capacity or another, and that the injury of seduction is in all cases the same, though the recompence in damages may be different. To shew that an action lay at common law for taking a servant out of his master's service, he cited Brooke, Abr. tit. Action sur le Case, pl. 38; 11 Hen. IV, 23, pl. 46. In Fitzherbert, 168, D, it is laid down, that "if a man take an infant or other out of another's service, he shall be punished, although the infant or other were not retained." In Brooke, tit. Lab. p. 21, a distinction is taken between the taking a servant out of his master's service, and the procuring him to depart or retaining him after a voluntary departure, being apprised of his first retainer: in the two last of which cases, an action on the case is the proper remedy; in the former, trespass, at common law. But he insisted that in no case had there ever been a distinction taken with respect to the time for which a servant might be hired; nor indeed before the Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4, was any precise time necessary; the object of which statute was very different from the question before the Court. He pressed the argument ab inconvenienti, stating that it would be of great detriment to the town, where the whole trade was in a great measure carried on by this sort of servant. That the verdict had found the defendant to be apprised of the retainer of the servants, it being in proof that he had desired them to leave their work then in hand unfinished.

Mr. Willes, contra. The single question is, whether the enticing away a journeyman shoemaker, who is hired to make a single pair of shoes, is such an injury to his master as that an action will lie for it? Now the jury have found that there was no hiring for any determinate time, but only by the piece: if so, they could not be the plaintiff's servants; for the term "journeyman" does not import that they belong to any particular master.

Lord Mansfield interrupted him. The question is, whether saying that such a one is a man's journeyman, is as much as to say, that he is such a man's servant; that is, whether the jury by finding him to be the plaintiff's journeyman do not ex vi termini find him to be his servant? A journeyman is a servant by the day; and it makes no difference whether the work is done by the day or by the piece. He was certainly retained to finish the work he had undertaken, and the defendant knowingly enticed him to leave it unfinished.

What is the gist of the action? That the defendant has enticed a man away who stood in the relation of servant to the plaintiff, and by whom he was to be benefited. I think the point turns upon the jury finding that the persons enticed away were employed by the plaintiff as his journeymen. It might perhaps have been different if the men had taken work for everybody, and after the plaintiff had employed them the defendant had applied to them, and they had given the preference to him in point of time. For if a man lived in his own house and took in work for different people, it would be a strong ground to say that he was not the journeyman of any particular master: but the gist of the present action is, that they were attached to this particular master.

Aston, Justice. It is clear that a master may maintain an action against any one for taking and enticing away his servant upon the ground of the interest which he has in his service and labour. And even supposing, as my Lord has stated, that the servant did live in his own house, if he were employed to finish a certain number of shoes for a particular person by a fixed time, and a third person enticed him away, I think an action would lie. If not, it might be a very bad consequence in trade. He is a servant quoad hoc, and though the seducer and enticer is much the worse, yet the law inflicts a penalty upon workmen leaving their work undone.

Mr. Justice WILLES and Mr. Justice ASHHURST concurred.

PER CUR. Let the postea be delivered to the plaintiff.[79]

BLAKE v. LANYON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1795. 6 Term R. 221, 101 Reprint, 521, 3 R. R. 162.)

The first count in the declaration stated that the plaintiff, who was a currier, had hired and retained W. Hobbs to be his servant and journeyman, &c. and that the defendant persuaded and enticed Hobbs to leave his service, &c. In the second count it was alleged that Hobbs, while he was so hired and employed by the plaintiff in his trade as such servant, &c. wilfully and without the leave or license and against the will of the plaintiff departed and absented himself from and left the service of the plaintiff, &c. and then and there went to the defendant; yet the defendant well knowing Hobbs to be the servant of the plaintiff, and to have been and to be so retained, hired, and employed by the plaintiff, &c. but contriving, &c. did then and there receive and harbour the said W. Hobbs, and did then and there retain, keep, and employ the said Hobbs in his (defendant's) said service, and wholly refused to deliver him to the plaintiff his master, although requested, &c. and unlawfully detained, entertained, and kept the said

R. 722: (Action "upon the case against the defendant for seducing workmen from the service of the plaintiff, a glass and alkali manufacturer." It appeared that "the defendant had seduced from the plaintiff's service several workmen, who were in his service under agreements as follows." These agreements, one of which is set forth in full in the report, were to this effect: "A. contracted to serve B. and his partner or partners for the time being, for seven years, in his business of a glass and alkali manufacturer, and at all times during the term to do his best endeavours, and use his utmost care and diligence in the works; and, further, that he would not, at any time during the term, neglect or absent himself from the said service, without the consent in writing of B. or his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as should carry on the business; nor would work for or serve any other person or persons, without such consent: in consideration of which service, B. agreed to pay A. 24s. per week for a certain amount of work, and to find him some other description of work, provided he should not require that quantity of the specified work, so that A.'s wages should not be less than 24s. per week, except when a furnace should be out, when A. agreed to work for 21s. per week: and it was agreed, that, if A. should be sick or otherwise incapacitated from performing the service, or in case of misconduct, or if B., or his partner or partners for the time being, or either or such of them as should carry on the trade, should discontinue the trade during the term, in either of such cases, B. or his partners should be at liberty to retain or employ any other person in the room or stead of A., without being obliged to pay him any wages or satisfaction."

Hobbs, so then being the servant and journeyman of the plaintiff, in his (the defendant's) service, &c., whereby,[80] etc.

At the trial at the last Launceston assizes it appeared that Hobbs, who was retained by the plaintiff to work by the piece, left the plaintiff's service on a dispute between them, the plaintiff having beaten him; that at the time of his departure he had some work in hand; that he then applied for work to the defendant, who was also a currier, and who employed him, not knowing of his engagement with the plaintiff; but that in the course of a few days afterwards the defendant, having been apprised by the plaintiff that Hobbs was his servant, and had left his work unfinished, and being threatened with an action in case he continued to employ Hobbs, requested the servant to return to his former master and finish his work: this Hobbs refused, and the defendant continued him in his service. No evidence being given in support of the first count; it was objected on behalf of the defendant that the action could not be supported on the second count, because it either imported that the defendant had retained Hobbs in his service, knowing him to be the servant of the plaintiff, which was not established in proof, or that he merely continued Hobbs in his service after he had notice of Hobb's engagement with the plaintiff, for which no action could be maintained, it appearing that the defendant did not know that Hobbs was the plaintiff's servant, at the time he first employed him. But Mr. J. Lawrence, before whom the case was tried, over-ruled the objection, saying that the plaintiff might recover upon the second count, if the jury were of opinion that the defendant continued to employ Hobbs after he knew that Hobbs was the plaintiff's servant. The jury having given a verdict for the plaintiff:

Gibbs now renewed his objection, and moved either to enter a nonsuit, or to arrest the judgment; stating that great inconveniences would result from a determination against the defendant, for that in such a case a person engaged in a great manufacture might be deprived of the benefit of the service of a journeyman whom he had retained to do a particular piece of work, not knowing at the time of [80] "The old forms of pleading in actions for enticing away or harbouring servants, besides alleging knowledge of the service, always alleged that the defendant did the act complained of, 'contriving and intending to injure the plaintiff.' Whether the latter averment was regarded as material and traversable was not very clear. No doubt in the majority of cases the fact of knowledge is practically conclusive of malice. But there may be cases in which the defendant bona fide, in the servant's own interest, advises him to break his contract. It was at one time thought that in such cases action would not lie, but in view of the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co., [1905] A. C. 239, this presumption is no longer tenable. Nor is it in all cases essential that the defendant should have been actuated by a desire either to injure the plaintiff or to benefit himself at the plaintiff's expense. The old theory that the whole gist of the right of action lies in the malicious intent, and that only where this is made out to the satisfaction of the Court is the aggrieved party entitled to damages against the defendant, in the light of recent decisions, being no longer a correct exposition of the law." Clerk & Lindsell, Torts, 222 (1906).

hiring that the journeyman was under any engagement with any other master, before the servant had finished his work, and at a moment when the materials then in work might be totally spoiled if left in an unfinished state. And he cited Adams v. Bafeald, 1 Leon. 240, where it was held by Tansfield, J., and Fenner, J., against the opinion of Gawdy, J., that an action does not lie for retaining the servant of another, unless he procure the servant to leave his first master.

Sed PER CURIAM. An action will lie for receiving or continuing to employ the servant of another after notice, without enticing him away. Here no fault could be imputed to the defendant, for taking Hobbs into his service in the first instance, because then he had no notice of Hobb's prior engagement with the plaintiff: but as soon as he had notice of that fact, he ought to have discharged him. A person who contracts with another to do certain work for him is the servant of that other till the work is finished, and no other person can employ such servant to the prejudice of the first master; the very act of giving him employment is affording him the means of keeping out of his former service.[81]

BUTTERFIELD v. ASHLEY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1850. 6 Cush. 249.)

This was an action of trespass on the case, for enticing away the plaintiff's son and servant from his employment. The action was tried in the court of common pleas, before Perkins, J., and came into this court upon exceptions to the judge's instructions to the jury.

METCALF, J. The question now to be decided is, whether the instructions given to the jury, upon the evidence introduced at the trial, were warranted by the law of the case.

The declaration contains a single count, in which it is alleged that the defendants, knowing that the plaintiff's son was in his employment and service, enticed him into their employment, put him on board a vessel, and sent him to sea on a whaling voyage. The evidence was, that the son left his father's house in New Hampshire, without his father's consent, and went to New Bedford; that he there applied to the defendants to employ him in a whaling vessel; that they, knowing him to be a minor at first refused to employ him; but that, at his urgent solicitation and upon his representation that he had his father's consent to go on a voyage, they took him into their employment and sent him to sea. Upon this evidence, the jury were instructed that the defendants were liable in this action, if the plaintiff never assented to his son's being employed by them, although they honestly believed that he had given his full consent. And we are of opinion that these instructions were wrong.

A master may maintain an action on the case against one who, knowing that another is his servant, entices him away from his service, or retains and employs him, after he has wrongfully left that service without being enticed away; and also against one who continues to employ his servant, after notice that he is such, though the defendant, at the time of retaining or employing him, did not know him to be a servant; and a father is the master of his minor child, within these rules of law. The books of entries contain forms of declarations adapted to these three distinct causes of action. And a plaintiff generally inserts at least two counts in his declaration; one for enticing, and another for employing or harboring; so that he may succeed on the latter, though he may fail to support the former. But in either form of declaring, it is a material and necessary allegation, that the defendant knew, at the time of enticing, employing, or harboring, that the party enticed away, employed, or harbored, was the servant of the plaintiff, or that he afterwards had notice thereof, and continued to employ or harbor the servant, after such notice. And such knowledge or notice must be proved, in order to support the action. See Wentw. Pl. 438; 2 Chit. Pl. (6th Amer. Ed.) 645, 646; 1 Bl. Com. 429; 3 ib. 142; Fawcet v. Beavres, 2 Lev. 63; Blake v. Lanyon, 6 T. R. 221; Reeve's Dom. Rel. 291; Sherwood v. Hall, 3 Sumner, 127, Fed. Cas. No. 12,777; Ferguson v. Tucker, 2 Har. & Gill (Md.) 182; Conant v. Raymond, 2 Aik. 243; Fores v. Wilson, Peake's Cas. 55.

The gist of an action like that now before us is, says Lord Mansfield, "that the defendant has enticed away a man who stood in the relation of servant to the plaintiff." Hart v. Aldridge, Cowp. 54, 56. And the enticing must be proved. 3 Stark. Ev. 1310; Stuart v. Simpson, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 376. Now what is meant by "enticing away from the service" of another? So far as we know, the word "entice" has no technical meaning. But, in a declaration like that in this case, it must mean something quite different from a reluctant employment of another's servant, under a belief that the master has consented to that employment. The word is often joined, in the precedents of forms, with the words "solicit, seduce, persuade, and procure"; and it evidently imports an active and wrongful effort to detach a servant from his master's service, by offering inducements adapted to that end. In Keane v. Boycott, 2 H. Bl. 511, Eyre, C. J., describes enticement and its effect as a dissolution of the relation of master and servant "officiously." We see no evidence of enticement, in the present case. The son had wrongfully left his father's service, before he was employed by the defendants; so that the plaintiff's declaration is not sustained by the proof. If evidence of the mere employment of another's servant, knowing him to be such, would support a declaration for enticing him from his master, there would be no necessity for a count which omits the allegation of enticement, and charges only a retaining, employing, or harboring.

Besides, if, in the opinion of the jury, the defendants believed that the plaintiff had fully consented to their employing his son, then the material averment in the declaration, that they well knew that he was in the plaintiff's service, was not proved, but was disproved. For it is impossible that they should know him to be in the service of one whom they believed to have dispensed with his service. New trial ordered.

NICHOL et al. v. MARTYN.

(At Nisi Prius, Sittings after Term at Guildhall, 1799. 2 Esp. 732.)

This was a special action on the case, against the defendant, for seducing the plaintiffs' customers.

The plaintiffs were wholesale ironmongers, who carried on a very extensive business; the defendant had been employed by them as their rider or traveller, to get orders in the course of their business; and the foundation of the action was, that the defendant, who at the time of bringing the action was in the same line of business with the plaintiffs, had, during the time that he was in their employment, endeavoured to seduce the several country shopkeepers who were in the habits of dealing with the plaintiffs, to leave off dealing with them, and to transfer their business to the defendant.

To prove the plaintiffs' case, they called some of those country shopkeepers. Their evidence proved that the defendant on his last coming to their shops as rider to the plaintiffs, and on their business, had told them that he was himself going into the same business with the plaintiffs after Christmas, and would then be obliged to them for an order on his own account.

It appeared, however, on the cross-examination of those witnesses, that he took the orders regularly for the plaintiffs on that journey, and that they were executed on the plaintiffs' account; and that no solicitation was used by the defendant for any order at that time, which might have been supplied by the plaintiffs.

It was also admitted, that in fact, the time of the defendant's engagement to serve the plaintiffs, expired at the beginning of the year; so that, in truth, in the month of March he would have been completely his own master.

LORD KENYON, Chief Justice. The conduct of the defendant in this case, may perhaps be accounted not handsome, but I cannot say that it is contrary to law. The relation in which he stood to the plaintiffs, as their servant, imposed on him a duty which is called of imperfect obligation, but no such as can enable the plaintiffs to maintain an action. A servant while engaged in the service of his master, has no right to do any act which may injure his trade, or undermine his business; but every one has a right, if he can, to better his situation in the world; and if he does it by means not contrary to law, though the master may be eventually injured, it is damnum abs. injuria. There is nothing morally bad, or very improper in a servant, who has it in contemplation at a future period to set up for himself, to endeavour to conciliate the regard of his master's customers, and to recommend himself to them, so as to procure some business from them as well as others. In the present case, the defendant did not solicit the present orders of the customers: on the contrary, he took for the plaintiffs all those he could obtain: his request of business for himself was prospective, and for a time when the relation of master and servant between him and the plaintiffs would be at an end.

It was suggested in the course of the cause, that the defendant had seduced some of the servants of the plaintiffs to quit their service and to enter into his when he went into business.

Upon that point LORD KENYON said, that seducing a servant, and enticing him to leave his master while the master by the contract had a right to his services, was certainly actionable; but that to induce a servant to leave his master's service at the expiration of the time for which the servant had hired himself, although the servant had no intention at the time of quitting his master's service, was not the subject of an action.

The plaintiffs were nonsuited.

DEAN v. PEEL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1804. 5 East, 45, 102 Reprint, 986, 7 R. R. 653.)

This was an action on the case for debauching and getting with child the plaintiff's daughter. The declaration stated that the defendant, wrongfully intending to injure the plaintiff, debauched and carnally knew E. D. then being the daughter and servant of the plaintiff, whereby she became pregnant, &c. and diseased, &c. by means whereof the said E. D. was rendered unable to perform the necessary affairs and business of her said father and master, during all which time he was deprived of her service, and was obliged to expend so much in nursing and taking care of her. The cause was tried before Chambre, J., at the last assizes at Lancaster; when the facts appeared to be that the daughter, who was 19 years of age when she was seduced, was then living in the house of one Taylor, who had before married her sister, a few doors from her father's house in Manchester. Taylor kept a public house; and his wife having then lately died, the plaintiff's daughter acted as his housekeeper, and had the care of the bar: but no contract was made with her brother-in-law for wages, either by herself or the plaintiff her father, nor did she in fact receive any: and she might have left him when she pleased: but while her sister lay dead in the house Taylor told her that she might take what money she wanted. Finding herself with child she returned to her father's house and afterwards lay in there at his expense: and after her removal thither she applied to Taylor for wages, who refused to pay any. The daughter, by whom the above facts were proved, added, upon her examination, that if this misfortune had not befallen her she had determined not to return to her father's house. On this evidence the learned Judge nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that there was no service proved to the father at the time of the seduction and getting with child: and that the daughter being under age at the time (which was pressed upon him as distinguishing this from former cases) made no difference, particularly as she had no animus revertendi to her father's family.

Topping now moved to set aside the nonsuit and for a new trial, on the distinction before taken. * * *

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. In those cases [82] the implied relationship of master and servant continued. But here there was no animus revertendi: the daughter declared on her examination that she had no intention of returning to her father's house before this misfortune; and she was actually in the service of another person. I think therefore that the opinion of the learned Judge who tried the cause was correct.

PER CURIAM. Rule refused.

CARR v. CLARKE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1818. 2 Chitty, 260, 23 R. R. 748.)

This was an action for debauching the plaintiff's daughter; and at the trial before Mr. Baron Wood, the plaintiff was nonsuited, on the ground that the daughter was not proved to be the plaintiff's servant. It appeared that she was sixteen years of age, and that the plaintiff her father, on removing from his residence, had left her behind with a relation, a Mrs. Shapert, in whose employment she was at the time of the seduction. The father, however, received from his daughter a part of the wages. Scarlett now moved to set aside the nonsuit and have a new trial. He contended that there was in this case an animus revertendi on the part of the daughter; and that her father receiving part of the wages and she herself being under age,

[82] The reference is to two cases referred to by Topping, in which Wilson, J., at nisi prius had given it as his opinion that "if the daughter were under age the action was maintainable for her seduction though she was not living with her father at the time."

And see Hedges v. Tagg (1872) L. R. 7 Ex. 283; Whitbourne v. Williams [1901] 2 K. B. 722.

there was sufficient evidence of service to maintain the action. Dean v. Peel, 5 East, 45, and other cases cited, were contended to be distinguishable; the daughter, although under age, being actually in the service of another person, and having no intention of returning. In Postlethwaite v. Parkes, 3 Burr. 1878, the daughter was in another service, and of full age at the time of the seduction. Bennett v. Allcott, 2 T. R. 168. "The rule that there must be a contract for service, is too narrow for the liberal sentiments of the present time. The slightest service has been held sufficient."

ABBOTT, C. J. Even making tea has been said to be an act of service. But here there was in fact a service with another person, who could undoubtedly have brought the action; and then there might be two actions. The declaration states that the injury was committed, "the party then being the daughter and servant of the plaintiff."

BAYLEY, J., mentioned Fores v. Wilson, 1 Peake, 77. The cases go upon the express ground, that the relation of master and servant must exist; but the evidence may be very slight. The parties must stand in the relation of master and servant, although a temporary absence may not be sufficient to destroy that relation. If it had been established that Mrs. Shapert had paid the father the wages, perhaps the plaintiff might have succeeded.

ABBOTT, C. J. This action is founded on the situation of master and servant, not upon that of parent and child. When the father is in a condition to bring the action, and the child is his servant, that circumstance may increase the damages; but we can go no farther. In this case, the allegation that the child is the servant of the plaintiff is not proved. She was the servant of another person.

BAYLEY, J., was of the same opinion, and referred to Satterthwaite v. Duerst, 5 East, 47. The action is supported by the evidence of one of the criminal parties, and therefore should be kept within close bounds. The declaration must state that the girl was the servant of the plaintiff. Lord Mansfield, in the case referred to, after looking into the cases said, that the action would not lie, unless it was laid per quod servitum amisit.

Scarlett then observed, that WOOD, B., was anxious that the motion should be brought before the Court. And,

ABBOTT, C. J., observed, that it was very natural that any person should feel anxious that the law upon this subject was rather different from what it is.

Rule refused.

MANVELL v. THOMSON.

(At Nisi Prius, Adjourned Sittings at Guildhall, 1826. 2 Car. & P. 303, 31 R. R. 666.)

Trespass for seducing the plaintiff's niece and servant.

The plaintiff was a ticket porter, and his niece, the subject of the action, was a girl of about sixteen years of age, whose parents had been dead some years. A sum of nearly £500 apiece was left by her parents to herself and her brothers and sisters, which was deposited in the Bank till they should come of age. She was brought up at her uncle's and was for some time out at service, but returned to her uncle's house previously to the time when she was debauched by the defendant. It appeared that while she was at her uncle's, who had several children, she assisted them in the domestic business of the house, as they kept no regular servant.

Denman, for the defendant. The action is not maintainable; the evidence of service is too slight. The presumption of her being a servant to her uncle, is rebutted by the fact of her having so large a sum of money; and the relation of uncle and niece is not of itself sufficient.

ABBOTT, C. J. Certainly the relation of uncle and niece of itself will not do; but I think there is enough in the evidence to constitute the relation of master and servant. Suppose a son has money enough to find himself in clothes, the relation of father and son is not destroyed by that circumstance. In this case, the uncle is in loco parentis. The smallest degree of service will do. It seems there was no servant kept; and it is reasonable to conclude, that all the members of the family assisted in turn in the performance of the household work.

The cousin of the girl, and a surgeon, proved, that when she returned to her uncle's house, after she had been seduced and abandoned by the defendant, she was in a state of very great agitation, and continued so for some time; that she received medical attendance, and was obliged to be watched, lest she should do herself some injury. This was taken as evidence raising the presumption of loss of service by the uncle; and he had a Verdict—damages £400.

MURRAY v. FITZGERALD.

(King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland. Nov., 1905; Court of Appeal, Feb., 1906. [1906] 2 I. R. 254.)

Action by Michael Murray against William FitzGerald for damages for seduction by the defendant of Bridget Murray, the sister and servant of the plaintiff.

The following facts were proved: Bridget Murray lived with her brothers Michael and Pat on a farm at Clashmore, in the county of Waterford. Their father had owned the farm. He died over twenty-eight years before the action, leaving a widow and the three children. He left a will, which had not been proved. After his death the mother managed the farm until her death about twenty years ago. At the time of the mother's death Bridget Murray, who was the only one adult, managed the farm and paid the rent, and got the receipts in the name of the representatives of Murray, and also did the work which an indoor servant would have done (no servant being kept) doing both outside and inside work. The money produced by the farm went to pay the bills and the rent. The rate receipts were in the name of Michael. When Michael grew up, he took up the housework; there was no inside servant kept. During the time that Bridget was ill, Michael paid for the nurse to attend to her. It was stated that there was an arrangement that if Bridget married, she was to have £100.

The jury found that at the times of the seduction and birth of the child, Bridget Murray was the servant of the plaintiff, and they found a verdict for £100.

The defendant moved to set aside the verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and that judgment should be entered for the defendant, on the ground that there was no evidence to sustain the finding of the jury that the relation of master and servant existed between the plaintiff and Bridget Murray.

In the King's Bench Division it was held by ANDREWS and BOYD, JJ., GIBSON, J., dissenting, that there was evidence upon which the verdict in favour of the plaintiff could be sustained. The defendant appealed.[83]

In the Court of Appeal.

FITZGIBBON, L. J. I find it impossible to question the verdict in this case without disturbing the settled law as to the action for seduction. The judgments of ANDREWS, J., and BOYD, J., appear to me to put the plaintiff's right on its proper foundation. The judgment of GIBSON, J., is rather a doubting than a dissenting judgment. He truly says that it is a hard case; but I cannot agree with him that "the action is so far founded on fiction that sometimes it is impossible to reconcile the view of the Court with common sense or reality."

I am unable to disturb the verdict, because I cannot hold that a reasonable jury could not find, on the evidence, that the relation of master and servant—as legally understood for the purposes of such an action—existed between the plaintiff and his sister, and that a loss of her service was caused to the plaintiff by her seduction.

[83] The opinions of Andrews, Boyd, and Gibson, JJ., in the King's Bench Division, the opinion of Walker, C., in the Court of Appeal, who concurred with FitzGibbon, L. J., portions of the opinions by FitzGibbon and Holmes, L. JJ., and the arguments of counsel are omitted.

The "fiction" which GIBSON, J., regarded as irreconcilable with common sense or reality, can be defined. It is the fiction of "actual service"; but the word "service" is ambiguous, and Sir Frederick Pollock says, of "the relation of master and servant," that in modern law it is "created by contract, but for some purposes" (including that of supporting the action of seduction) it "is still regarded as belonging to the permanent organism of the family, and having the nature of status." The "difficulty in fixing the boundary where the sphere of domestic relation ends and that of pure contract begins, is only a difficulty of degree."

We have here, in my opinion, ample evidence to establish "the domestic relation" of master and servant, and that relation is quite enough to sustain the action. "Service" is the test word. In the Imperial Dictionary I find the following definitions of it: "Labor performed in the interest of others;" "any work done for the benefit of another;" "the act of helping another or of promoting his interests in any way." In these senses it means little more than assistance. It also includes "the work of a person in any way held to obedience or duty," and "the official duty or work required of one." The so-called fiction only imports obligation into the relation which supports the action of seduction, and as to that Sir Frederick Pollock says: "The test of the plaintiff's right has come to be, not whether he has been injured as the head of the family, but whether he can make out a constructive loss of service." [Pollock on Torts, p. 223.]

It is clearly settled that seduction can be maintained where there is no servitude—no actual obligation to serve. The domestic relationship does not necessarily depend on blood relationship—it is not confined to parent and child. A lady has maintained the action for the seduction of even an unpaid companion. It is sufficient if help of appreciable value is rendered by one member of a household to another member of the same household, who is "head of the house." The defendant's counsel asked Bridget Murray, "Weren't you the head of the house?" and she answered, "Yes." But Johnson, J., asked her, "Who is the man of the house at the farm?" and she answered, "My brother Michael is." I think the fair meaning of these answers is, that she was the housekeeper, and he was the head of the family. If reasonable men could accept that evidence, we cannot disturb the verdict.

What are the facts? We have to deal with the family of a farmer, who at his death left a widow and daughter and two sons surviving him. The widow afterwards died. There is some confusion as to the ages of the children at the dates of the deaths of the father and mother; but we cannot set aside a verdict because the dates are vague. When the father died, the youngest son must have been very young. The daughter was the eldest of the three. The mother survived the father for some time, and she died about 20 years ago. At that time the daughter only was adult. While the widow lived, she certainly was the head of the house. The widow managed the farm and household until her death. She certainly could have maintained the action if her daughter had been seduced during her life. While she managed the place, her position in respect of ownership, as the widow of the deceased tenant, seems to me to have been exactly the same, both in law and in fact, towards her daughter, as that which was taken up by the elder son, as soon as he became old enough to undertake the management. Until then the rent was paid by the daughter, but in the name of her father's representatives; but from the time when the plaintiff took up the management, he paid the rates, he employed all the farm servants, and the rent was paid out of the produce of the farm, still in the name of the father's representatives. The ordinary house-work of the family—all the work of a female domestic servant—was done by the sister. The younger brother may be left out of consideration, for he was not old enough to take any part in the management, and if his sister rendered any "service" to him she did so for her elder brother too. Not only did she perform all the necessary domestic service of the household, but when she was incapacitated, the elder brother had to employ and pay some one else to do her work, and if she had not been there he would have had to pay a domestic servant. He paid the nurse who attended his sister when she was ill. Under these circumstances—as the law stands—I think the jury was not only justified, but was right, in finding that, at the times of the seduction and birth of the child, Bridget Murray was the servant of the plaintiff.

My view of the law is put by Sir Frederick Pollock so clearly that I take the liberty of adopting the following passages from his book (Pollock on Torts [7th Ed.] p. 226), and incorporating his language with my judgment:

"In this kind of action it is not necessary to prove the existence of a binding contract of service between the plaintiff and the person seduced. The presence * * * of seduction * * * is not a necessary part of the cause of action, but only a circumstance of aggravation. Whether that element be present or absent, proof of a de facto relation of service is enough * * * when once the relation of master and servant, at the time of the acts complained of is established. * * * Some evidence of such a relation there must be, but very little will serve. * * * The fact of a child living with a parent, or any other person in loco parentis, as a member of the family of which that person is the head, is deemed enough to support the inference that the relation of master and servant, determinable at the will of either party, exists between them.

"Partial attendance in the parents' house is enough to constitute service, as where a daughter employed elsewhere in the daytime is, without consulting her employer, free to assist and does assist, in the household when she comes home in the evening. Some loss of service, or possibility of service, must be shown as consequent on the seduction, since that is, in theory, the ground of action; but when that condition is once satisfied, the damages that may be given are by no means limited to an amount commensurate with the actual loss of service proved or inferred. The awarding of exemplary damages is indeed rather encouraged than otherwise. It is immaterial whether the plaintiff be a parent or kinsman, or a stranger in blood, who has adopted the person seduced.[84]

"On the same principle or fiction of law a parent can sue in his own name for any injury done to a child living under his care and control, provided the child is old enough to be capable of rendering service; otherwise not, for the gist of the action depends upon the capacity of the child to perform acts of service." * * *

This being so, I am clearly of opinion that the case is brought well within the authorities, and that there is ample evidence of the existence of the relationship necessary to entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action.

HOLMES, L. J. * * * The action of seduction is founded on the wrong done to a person who is entitled to, or enjoys, the benefit of the services of the person seduced. It cannot be maintained without some proof of service or liability to service, although such proof is often very slight, and the service purely conventional. No difficulty arises where there is a contract to serve, express or implied. The master in such a case can always sue; and an implied contract may be inferred from very trifling circumstances. For example, a lady taken as a companion by another lady, without salary, and from motives of friendship, might be regarded in an action of this kind as the latter's servant, if she makes herself useful in the house. It would be a reasonable inference that she gives this assistance in return for, and in consideration of, the comforts of a home.

I think that at least one of the Judges of the Divisional Court held that in the present case the jury were at liberty to infer from the facts a contract of service. I am of opinion that there is no evidence from which such an inference can be drawn. What was the consideration given by the plaintiff for such a contract? No doubt Bridget did the indoor work, thus saving the wages of a servant, just as her brothers, by their labour on the farm, reduced the need of hired help; but the sister was no more serving them than they were serving her. Their position might be compared to the case of three ladies carrying on a trading establishment as partners, each superintending a different department of the business. If one becomes temporarily incapacitated for work, the loss is felt by all; but it would be, I think, absurd to suggest that, if such incapacity arose from pregnancy, the others would have a cause of action against the seducer. It would only intensify the absurdity, if the two other partners were in turn seduced, to assert that an action lay at the suit of the partner who had already yielded to temptation.

I have thus far considered the case on the basis of implied contract, which was, I think, the ground taken by the majority of the Divisional Court. I do not, however, forget that there is a kind of service wholly unconnected with contract that will support an action of this kind. It has always been held that where a daughter, living with a parent, is seduced, the parent is entitled to sue the wrongdoer, upon showing that the girl has rendered the slightest service in the family. I have no doubt that this rule of law arose from the idea that she is under a moral obligation to carry out the wishes of, and to make herself useful to, a parent, under whose protection and guidance she is living. This principle has been extended in two directions. It has been held to apply in a few exceptional cases where, at the time of the seduction, the daughter is not actually living, at least permanently living, with the parent. It has also been held to apply to cases where the nominal services are rendered, not to a parent but to a person in loco parentis. It is unnecessary for me to examine the authorities on those branches of the rule; for in the first the parent is always the plaintiff; and as to the second, no one could suggest that Michael Murray was in loco parentis to a sister, ten or thirteen years older than himself, who managed the money of the family, who gave card-parties and other entertainments, and who was, as she said in her evidence, the head of the house.

For these reasons I concur in the opinion of GIBSON, J., that the defendant was entitled to a direction in his favour at the close of the plaintiff's case.[85]

[85] In his opinion Mr. Justice Gibson had said: "I fear the evidence is at least as consistent with the work having been done for the brothers as partners: and if that were so, the action could not be maintained. It is a difficult case, as is apparent from what my Brother Andrews has said. The action is so far founded on fiction that sometimes it is impossible to reconcile the view of the Court with common sense or reality. On the whole, I think that the onus of proof which the plaintiff must establish is not supported. The case is remarkable in this, that there is no other master in existence, and that there has been a real pecuniary loss imposed on the brothers by the act of the defendant. If the view of my Brother Andrews is correct, that wherever there is interference with services rendered to the prejudice of the person enjoying such services that is sufficient to give a cause of action, the plaintiff must succeed; but I think the law requires something further: the services must be rendered to someone entitled to them as master. In cases where there is a real contract, as in the ordinary case of master and servant, there is no difficulty; it is only where service is attributed to some moral duty that a question arises. Here the parties were co-owners: and it being legitimate to refer the services rendered to that relationship, my view is in favour of the defendant."

TAYLOR v. DANIEL.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1907. 98 S. W. 986.)

LASSING, J. Matilda Taylor filed her suit in the Bell circuit court against White Daniel seeking to recover damages for the seduction of her illegitimate daughter, Annie Belle Howard. A demurrer was filed to the petition and sustained, and an amended petition filed, and a demurrer being sustained to the petition as amended, and plaintiff declining to plead further, her petition was dismissed, with judgment for costs, and she appeals.

The petition as amended fails to state that the daughter, Annie Belle Howard, was, at the date of the acts complained of, under 21 years of age, or that she was in the service of her mother, Matilda Taylor. In the case of Woodward v. Anderson, 9 Bush, 624, this court said: "At common law actions for seduction are based solely upon the relation of master and servant, and no one but those entitled to the services of the female could maintain it. The action is usually instituted by the parent, and the allegation and proof of loss of service was at common law, indispensable to a recovery." Section 2 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903 has modified the common-law rule to the extent that actions for seduction may now be maintained without any allegation or proof of the loss of service of the female by reason of the wrongful act of the defendant. But, as said in the case of Woodward v. Anderson, supra: "This statute does not give the right of action to any other persons than those who could maintain it at common law." The statute being silent on the question as to who may bring such an action, the common-law rule upon this question is, therefore, in full force, and the relation of master and servant, or parent and child, must still appear in the pleading. This being the case, and the plaintiff in her petition having failed to allege that her daughter was under 21 years of age, or was in her service, or that she was entitled to her service, we are of opinion that the petition failed to state a cause of action for seduction.

The judgment is affirmed.[56]

PETERS v. JONES.

(High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division. [1914] 2 K. B. 781.)

The action was brought to recover damages for the seduction of a girl aged twenty-two, the adopted daughter of the plaintiff, a married woman.

The statement of claim originally alleged that the girl who had been seduced was the sister and servant of the plaintiff. At the trial this description was amended and she was described as the adopted daughter and servant of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Peters, lived with her husband. She adopted the girl in 1906. The girl lived in the house with the plaintiff and her husband, and without any specific contract of service either with the plaintiff or her husband performed there the ordinary domestic services of the household. She was given by the plaintiff about 5s. a week for pocket-money. Her clothes also were provided for her. The clothes and pocket-money were provided out of the husband's money. The plaintiff had no separate estate. The action was tried at Cardiff Assizes, before Avory, J., and a special jury, when evidence of the facts stated above was given, and that the defendant had seduced the girl. The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff for £25. the case was adjourned to London for further consideration as to whether the action would lie at the suit of the plaintiff.

Wilfred Lewis, for the plaintiff. The girl who was seduced was not a servant of the plaintiff in the strict sense. She was the adopted daughter of the plaintiff. The plaintiff therefore stood in loco parentis to the girl. As the adopted daughter the girl owed a duty to her adopted parent. Any one in loco parentis is entitled to maintain an action in respect of the seduction of his or her daughter: Irwin v. Dearman (1809) 11 East, 23. * * *

Avory, J. * * * The plaintiff is the wife of Ebenezer Peters, and the question for decision is whether Mrs. Peters is entitled to maintain this action for the seduction of the girl, who for the purposes of this action may be treated as the adopted daughter of the plaintiff. On behalf of the plaintiff it has been contended that inasmuch as that fact is admitted or established, and as she in fact rendered services in the house, both at the time of the seduction and also at the time of the confinement, there is sufficient to entitle Mrs Peters to sue, and that it is only a person who stands in loco parentis who can sue for damages for seduction. Now, that contention appears to me to be a violation of the real principle upon which this action can be maintained. I shall refer in a moment to the judgments in Hamilton v. Long, [1903] 2 I. R. 407. But I wish to say for myself that the principle on which an action for seduction can be maintained is not, as the argument on behalf of the plaintiff suggests, that there must be the relationship of parent and child, or any quasi-relationship of parent and child, but that the relationship necessary is merely that of master and servant. And when one looks at the authorities in which it has been decided that a father may maintain the action in respect of a daughter who is under twenty-one years of age without proving any actual services rendered, but that if she is over twenty-one years of age he must give evidence of actual services rendered by the daughter, I think it is plain that the foundation of the action is not the relationship of parent and child but that of master and servant.

If I had had any doubt about that being the true principle I should turn to Hamilton v. Long, [1903] 2 I. R. 407, where the facts in my judgment gave rise to the very question of law that has to be determined in this case. In that case a daughter was seduced while her father and mother were alive and while she was living in their house. A child was born after the father's death, and the daughter continued to live with the widow. It was found as a fact that the daughter rendered ordinary household services to her mother after her father's death. In these circumstances it was held that an action could not be maintained by the widow either by virtue of the common law or the Married Women's Property Acts. Now it is admitted to be the law that the relationship which justifies the maintenance of the action must exist at the time of the seduction and also at the time of the illness consequent upon it that deprives the plaintiff of the girl's services. That being so, the Court in Hamilton v. Long, [1903] 2 I. R. 407, had to determine whether, if the services were rendered to the mother at the time of the illness, it could in that case be said that the services were also being rendered to the mother at the time of the seduction, and, if they were, whether the mother could maintain the action. The effect of the judgment was that as the father was alive and the daughter living in his house at the time of the seduction, he alone was the person who could have maintained the action, and that the mother could not, because at the time of the seduction the services were rendered to the father and not to the mother. If I had had any doubt upon the point, I should have willingly followed this decision of Lord O'Brien, C. J., Gibson, J., and Madden, J., for although the decision is not binding upon me it is of great authority.

Lord O'Brien, C. J., said: "Now, at common law the action would not, in my opinion, be maintainable for this reason, namely, that to sustain an action of seduction it must be shewn that the act of seduction took place while the relation of master and servant existed, and that relation in the father's lifetime existed exclusively between the father as head of the family, and the daughter as his child, and one of the family and one of the household which he maintained." He then deals with the Married Women's Property Acts and finds that there is nothing in those Acts which alters the position which the wife occupies at common law in respect of this matter. Gibson, J., said: "The action is founded on a wrongful interference, to the master's injury, with a subsisting relationship of master and servant. Such relationship is supported by acts of service voluntarily rendered without any enforceable contract, but the service must be to some one whom the law recognizes as master. The question here is who was the master? At common law certainly it was the father. He and his wife were one. As head of the family he was guardian of his daughter during minority, and when she became adult, so long as she resided under his protection in the family home, he was regarded as master in respect of all services yielded to or for him in the course of family duty. There is no trace of suggestion in the English law books that a mother during the father's lifetime could be regarded at common law as mistress" (that means mistress of the servant) "jointly with her husband or separately. She was merged in her husband." Madden, J., said: "So long as the plaintiff's daughter was an infant living under the dominion of her father, he was in law entitled to her services. After she became sui juris some evidence of actual services rendered in the household became necessary in order to give rise to the legal fiction of the existence between parent and child of the contractual relation of master and servant upon which the action of seduction is founded." That decision was approved in the Irish Court of Appeal, [1905] 2 I. R. 552, by Lord Ashbourne, L. C., and FitzGibbon, Walker, and Holmes, L. JJ. I hold exactly the same view as was expressed in that case. In my judgment the action can only be maintained by proof of an actual or implied contract of service. The relationship of parent and child gives rise to the legal fiction that there is a contract of service. The legal relationship of father and child does not by itself justify the maintenance of the action. The maintenance of the action is only justified by the legal fiction that a child living with the parent is a servant, and the action is maintainable where the daughter is under twenty-one years of age without any proof of actual services rendered, but after that age is passed there must be proof of actual services.

That being the principle, the question in this case is between whom did the relationship of master and servant exist. On behalf of the plaintiff it has been contended that because Mrs. Peters stood in loco parentis she alone was the person who could maintain this action, and that the husband would not have been entitled to sue; that as there was no actual contract of service, such services as were rendered must be deemed to have been rendered to the plaintiff, Mrs. Peters. But the passages I have read from the judgments in the Irish case of Hamilton v. Long, [1903] 2 I. R. 407, shew that while Mrs. Peters was living with her husband any ordinary domestic servant employed in the house was the servant of Mr. Peters and not of his wife.

Whether such a servant was paid wages or whether she was remunerated by gifts of clothes or pocket-money is, I think, immaterial. The moment that one appreciates that the action is based on the relationship of master and servant and not on that of parent and child one sees that the only question for determination is, who was the girl's master at the material times? There is only one answer to that question. Mr. Peters was the master; Mrs. Peters was not the mistress of the servant, and so she was not entitled to bring this action and, being a person admittedly without any separate property of her own, cannot be rendered liable for the costs of it. No application was made to me to add Mr. Peters as a plaintiff. In my opinion the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain this action, and there must be judgment for the defendant.

V. Defamation

(A) Origin of the Tort, and the Kinds of Defamation

(a) Its Recognition in the Courts of Law

The king's court [in the thirteenth century] gave no action for defamation. This in our eyes will seem both a serious and a curious defect in the justice that it administered. What is usually accounted the first known instance of such an action comes from the year 1356, and even in that instance the slander was complicated with contempt of court. In 1295 a picturesque dispute between two Irish magnates had been removed to Westminster, and Edward I's court declared in solemn fashion that it would not entertain pleas of defamation; in the Irish court battle had been waged. At the end of the Middle Ages we may see the royal justices beginning to reconsider their doctrine and to foster an "action on the case for words"; but they were by this time hampered by the rival pretensions of the courts Christian. The tribunals of the church had been allowed to punish defamation as a sin, and the province which had thus been appropriated by the canonists was not very easily recovered from them until the Protestant Reformation had weakened their hands.

We should be much mistaken, however, if we believed that the temporal law of the Middle Ages gave no action to the defamed. Nothing could be less true than that our ancestors in the days of their barbarism could only feel blows and treated hard words as of no account. Even the rude Lex Salica decrees that if one calls a man "wolf" or "hare" one must pay him three shillings, while if one calls a woman "harlot" and cannot prove the truth of the charge, one must pay her forty-five shillings. The oldest English laws exact bot and wite if one gives another bad names. In the Norman Custumal it is written that the man who falsely calls another "thief" or "manslayer" must pay damages, and, holding his nose with his fingers, must publicly confess himself a liar. Shame was keenly felt. In almost every action before an English local court of the thirteenth century the plaintiff will claim compensation not only for the damage (damnum) but also for the shame (huntage, hontage, dedecus, pudor, vituperium) that had been done him, and we may suspect that in the king's court this element was not neglected when compensation was awarded. But further, we find that in the local courts, not only were bad words punished upon presentment in a summary way, but regular actions for defamation were common. We may gather that in such an action the defendant might allege that his words were true; veritas non est defamatio. We may gather that the English for "meretrix" was actionable, though an interchange of this against the English for "latro" left one shilling due to the man. We already hear that a slander was uttered "of malice aforethought" and sometimes a plaintiff alleges "special damage." But until further researches have been made among the records of our manorial courts, we shall know little of the mediaeval law of defamation. Probably in this matter those courts did good enough justice, and for this reason it was that no royal writ was devised for the relief of the slandered. In later days, when the old moots were decaying, the ecclesiastical procedure against the sin of defamation seems to have been regarded as the usual, if not the only, engine which could be brought to bear upon cases of libel and slander, and in yet later days the king's court had some difficulty in asserting its claims over a tract of law that it had once despised.

Pollock and Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law (2d Ed.) Vol. 2, p. 536.

The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts was recognized both by the legislature and the judges. But it was soon seen that an unlimited jurisdiction over cases of defamation might be used, as an unlimited jurisdiction over breaches of faith was used, to get indirectly control over cases which ought to have gone to the king's court. Thus persons indicted and acquitted had a habit of suing the indictors for defamation in the ecclesiastical courts. It was enacted that in such cases a prohibition should lie. In Edward IV's reign we get an odd tale of a similar perversion of the action for defamation, told of no less a person than the Abbot of St. Albans. He had sent for a certain married woman, detained her in his chamber, and solicited her chastity without success. Her husband then sued the abbot for the imprisonment of his wife. The abbot thereupon sued him for defamation before the ecclesiastical court. In such a case the court found no difficulty in awarding a prohibition to the ecclesiastical court and declining to grant a writ of consultation. In self-defence, then, the courts of common law would prohibit certain actions for defamation. But, in spite of one doubtful case to the contrary, it is clear that all through this period they declined to entertain actions merely for defamation. It is not until Henry VIII's reign, in the very last of the Year Books, that we have any hint that the courts are beginning to think of claiming some share in this jurisdiction. Here, as in other branches of the law of crime and tort, the decline of the ecclesiastical courts and the competition of the Court of Star Chamber led to important developments in the common law.

W. S. Holdsworth, Hist. Eng. Law, Vol. III, pp. 316, 317 (1909).

Early in the Middle Ages reputation was amply protected in England by the combined secular and spiritual authorities. In the course of the nationalization of justice by the king's judges the jurisdiction of the seignorial courts fell into decay; and, after a long and bitter struggle, the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts was also absorbed by the royal tribunals. When, however, the king's courts acquired jurisdiction over defamation, during the latter half of the sixteenth century, various social and political conditions combined to contract the actionable right, or remedy. The king's courts granted only a limited remedy, the selection being based partly upon the character of the imputation, partly upon the consequences resulting therefrom; moreover, even this limited remedy was little concerned in theory with the right to reputation as such. By reason of its growth in this way the early common law of defamation consisted merely of a series of exceptions to entire license of speech. When, at length, early in the seventeenth century, the potentialities of the printing press dawned upon the absolute monarchy, the emergency was met, not by further additions to the list of actionable imputations, but by a direct importation of the Roman law, without regard to Roman limitations, and with certain additions adapted to the purpose in hand. This special provision for written or printed defamation, first adopted in the criminal law, eventually became also a principle of civil judicature. In this way a new principle of actionable defamation, based upon mere form, was introduced in the law. The original common law doctrine of defamation, based upon the nature of the imputation, became stereotyped as the law of spoken defamation, or slander; the doctrine inherited from the Roman law, through the Star Chamber, became the law of written and printed defamation, or libel. The English law of defamation, therefore, was first limited by a process of selection, and then confused by a formal distinction which is not only unknown in other systems of law, but is also wholly accidental in origin and irrational in principle.

PALMER v. THORPE.

(Court of King's Bench, 1583. 4 Coke, Rep. 20a, 76 Reprint, 909.)

Touching defamation determinable in the Ecclesiastical Court, it was resolved, that such defamation ought to have three incidents: 1. That it concerns matter merely spiritual and determinable in the Ecclesiastical Court, as for calling him "heretic, schismatic, adulterer, fornicator, &c." 2. It ought to concern matter merely spiritual only; for if such defamation touches or concerns anything determinable at the common law, the Ecclesiastical Judge shall not have cognizance of it. 3. Although such defamation is merely spiritual, and only spiritual; yet he who is defamed cannot sue there for amends or damages, but the suit ought to be only for the punishment of the sin, pro salute animæ. * * *

GRAVES v. BLANCHET.

(Court of Queen's Bench, 1705. 2 Salk. 696, 91 Reprint, 589.)

Action for these words, "She is a whore, and had a bastard by her father's apprentice;" judgment was arrested. The Court said they could not overthrow so many authorities. The reason of the law is, that fornication is a spiritual offence; and no action lay at common law for what the common law took no notice of, without special damage.[89]

BROOKER v. COFFIN.

(Supreme Court of Judicature of New York, 1809. 5 Johns. 188, 4 Am. Dec. 337.)

Action for slander, with a declaration in two counts. There was a general demurrer to the first count.[93]

SPENCER, J. The first count is for these words: "She is a common prostitute, and I can prove it;" and the question arises, whether speaking these words gives an action, without alleging special damages. By the statute (1 R. L. 124) common prostitutes are adjudged disorderly persons, and are liable to commitment, by any justice of the peace, upon conviction, to the Bridewell or House of Correction, to be kept at hard labor for a period not exceeding 60 days, or until the next General Sessions of the Peace. It has been supposed that, therefore, to charge a woman with being a common prostitute, was charging her with such an offense as would give an action for slander.

The same statute which authorizes the infliction of imprisonment on common prostitutes or disorderly persons, inflicts the same punishment for a great variety of acts, the commission of which renders the persons liable to be considered disorderly; and to sustain this action would be going the whole length of saying, that every one charged with any of the acts prohibited by that statute, would be entitled to maintain an action for defamation. Among others, to charge a person with pretending to have skill in physiognomy, palmistry, or pretending to tell fortunes, would, if this action is sustained, be actionable. Upon the fullest consideration we are inclined to adopt this as the safest rule, and one which, as we think, is warranted by the cases. In case the charge, if true, will subject the party charged to an indictment for a crime involving moral turpitude, or subject him to an infamous punishment, then the words will be in themselves actionable; and Baron Comyns considers the test to be, whether the crime is indictable or not. 1 Com. tit. Action on the Case for Defamation, F, 20. There is not, perhaps, so much uncertainty in the law upon any subject, as when words shall be in themselves actionable.[94] From the contradiction of cases, and the uncertainty prevailing on this head, the court think they may, without overleaping the bounds of their duty, lay down a rule which will conduce to certainty, and they, therefore, adopt the rule I have mentioned as the criterion.[95] In our opinion, therefore, the first count in the declaration is defective. * * *

The defendant must, therefore, have judgment.

WEBB v. BEAVAN.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1883. 11 Q. B. Div. 609.)

The statement of claim alleged that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff the words following:

"I will lock you" (meaning the plaintiff) "up in Gloucester Gaol next week. I know enough to put you" (meaning the plaintiff) "there" (meaning thereby that the plaintiff had been and was guilty of having committed some criminal offence or offences).

The defendant demurred on the ground that no cause of action was disclosed. Joinder in demurrer.[96]

W. H. Nash, in support of the demurrer, contended that, in order to make the words actionable, the innuendo should have alleged that they imputed an offence for which the plaintiff could have been indicted, and that it was not sufficient to allege that they imputed a criminal offence merely.

POLLOCK, B. I am of the opinion that the demurrer should be overruled. The expression "indictable offence" seems to have crept into the text books, but I think the passages in Comyns' Digest are conclusive to shew that words which impute any criminal offence are actionable per se. The distinction seems a natural one, that words imputing that the plaintiff has rendered himself liable to the mere infliction of a fine are not slanderous, but that it is slanderous to say that he has done something for which he can be made to suffer corporally.

LOPES, J. I am of the same opinion. I think it is enough to allege that the words complained of impute a criminal offence. A great number of offences which were dealt with by indictment twenty years ago are now disposed of summarily, but the effect cannot be to alter the law with respect to actions for slander.[97]

Demurrer overruled.

KREBS v. OLIVER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. 1858. 12 Gray, 239.)

Tort for slander, in accusing the plaintiff of the crime of larceny, by words in substance as follows: "Dr. Krebs was imprisoned many years in a penitentiary in Germany for larceny." Verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant alleged exceptions.[98]

BIGELOW, J. We cannot doubt that the words alleged in the declaration are actionable. It is not necessary that the language used, in order to be slanderous, should be so spoken, as, if true, to expose the person concerning whom it is uttered to a criminal prosecution. That is one of the tests by which to determine whether it constitutes a good cause of action, but it is not the only one. The other is that it imputes to a person a species of misconduct to which the law attaches a criminal punishment, and thereby he is subjected to obloquy and social degradation and disrepute. The imputation of crime is essential as a test whether the words used do amount to a legal slander; but it does not take away their actionable qualities, that they are so spoken as to indicate that the party has suffered the penalty of law or is no longer exposed to danger of punishment. In Van Ankin v. Westfall, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 234, the court say: "The right of the plaintiff to sustain the action does not depend upon the question whether he was liable to be prosecuted and punished for the crime charged against him." And in a more recent case, where the words spoken were, "He is a returned convict," it was held that they were actionable, Lord Denman saying: "They import, to be sure, that the punishment has been suffered, but the obloquy remains." * * * [99]

[97] Compare: Hellwig v. Mitchell [1910] 1 K. B. 609, 613: (Slander for words which imputed that P. had been guilty of a criminal offence punishable by fine only, but involving a liability to summary arrest. Bray, J., remarks: "It was contended that the words are capable of bearing the meaning alleged, namely, that the plaintiff had been guilty of disorderly conduct and of committing breaches of the peace, and it was said that a person who commits a breach of the peace may be arrested either by a private individual or by a constable. That is true, but the offence is not punishable by imprisonment. It was contended, however, that the rule does not require that the criminal offence should be one punishable by imprisonment, and that it is sufficient if the offence be one which renders the offender liable to summary arrest and detention. This is not a question of principle, but of judge-made law, and therefore I must look at the authorities to see how far they support this contention. * * * I cannot find in the books a trace of authority for saying that words imputing that the plaintiff has done an act for which he may be arrested, but which is only punishable by a fine, are actionable without proof of special damage, or that a mere liability to arrest is sufficient to make the crime one for which the offender can be said to suffer corporally. Strictly speaking, it is incorrect to say that a person who commits a breach of the peace, can be made to suffer corporally. The arrest in that case is not a punishment; it is merely a method of preventing the continuing of the offence.") And see 18 Halsbury, Laws of England, 637, notes (m) and (n).

[98] Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point. The statement is slightly abridged, and the argument of counsel is omitted.

Exceptions overruled.[100]

[100] Compare: Wiley v. Campbell (1827), 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 396: (Slander. The words laid in the declaration were: "You have been cropped for felony.) Smith v. Stewart (1847) 5 Pa. 372: (Slander for words charging the plaintiff with having been a convict in another state.) Stewart v. Howe (1855) 17 Ill. 71: (Slander. The words were: "She [the plaintiff] stole $90; she is a smart little thief." It appeared that the plaintiff was under ten years of age: and by an Illinois statute then in force, no child under ten years could be punished for larceny.) Klumph v. Dunn (1871) 66 Pa. 141, 5 Am. Rep. 355: (Slander. The words, spoken in Pennsylvania, charged the plaintiff with adultery in Georgia.)

"Nothing seems to be better settled than that liability to prosecution or punishment is not the criterion. Both ancient and modern cases agree in this. * * * What then is the criterion? Mr. Starkie, after an elaborate review of the cases, comes to the conclusion that, as it is necessary to have some clear and certain rule by which the line of demarcation between actionable and non-actionable words can be drawn, none could be adopted more convenient than that which refers the question to the criminal law, and confirms the action to imputations of offences of moral turpitude, punishable in the temporal courts. 1 Starkie on Slander, 27. But to what law are the courts to refer to ascertain whether the offence charged is of this character? Upon every principle of reason and policy the answer seems to be the law of the country where the words are spoken. That law is the exponent of the moral sense of that community—of the estimation in which they hold offences against the moral law, and words which accuse a man of any crime, condemned and subjected to infamous punishment by that law, expose him in that community to obloquy and contempt. The moral character of the act cannot be affected by the place where it is committed. What matters it to those to whom the words are addressed, or in whose hearing they are spoken, that the crime is charged to have been committed in a state or country where such actions are not subject to punishment? Even if they are to be presumed to know that the act was not a crime punishable by the law of the country where it was alleged to have been committed, would it any the less injure the moral character and standing of the party charged? Is it possible that a man living in Pennsylvania can be accused of having committed the crime inter Christianos non nominandum upon some uninhabited coast or island where there is no government and no law, or among some barbarous people where such practices may be, as they have been, tolerated? Is such a plaintiff to be turned out of court unless he can prove some special damage? This may be an extreme case, but nevertheless it tests the principle. If the criminal code laid its heavy hand upon such calumniators, there might be some good reason for requiring special damage to be shown in all actions of slander, but we know that it does not, and

TAYLOR v. PERKINS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1607. Cro. Jac. 144, 79 Reprint, 126.)

Action for these words: "Thou art a leprous knave." It was demurred upon the declaration, because the defendant conceived an action lay not for these words. But upon the first motion all the Court held, that the action well lay; for they are as well actionable as if he had said, "Thou wast laid of the pox." Wherefore, without argument, it was adjudged for the plaintiff.[1]

COUNT JOANNES v. BURT.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1863. 6 Allen, 236, 83 Am. Dec. 625.)

Tort brought in the name of "George, the Count Joannes," seeking to recover damages for slander. The defendant demurred to the declaration as not setting forth any legal cause of action.

HOAR, J. * * * The declaration is in tort for slander, by orally imputing insanity to the plaintiff. We are aware of no authority for maintaining such an action, without the averment of special damage. The authorities upon which the plaintiff relies are both cases of libel. The King v. Harvey, 2 B. & C. 257; Southwick v. Stevens, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 443. An action for oral slander, in charging the plaintiff with disease, has been confined to the imputation of such loathsome and infectious maladies as would make him an object of disgust and aver-

[1] Compare Simpson v. Press Pub. Co. (1900) 33 Misc. Rep. 228, 67 N. Y. Supp. 401, a case of libel in which Gaynor, J., remarked: "The defendant contends that it is now scientifically established that leprosy is not infectious or contagious, but only hereditary, and that therefore it is no longer within the definition of slander. When an indictable crime ceases to be such it is no longer slander to charge one with it. When the penal statutes against Catholics and witchcraft existed in England it was slander to say of one that he was a Papist, or went to mass, or that he was a witch, or used witchcraft. Walden v. Mitchell (1690) 2 Vent. 265; Smith v. Flynt (1612) Cro. Jac. 300; Rogers v. Gravat (1597) Cro. Eliz. 571; Dacy v. Clinch (1662) 1 Sid. 53. But I do not think it is a parallel case if the progress of science has revealed that leprosy was erroneously classed as infectious or contagious. It remains a term of slander until the law is changed. To say of one that he went to mass or practiced witchcraft might still be slander if the law had not been changed, even though the progress of enlightenment had revealed to most people that to hear mass was not bad, or that there was no such thing as a witch. Besides, the bane in the charge of leprosy which made the courts classify it as slanderous was its tendency to cause one to be shunned and excluded from society, and that still exists."

sion, and banish him from human society. We believe the only examples which adjudged cases furnish are of the plague, leprosy, and venereal disorders. * * *[2]

SMITH'S CASE.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1604. Noy, 151, 74 Reprint, 1112.)

An action upon the case for words, "Thou hast had the French pox." And upon issue not guilty, it is found for the plaintiff. It was now moved in arrest of judgment. Because the words are in the preterperfect tense, and the party it may be now is well, and sound, and no scandal. To which all the Court agreed, and judgment arrested. COOKE, Chief Justice, took this difference of such a slander, de tempore præterito, when it touches the mind, and when it touches the body. If it be a scandal to the mind, and the affections, as perjury, felony, &c. there the mind that remains is slander. But if it be of an accidental infirmity, or disease of the body, otherwise it is. For none now will forbear his company, although he had the plague in times past.[3]

[2] Parts of the opinion are omitted.

See Bac. Abr. "Slander," B, 2: "Man being formed for society, and standing in almost constant need of the advice, comfort, and assistance of his fellow creatures, it is highly reasonable that any words, which import the charge of having a contagious distemper, should be in themselves actionable; because all prudent persons will avoid the company of a person having such distemper. It makes no difference, whether the distemper be owing to the visitation of God, to accident, or to the indiscretion of the party therewith afflicted, for, in every one of the cases, the being avoided, from whence the damage arises, is the consequence." But the only instances cited by Bacon are leprosy and venereal disease.

Compare 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 625 (1911): "The imputation of a present infectious or contagious disease is not defamatory, if the imputation is not calculated to bring the person to whom it is imputed into hatred, contempt, or ridicule, although the imputation tends to exclude him from society. It does not lower the reputation of any one to impute that he is suffering from scarlet fever or influenza; it is otherwise to say that he has and (probably) to say that he has had, a verminous disease."

See, also, McDonald v. Nugent (1904) 122 Iowa, 651, 98 N. W. 506: P. charged D. with saying of him that he (P.) had a venereal disease. The trial court instructed the jury that a charge that the plaintiff was affected with a venereal disease was not slanderous per se. Held, that the charge was erroneous. "From an early date in the development of the common law of slander and libel," said Weaver, J., delivering the opinion, "a charge made by one person that another is infected with a venereal disease has been held to constitute one of the few exceptions to the general rule applicable to oral slander—that, to be actionable per se, the words must impute some crime to the person defamed."

(iii) Words Disparaging in Trade, Profession, or Office

STANLEY v. OSBASTON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1592. Cro. Eliz. 268, 78 Reprint, 534.)

Action for these words: "He was a bankrupt;" and alleged he was a shoemaker, and used buying and selling of leather. And it was adjudged that the action did lie, although the plaintiff was not a merchant, but he got his living by buying and selling.

COLLIS v. MALIN.

(Court of King's Bench, 1633. Cro. Car. 282, 79 Reprint, 847.)

Action for words. Whereas the plaintiff had used per magnum tempus the trade of buying and selling of cattle, and divers times bought upon his credit; that the defendant said of him, "Thou art a bankrupt." The defendant pleaded not guilty; and found against him. And because he did not say, that he used the trade at the time of speaking the words, but per magnum tempus usus fuit, which may be divers years before, and the action lies not, unless at the time of speaking the words he used the trade of buying and selling of cattle, therefore it was adjudged for the defendant.[4]

DAY v. BULLER.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1770. 3 Wils. 59, 95 Reprint, 932.)

Action for slandering the plaintiff in his profession of an attorney, by saying of him these words: "What, does he pretend to be a lawyer? He is no more a lawyer than the devil!" Verdict for the plaintiff.

And now Serjeant Davy moved an arrest of judgment; alledging, that it was not actionable to say of an attorney he was no lawyer, any more than to say of an apothecary that he was no physician; that it was no more necessary for an attorney to be a lawyer, than for an apothecary to be a physician.

actionable; for unless the words impute a continuance of the disorder at the time of speaking them, the gist of the action fails; for such a charge cannot produce the effect which makes it the subject of an action, namely, his being avoided by society. Therefore, unless some special damage be alleged in consequence of that kind of charge, the words are not actionable." Nichols v. Guy (1850) 2 Ind. 82: (The declaration, in two counts, laid the words, first, as "Silas Guy had the clap;" secondly, "Silas Guy has the clap.")

[4] Compare Allen v. Hillman (1831) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 101, where the words imputed misconduct in an office which had ceased to exist.

But PER CURIAM, to say of an attorney he is no lawyer, is a great reflection upon him, and means that he does not understand his business; besides, (they said) an attorney must have a competent knowledge of the law, or he cannot draw a common writ or declaration.

And per YATES Justice, the words are as great a slander upon the plaintiff, and as injurious to him, as any words possibly can be.

So the serjeant took nothing by his motion, and the plaintiff had judgment.[5]

DOYLEY v. ROBERTS.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1837. 3 Bing. N. C. 835, 132 Reprint, 632, 43 R. R. 810.)

Slander. The plaintiff declared that he was an attorney, and that the defendant had falsely and maliciously spoken and published of the plaintiff, and of and concerning him in the way of his business or profession, that "he had defrauded his creditors, and had been horsewhipped off the course at Doncaster." Special damage, that one H. Gyde, had, in consequence, declined to employ the plaintiff.

At the trial before Parke, B., last Worcester Assizes, the words were proved to have been spoken by the defendant, of the plaintiff, who was more engaged on the turf than in law, and had had creditors in sporting transactions; and the jury found, in answer to questions put to them by the learned Baron:

That the words were spoken of and concerning the plaintiff; that they were not spoken of him in his business of an attorney; that they had a tendency to injure him morally and professionally; but, that H. Gyde did not in consequence of them decline to employ the plaintiff.

A verdict was given for the plaintiff, with £50. damages; but the defendant had leave to move to enter a nonsuit instead, if the Court should be of opinion that the words were not actionable unless spoken of the plaintiff in the way of his business as an attorney.[6]

TINDAL, C. J. * * * The case will stand thus: The plaintiff is an attorney, and carries on business as such, but appears to have had creditors in certain sporting transactions; the defendant says of him

[5] Compare Oakley v. Farrington (1799) 1 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 129, 1 Am. Dec. 107: (D. said of P., a justice of the peace, who was usually called "Squire Oakley," to distinguish him from others of the same name: "Squire Oakley is a damned rogue.")

Spears v. McCoy (1913) 155 Ky. 1, 159 S. W. 610, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1033: (D. said of P., a public school teacher: "I do not want such a teacher because he is all the time courting the girls, and did court them last year in the school. He would dismiss the boys last year in school and keep the girls in and give them candy and court them.") generally, that he has defrauded his creditors, and the jury find that these words were not spoken of him in his business of attorney. Now in Comyns' Digest, Action on the Case for Defamation, it is laid down, D. 27, that "words, not actionable in themselves, are not actionable when spoken of one in an office, profession, or trade, unless they touch him in his office;" and these words, though spoken of an attorney, do not touch him in his profession, any more than they would touch a person in any other trade or profession. It is found, indeed, that the words have a tendency to injure him morally and professionally; and that is true; but it applies equally to all other professions, for a person cannot say any thing disparagingly of another, that has not that tendency: upon that subject the authority of Ayre v. Craven, 2 A. & E. 2, is conclusive; and a rule for arresting judgment in this case must therefore be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

FOULGER v. NEWCOMB.

(Court of Exchequer, 1867. L. R. 2 Exch. 327.)

The declaration was in two counts, to both of which the defendant demurred. The first count alleged:

That the plaintiff was a warrener, gamekeeper, horse-slaughterer, and grease manufacturer; that he carried on these businesses in the neighbourhood of Ridler's Wood, and that he was accustomed to be employed in his business of gamekeeper by occupiers of land in that neighbourhood; that many of the persons who so employed him were accustomed to hunt foxes, and it was considered by them a very improper act to kill or destroy foxes in the neighbourhood, and a person who should be guilty of so killing and destroying foxes would be looked upon by them with disfavour and suspicion, and would not be employed by them, and the plaintiff was always employed as such warrener and gamekeeper upon the terms and understanding that he should not nor would kill foxes in the neighbourhood; that the plaintiff had been employed as such warrener and gamekeeper upon the terms aforesaid by one of the said occupiers, and had by reason of such employment to perform his calling in Ridler's Wood, but not to kill foxes there, and it would have been a gross breach of his duties as such warrener and gamekeeper, and in his said employment, had he killed foxes in the wood, of all which premises the defendant at the time, &c. had notice; yet the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff, and of him as such warrener and gamekeeper, and of his conduct whilst he was so employed, the words following: "It is no wonder we did not find any foxes in Ridler's Wood because Foulger trapped three foxes. I can prove it myself;" meaning thereby that the plaintiff, whilst he was so employed as aforesaid, in breach of his duty, killed and destroyed three foxes in the said wood; whereby the plaintiff has been greatly injured in his credit, reputation, and circumstances, and in his said occupations and businesses of a gamekeeper, warrener, horse-slaughterer, and grease manufacturer.

Special damage was alleged from the refusal of occupiers of the land to employ the plaintiff in the way of his occupations.

CHANNELL, B. These are demurrers to a declaration for slander containing two counts. The words complained of charge the plaintiff with trapping foxes. To say simply of a man that he trapped foxes would not, we think, be actionable. There are, however, various circumstances set out in this declaration, which it is asserted show that there is a good cause of action.

The form of the declaration, and the somewhat peculiar circumstances of the case, gave rise to some little confusion on the argument of the case as to the principle on which an action for defamation is maintainable; and the apparent novelty of some of the points raised induced us to reserve our judgment. One essential ingredient of a good cause of action for defamation is damage. The rules as to the damage necessary to constitute a good cause of action, and as to the cases in which such damage is implied by law, are somewhat arbitrary; but the more important principles of them are now clearly defined. The two rules which we have to consider and apply to the facts of the present case are, first, that from spoken words which impute misconduct in an office, trade, profession, or business, the law implies actionable damage; secondly, that where words are spoken which are of a defamatory nature yet such that the law will not imply damage from them, still they are actionable if they are shown actually to cause (as their legal and natural consequence) damage of a character which the law will recognise. In order that the rule as to slander of a man in his business may apply, it is necessary that the words (being capable of having reference to the business) should in fact be spoken of him in respect of his business. This is alleged in the present case, and for the present purpose the allegation must be taken to be true. Next, it must appear that they tend to prejudice him in that business. This, as well as whether the words are capable of having reference to the business, must of course depend upon the nature of the business.

Now, we think that the rule as to words spoken of a man in his office or trade is not necessarily confined to offices and trades, of the nature and duties of which the Court can take judicial notice. The only limitation of which we are aware is, that it does not apply to illegal callings; as, for instance, to the keeping open rooms for pugilistic encounters, as in Hunt v. Bell, 1 Bing. 1; see also Morris v. Langdale, 2 B. & P. 284, a case relating to stock-jobbers, in which the decision proceeded on the ground that stock-jobbers were at that time of two classes, one honest, the other practising what the legislature by the statute then in force called "the infamous practice of stock-jobbing;" and that there was not in the declaration any averment of which business the plaintiff carried on, or whether the contracts he was unable, or said to be unable, to carry out, were legal or illegal contracts. On the same principle, that words having a particular meaning in a particular trade, or a particular locality, may be explained by averment and innuendo in the declaration, we think that the nature and duties of the trade or business may be explained by averment in the declaration, so as to show how the words spoken affect the business.

In the present case we could not, we think, take judicial notice that it could be the duty of a gamekeeper not to trap foxes, or that it would be a disparaging thing to say of him that he trapped foxes. It is, however, alleged, not only that the plaintiff was a gamekeeper, but that it was his duty as such gamekeeper not to kill foxes; that he was employed on the terms of his not doing so; and that the defendant knew all this.

So far, then, it is clear that, this being the true nature of the plaintiff's business and employment, to hear that he trapped foxes would prejudice him with respect to his business, at all events, with all persons who knew the real nature of his employment. It is not, however, quite clear that, where the nature of the business would not be generally understood, it might not be necessary to show that the hearers were aware of the facts necessary to give the words their defamatory sense. Here the declaration does not appear to contain a distinct allegation that the hearers knew that the plaintiff's duty was not to kill foxes. It does set forth something as to what the people of the neighbourhood knew and thought, but it does not state that the slander was uttered to people of the neighbourhood. It does, however, contain an innuendo that the words imputed a breach of duty. We think that this may be taken to be equivalent to an allegation that the words would convey that meaning to the hearers, and, taking it with the rest of the declaration, we think it is sufficient to make the declaration good without special damage.

In Ayre v. Craven, the physician's case, which was the principal authority relied on in support of the demurrers, the decision proceeded on the ground that the declaration did not set forth in what manner the misconduct was connected with the plaintiff's profession.[7] Here the declaration does set forth that it was the duty of the plaintiff, in his employment, not to do that which the words complained of charged him with doing. Therefore the objection which was successful there does not arise here. On the whole, therefore, we think that the present declaration shows a good cause of action, independently of special damage.

[7] In Ayre v. Craven (1834) 2 A. & E. 2, 111 Reprint, 1, 41 R. R. 359, a declaration for slander alleged that the defendant used words imputing adultery to the plaintiff, a physician, and the words were laid to have been spoken "of him in his profession;" no special damage was laid, and after verdict for the plaintiff, judgment was arrested, the court holding that such words, merely laid to be spoken of a physician, were not actionable without special damage, and that if they were so spoken as to convey an imputation upon his conduct in his profession, the declaration ought to have shewn how the speaker connected the imputation with the professional conduct. Lord Denman, C. J., remarked: "Some of the cases have proceeded to a length which can hardly fail to excite surprise; a clergyman having failed to obtain redress for the imputation of adultery, Parret v. Carpenter, Noy, 64; S. C. (1597) Cro. Eliz. 502, and a school mistress having been declared incompetent to maintain an action for a charge of prostitution, Wharton v. Brook (1669) 1 Ventr. 21. Such words were undeniably calculated to injure the success of the plaintiffs in their several professions; but not being applicable to their conduct therein, no action lay."

See the comment on Ayre v. Craven, by C. Allen, J., in Morasse v. Brochu (1890) 151 Mass. 567, 25 N. E. 74, 8 L. R. A. 524, 21 Am. St. Rep. 474.

It is, however, clearly shown on the declaration that the words are capable of bearing a defamatory sense, viz., the imputing a breach of duty to the plaintiff, and it is alleged that the defendant, knowing the circumstances that made the words defamatory, falsely and maliciously used them in the defamatory sense. That being so, even if the law will not imply damage under the circumstances, still the words are actionable, and the defendant is responsible if they cause, as their legal and natural consequence, actual damage. Here actual pecuniary damage in the plaintiff's business or employment generally is alleged, and we think that this allegation at all events makes the declaration good. Of course if the plaintiff should only prove damage in the horse slaughtering or grease manufacturing departments of his trade, that would not help his case; but, as it is alleged in his business as a whole, we must take it that he means to prove damage in the other branch of his business, in which case it may well be the legal and natural consequence of the words.

There is a second count alleging that the words imputed a trespass as well as a breach of duty; this does not appear to differ substantially from the other.

MILLER v. DAVID.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1874. L. R. 9 C. P. 118.)

The declaration, framed in several counts, alleged that the plaintiff was a working stone mason residing at Llanelly and earning his living as such in Llanelly and its neighborhood, and that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of him the words following:

"He was the ringleader of the nine-hour system." "He has ruined the town by bringing about the nine-hour system, and he has stopped several good jobs from being carried out, by being the ringleader of the system at Llanelly"

—whereby the plaintiff was prevented from obtaining employment in his trade at Llanelly.

Demurrer, on the ground that the words were not in themselves defamatory, and that special damage consequent thereon, therefore, gave no action. Joinder in demurrer.

Bray, in support of the demurrer. * * * That the words were spoken of the plaintiff in the way of his trade of a mason, is matter of law to be inferred from the circumstances. (LORD COLERIDGE, C. J. That might and ought to have been averred, but it is not.) Nobody can doubt that the word "ringleader" is one which is capable of being used in a defamatory and injurious sense: and whether or not it is so used is a question for a jury, not for the Court. Jenner v. A'Beckett, Law Rep. 7 Q. B. 11. (DENMAN, J. In that case there was an innuendo giving the words a defamatory sense.) [8]

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD COLERIDGE, C. J. In this case time was taken to consider our judgment, from the wish entertained by at least one member of the Court to hold, if there were authority for the proposition, that a statement false and malicious made by one person in regard to another whereby that other might probably, under some circumstances, and at the hands of some persons, suffer damage, would, if the damage resulted in fact, support an action for defamation. No proposition less wide in its terms than this would support the present declaration; for to call a man "the ringleader of the nine-hours system," and to say of him that he "had ruined a place by bringing about that system," could not under many circumstances and at the hands of many people do the subject of such statements any damage at all. But we are unable to find any authority for a proposition so wide and general in its terms as would alone support this action.

The rule, as laid down by De Grey, C. J., in Onslow v. Horne,[9] that words are actionable if they be of probable ill consequence to a person in a trade or profession or an office, is expressly disapproved of by the Court of Exchequer in Lumby v. Allday.[10] Bayley, B., there says: "Every authority which I have been able to find either shews the want of some general requisite, as, honesty, capacity, fidelity, or the like; or connects the imputation with the plaintiff's office, trade, or business." In that case, the words proved were a very strong imputation on the morality of the plaintiff, who was a clerk to a gas company. But the Court held them not actionable, because the imputation conveyed by them did not imply the want of any of those qualities which a clerk ought to possess, and because the imputation had no reference to his conduct as clerk. That case and the language of Bayley, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, have since been repeatedly approved of, and are really decisive of this case.

The words before us are not actionable in themselves. No expression in them was argued to be so except the word "ringleader": and,

[10] (1831) 1 Cr. & J. 305, 35 R. R. 715: (The declaration stated that P. was clerk of a gas company, and that D. spoke of P. these words: "You are a fellow, a disgrace to the town, unfit to hold your situation for your conduct with whores.")

Accord: Hogg v. Dorrah (1835) 2 Porter (Ala.) 212, Oram v. Franklin (1838) 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 42.

Compare: Stannard v. Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine Co. (1912) 118 Md. 151, 84 Atl. 335, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 515, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 709; Nicholas v. Daily Reporter Co. (1905) 30 Utah, 74, 83 Pac. 573, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 339, 116 Am. St. Rep. 796, 8 Ann. Cas. 841, and the remarks of Lord Herschell in Alexander v. Jenkins, [1892] 1 Q. B. 797, 800, C. A. See also 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 621, 622.

as to that, it is sufficient perhaps to say that Dr. Johnson points out the mistake of supposing that the word is by any means necessarily a word of bad import; for, amongst other authorities, he cites Barrow as calling St. Peter the "ringleader" of the Apostles. Neither are the words connected with the trade or profession of the plaintiff, either by averment or by implication; so that, on neither ground can the declaration be supported. There is no averment here that the consequence which followed was intended by the defendant as the result of his words; and therefore it is not necessary to consider the question which was suggested on the argument, whether words not in themselves actionable or defamatory spoken under circumstances and to persons likely to create damage to the subject of the words, are, when the damage follows, ground of action. The judgment of Lord Wensleydale in Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. C. at p. 600, appears in favour of the affirmative of this question. But it is not necessary for us, for the reasons given, to express any opinion upon it; and upon this demurrer there must be judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

REILLY v. CURTISS.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1912. 83 N. J. Law, 77, 84 Atl. 199.)

Reilly sued Curtiss for slander, and obtained a judgment below. The defendant appealed.

TRENCHARD, J. In this action for slander, the judge of the district court, sitting without a jury, gave the plaintiff a judgment for $50.

The state of demand averred in effect, and the proof showed, that the defendant, in a certain discourse, falsely said that the election board of the Fourth district of the Eighth ward of the city of Elizabeth was drunk while on duty on registration day, and was totally unfit to receive names for registry. It was also averred and admitted that the plaintiff was a member of that board.

The sole contention of the defendant on this appeal is that the judge erred in not limiting the judgment to nominal damages. We are of opinion that there is no merit in the contention.

Every district board of registry and election is composed of four members. P. L. 1911, p. 277, § 4. A sweeping charge of misconduct, leveled against a public board without exception, necessarily points the finger of condemnation at every member thereof, though none are named; and every member of the board may maintain an action therefor. Levert v. Daily States Pub. Co., 123 La. 594, 49 South. 206, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 726, 131 Am. St. Rep. 356; 25 Cyc. 352, 362, 363.

The office of member of a district board of registry and election is one of profit (P. L. 1911, p. 283, § 11); and, under section 9, a member is subject to removal, if shown to be disqualified. Words spoken falsely, imputing drunkenness while on duty, and unfitness for duty, to a member of such board reflect upon his capacity, and tend to work a detriment, from a pecuniary point of view, by rendering his tenure precarious, and are actionable per se. 25 Cyc. 346; Heller v. Duff, 62 N. J. Law, 101, 40 Atl. 691.

When words spoken are actionable per se, plaintiff is not required to introduce evidence of actual damage to entitle him to substantial damages, since, in the absence of any evidence of damage, the law presumes damage. 25 Cyc. 531.

The case of Alexander v. Jenkins [1892] 1 Q. B. 797, cited by the defendant, is not in point. There the office for which the plaintiff was said to be unfit was not an office of profit, and the distinction was there carefully drawn.

The award [11] of substantial damages in the case at bar being justified, the judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

(2) Slander through Special Damage

Now, if there was no special damage, on what grounds are the words actionable? They do not allege any crime; they do not allege a particular kind of infectious disease; they do not allege any other

[11] In Alexander v. Jenkins, [1892] 1 Q. B. 797, the charge was: "Alexander is never sober, and is not a fit man for the [town] council. On the night of the election he was so drunk that he had to be carried home." In holding that the action would not lie, Lord Herschell, in the Court of Appeal, said: "There is no case in which an action of slander has been held to lie for an imputation that a man by reason of his conduct is unfit for an office, except where, by reason of that misconduct, if it existed, he could have been deprived of the office. In Mr. Starkie's work, this liability—this danger of exclusion from office—is said to be that which gives rise to the action; and, at all events, there is there an intelligible ground upon which these actions may be rested, even if it be not altogether a satisfactory one. But we are asked today to make an extension, and to say that an action will lie where a person is charged with being unfit for his office, although he could not—however true the charge—be excluded for that reason from the office. That would be a step in advance, and I do not think it is a step in advance which we are justified in taking. It is on that ground exclusively that I desire to rest my judgment; I will put it shortly thus: That where the imputation is an imputation not of misconduct in an office, but of unfitness for an office, and the office for which the person is said to be unfit is not an office of profit, but one merely of what has been called honour or credit, the action will not lie, unless the conduct charged be such as would enable him to be removed from or deprived of that office."

Compare the remarks of Lopes, L. J., in Booth v. Arnold (1895) 1 Q. B. 571, 576: "In my judgment, words imputing want of integrity, dishonesty, or malversation to any one holding a public office of confidence or trust, whether an office of profit or not, are actionable per se. On the other hand, when the words merely impute unsuitableness for the office, incompetency, or want of ability, without ascribing any misconduct touching the office, then, according to the decision in Alexander v. Jenkins, [1892] 1 Q. B. 797, no action lies, where the office is honorary, without proof of special damage. It is said that this view is contrary to the recent case of Alexander v. Jenkins, [1892] 1 Q. B. 797; but a careful perusal of that case leads me to a different conclusion."

of the peculiar matters for which slander may be actionable without special damage, unless they ought to be construed as impugning the capacity or conduct of the plaintiff in the way of his profession as a solicitor.

Wright, J., in Dauncey v. Holloway.[12]

When our ancestors years ago drew the distinction between libel and slander they exercised that kind of wise discretion which they always exercised over the whole field of common law. It would, to my mind, be very dangerous for us nowadays to relax in any way the rule of law which confines actions for spoken words, in the absence of proof of special damage, to a very limited number of cases.

Vaughan Williams, L. J., in Dauncey v. Holloway.[12]

MATTHEW v. CRASS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1614. Cro. Jac. 323. 79 Reprint, 276.)

Action for these words, "Thou art a whoremaster, for thou hast lain with Brown's wife," by reason of which words he lost his marriage, ad damnum &c.

After verdict for the plaintiff, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that the words were not actionable, but examinable only in the Spiritual Court; and that this was the first precedent where loss of marriage was ever laid for words spoken of a man; and so not like to Anne Davies' Case, 4 Co. 16.

But it was conceived by the Court that there was not any difference betwixt the cases, as to the hinderance of marriage either of a man or of a woman; which being alleged in this case, and a temporal loss and damage to ensue thereby, though the crime is to be punished in the Ecclesiastical Court, yet these words give the Temporal Court jurisdiction, and make them here actionable. So the calling of one "bastard" is triable and determinable in the Spiritual Court; yet when matter subsequent is laid which is triable in a Temporal Court (as to entitle himself to be heir, or where he shews [12] Dauncey v. Holloway, [1901] 2 K. B. 441, was an action for slander. The plaintiff was a solicitor in active practice. The words spoken of him were: "Have you heard about our neighbor (meaning the plaintiff) along here? They tell me he has gone for thousands instead of hundreds this time;" and, upon another occasion: "Have you heard anything about Mr. Dauncey. It seems to be a worse job than the other was. Miss Allen told me Mr. Dauncey has lost thousands." No special damage was shown. It was held by Wright, J., in the King's Bench Division, and by A. L. Smith, M. R., and Vaughan Williams and Romer, L. JJ., in the Court of Appeal, that in the absence of special damage the words were not actionable, as they were not reasonably capable of being construed as conveying an imputation on the plaintiff in his business as a solicitor.

some possibility of being heir), this maketh the calling of him "bastard" to be actionable at the common law: so here, by reason of the allegation of his loss of marriage by these words spoken, the action is maintainable; and judgment was given for the plaintiff.

SELL v. FACY.

(Court of King's Bench, 1615. 2 Bulst. 276, 80 Reprint, 1119.)

In an action upon the case for scandalous words, upon non culp. pleaded, a verdict was found for the plaintiff: it was moved for the defendant in arrest of judgment, that the declaration here is not good, in regard that he lays for the ground of his action, a loss of his marriage, by reason of the speaking of the words; he lays the same in this manner, quod intendebat & conatus fuit, to have such a woman in marriage, and that by reason of the words spoken of him, recusavit, she did refuse to have him; intendebat, this is but onely to shew what his intention was; he lays no communication of marriage, and therefore the declaration is not good, for that he ought to have laid, quod colloquium habitum fuit de matrimonio, but it is not so, and therefore not good.

CROKE, Justice. The words here are scandalous (being that he had a bastard, or such like words), if he had said, quod recusavit, and had laid the motion of marriage to her, this had been good, but not as it is here laid, with a conatus fuit, this is not good.

HAUGHTON, J. If all the women in this town should say, hearing of these words, spoken of him, that they would not have him for a husband, shall this be sufficient to give him cause of action, by no means it shall not, but he ought to lay specially in his declaration, that there was a motion of marriage for him, and this ought to be certainly laid, and not by intendment, as here he hath laid the same to be, and then also to lay a refusal for this, and so a breaking off by reason of the words thus spoken of him, and being thus laid, the declaration would then have been good, and the words actionable, but here this declaration is not good, and so the plaintiff ought not to have his judgment.[13]

[13] The concurring opinions of Coke, C. J., and Dodderidge and Croke, JJ., are omitted. "The court was all clear of opinion against the plaintiffe, that the declaration here was not good; and therefore they advised him, to begin his sute again, and to lay in his declaration, an express colloquium de matrimonio; and a breach, or falling off, by reason of these words; but this declaration, as it is, is too short, and not good, and so judgment ought to be given against the plaintiffe, and accordingly the rule of the Court was, quod querens nil capiat per billam."

Compare Rade v. Press Pub. Co. (1902) 37 Misc. Rep. 254, 75 N. Y. Supp. 298. The charge was that the defendant had falsely published of the plaintiff that he had consumption. As special damage the complaint alleged, inter alia, "that the young lady with whom he kept company avoids him."

BARNES v. BRUDDEL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1668–69. 1 Lev. 261, 83 Reprint, 397.)

Case for saying of her, being a virgin of good fame, "She was with child by Simons;" whereby she was in her parents' displeasure, and in danger of being put out of their house; afterwards judgment was stayed, for that the words were not actionable, there being no loss of marriage, which was the sole reason of Anne Davies's case: and the case in 1 Roll. 35. An action for saying, "She was with child," whereby she lost the society of her neighbours, held not to be law; but that 3 Cro. 639, "She had a child, and if she have not a child she has made it away," may be law, because it imports felony.

But note, in that case loss of marriage is laid also.

MOORE, Gent., v. MEAGHER.

(In the Exchequer Chamber, 1807. 1 Taunt. 39, 9 R. R. 702, 127 Reprint, 745.)

This was a writ of error from a judgment of the Court of King's Bench in an action on the case for defamation. The plaintiff below, in her declaration, alleged * * * that the defendant spoke and published the defamatory words complained of (imputing incontinence to the plaintiff), by means of the speaking of which—the plaintiff had been and was greatly injured in her credit and reputation, and brought into public scandal, &c. and her friends and neighbours, and especially the several persons herein-before in that behalf named, had wholly refused to hold or permit any intercourse or society with her, or to receive and admit her into their respective houses or company, or to find or provide for her meat, drink, or any other benefits and advantages in any manner whatsoever, as they before that time had done, and otherwise would have continued to do; whereby the plaintiff had lost all those valuable benefits and advantages, being to her theretofore of great value, to wit, of the value of £100, and had been and was greatly reduced and prejudiced in her fortunes and pecuniary circumstances, and obliged to incur a much greater expense in her necessary living and supporting herself, to a large amount, to wit, the annual amount of £100, than she theretofore had done, and otherwise would have continued to do, and had been and was greatly impoverished, and all her friends had wholly withdrawn their friendship, &c.

A verdict was found for the plaintiff for £100 damages, and judgment was entered accordingly. The errors assigned were that none of the words alleged in the declaration were in themselves actionable, (which was admitted by the defendant in error,) and that no substantial or real specific damage, or legal or specific injury, was alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the words so spoken and published.

Richardson, for the defendant in error. The declaration has not been sufficiently stated in the plaintiff's argument. It alleges that the persons named gratuitously received the defendant in error into their houses, and provided her with meat and drink to the great reduction of her expenses, and increase of her riches. The defendant below demurred specially, and assigned for cause that this was not a temporal damage; but the court on argument held, that the question whether this were a temporal damage or not, was a matter of fact, and not a matter of law, and that if the provisions furnished to the plaintiff by her friends were of the annual value of £100, as the declaration alleged, the loss of them was a real damage, and directed the defendant to withdraw the demurrer and plead to the action. The jury have found the damages to be £100. And it is now contended, that this cannot be a special damage. The plaintiff below receives real benefit from the assistance of her friends; the defendant for malicious purposes speaks these words, by which she loses that assistance. It is admitted, that if the least pecuniary salary were lost, an action would lie: how can it be otherwise upon the loss of that which is equivalent in value to money? Com. Rep. 7 Ld. Raym. 266, and other authorities show, that, as against a wrongdoer, a possessory title is sufficient. It is urged that these persons were not bound to provide her entertainment: but they did in fact entertain her, and would have continued to entertain her, as the jury have found; whose verdict cannot now be controverted. Words spoken of a tradesman, are actionable, if spoken with reference to his trade: but words spoken of him, though not referring to his trade, are actionable if he thereby loses a customer. 1 Lev. 140. Yet no individual customer is bound to frequent any particular shop; but it is sufficient if he would in fact have come, except for the malicious interference of a stranger. The case of Hartly v. Herring, 8 Term Rep. 130, was an action brought by a preacher, for words imputing incontinence, per quod persons frequenting the chapel discontinued giving him the gains and profits which they had usually given. There the court held there was no objection to the declaration; and Lord Kenyon said it was sufficient if the plaintiff lost his occasional employment. * * *

Curwood, in reply. All the cases cited are cases of legal damage. The value of customers to a tradesman is fully recognized by the law: so is slander of title. If this action lies, no words are not actionable with the aid of an ingenious special pleader. (HEATH, J. Undoubtedly all words are actionable, if a special damage follows.)

MANSFIELD, C. J. This case is not distinguishable from that of Hartly v. Herring. We do not know how to say that this is not a special damage, sustained in consequence of words imputing infamy.

They have deprived this lady of an income derived from the bounty of others, which now, after verdict, we must assume, would have continued, if the defendant had not spoken these words. We cannot say the action will not lie.

Judgment affirmed.[14]

POLLARD v. LYON.

(Supreme Court of the United States, 1875. 91 U. S. 225, 23 L. Ed. 308.)

MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court:

Words both false and slanderous, it is alleged, were spoken by the defendant of the plaintiff: and she sues in an action on the case for slander to recover damages for the injury to her name and fame.

Controversies of this kind, in their legal aspect, require pretty careful examination; and, in view of that consideration, it is deemed proper to give the entire declaration exhibited in the transcript, which is as follows:

"That the defendant, on a day named, speaking of the plaintiff, falsely and maliciously said, spoke and published of the plaintiff the words following: 'I saw her in bed with Captain Denty.' That at another time, to wit, on the same day, the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff the words following: 'I looked over the transom-light and saw Mrs. Pollard,' meaning the plaintiff, 'in bed with Captain Denty'—whereby the plaintiff has been damaged and injured in her name and fame, and she claims damages therefor in the sum of $10,000."

Whether the plaintiff and defendant are married or single persons does not appear; nor is it alleged that they are not husband and wife, nor in what respect the plaintiff has suffered loss beyond what may be inferred from the general averment that she had been damaged and injured in her name and fame.

Service was made, and the defendant appeared and pleaded the general issue; which being joined, the parties went to trial; and the jury, under the instructions of the court, found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the whole amount claimed in the declaration. None of the other proceedings in the case, at the special term, require any notice, except to say that the defendant filed a motion in [14] The statement of facts is abridged.

Accord: Davies v. Solomon (1871) L. R. 7 Q. B. 112: (The declaration, by Davies and Isabella, his wife, charged that the defendant had published a defamatory statement concerning Mrs. Davies, and that thereby the plaintiff Isabella was injured in her character and reputation, and became alienated from and deprived of the cohabitation of her husband, and lost and was deprived of the companionship and ceased to receive the hospitality of divers friends, and especially of her husband, John Davies, "and one M. D. and one G. H. T. and one A. J. M.," who have by reason of the premises withdrawn from the companionship and ceased to be hospitable to or friendly with the plaintiff Isabella. The defendant demurred, insisting that the special damage alleged was too remote.) arrest of judgment, on the ground that the words set forth in the declaration are not actionable, and because the declaration does not state a cause of action which entitles the plaintiff to recover; and the record shows that the court ordered that the motion be heard at general term in the first instance. Both parties appeared at the general term and were fully heard; and the court sustained the motion in arrest of judgment, and decided that the declaration was bad in substance. Judgment was subsequently rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff sued out the present writ of error. * * *

Examined in the light of these suggestions,[15] and the authorities cited in their support, it is clear that the proposition of the plaintiff, that the words alleged are in themselves actionable, cannot be sustained.

Concede all that, and still the plaintiff suggests that she alleges in the second paragraph of her declaration that "she has been damaged and injured in her name and fame," and she contends that the averment is sufficient, in connection with the words charged, to entitle her to recover as in an action of slander for defamatory words with averment of special damage.

Special damage is a term which denotes a claim for the natural and proximate consequences of a wrongful act; and it is undoubtedly true that the plaintiff in such a case may recover for defamatory words spoken of him or her by the defendant, even though the words are not in themselves actionable, if the declaration sets forth such a claim in due form, and the allegation is sustained by sufficient evidence; but the claim must be specifically set forth, in order that the defendant may be duly notified of its nature, and that the court may have the means to determine whether the alleged special damage is the natural and proximate consequence of the defamatory words alleged to have been spoken by the defendant. Haddan v. Lott, 15 C. B. 429.

Whenever proof of special damage is necessary to maintain an action of slander, the claim for the same must be set forth in the declaration, and it must appear that the special damage is the natural and proximate consequence of the words spoken, else the allegation will not entitle the plaintiff to recover. Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East, 3; Knight v. Gibbs, 1 Ad. & Ell. 46; Ayre v. Craven, 2 Ad. & Ell. 8; Roberts v. Roberts, supra [5 B. & S. 389].

When special damage is claimed, the nature of the special loss or injury must be particularly set forth, to support such an action for [15] In the omitted passage, Mr. Justice Clifford, after an elaborate consideration of the questions involved, reached these conclusions: First, that the plaintiff had failed to show that the words alleged imputed any criminal offence for which, under the law of the District of Columbia, she could be indicted and punished; secondly, that although the words spoken imputed misconduct which was derogatory to the character of the plaintiff, and highly injurious to her social standing, still they were not actionable at common law unless special damage was alleged and proven.

words not in themselves actionable; and, if it is not, the defendant may demur. He did demur in the case last cited; and Cockburn, C. J., remarked that such an action is not maintainable, unless it be shown that the loss of some substantial or material advantage has resulted from the speaking of the words. Add. Torts (3d Ed.) 805; Wilby v. Elston, supra [8 M., G. & S. 142].

Where the words are not in themselves actionable, because the offense imputed involves neither moral turpitude nor subjects the offender to an infamous punishment, special damage must be alleged and proved in order to maintain the action. Hoag v. Hatch, 23 Conn. 590; Andres v. Koppenheafer, supra [3 Serg. & R. 255, 8 Am. Dec. 647]; Buys v. Gillespie, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 117, 3 Am. Dec. 404.

In such a case, it is necessary that the declaration should set forth precisely in what way the special damage resulted from the speaking of the words. It is not sufficient to allege generally that the plaintiff has suffered special damages, or that the party has been put to great costs and expenses. Cook v. Cook, 100 Mass. 194.[16]

By special damage in such a case is meant pecuniary loss; but it is well settled that the term may also include the loss of substantial hospitality of friends. Moore v. Meagher, 1 Taunt. 42; Williams v. Hill, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 306.

Illustrative examples are given by the text writers in great numbers, among which are loss of marriage, loss of profitable employment, or of emoluments, profits or customers; and it was very early settled that a charge of incontinence against an unmarried female, whereby she lost her marriage, was actionable by reason of the special damage alleged and proved. Davis v. Gardiner, 4 Co. 16 b, pl. 11; Reston v. Pomfreict, Cro. Eliz. 639.

Doubt upon that subject cannot be entertained; but the special damage must be alleged in the declaration, and proved; and it is not suf-

[16] Accord: Chamberlain v. Boyd (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 407: The words were: "The conduct of the Messrs. Chamberlain was so bad at a club in Melbourne that a round robin was signed urging the committee to expel them. As, however, they were there only for a short time, the committee did not proceed further." The defendant's demurrer was overruled by the trial court. The Court of Appeal gave judgment for the defendant. "It is not alleged," said Bowen, L. J., "that the defendant's words prevented the election of the plaintiff, and that is the fatal blot in the plaintiff's case."

Accord: Ford v. Lamb (1902) 116 Ga. 655, 42 S. E. 998: The defendant had falsely said of the plaintiff (Lamb) to one Bass, with whom the plaintiff was negotiating a trade: "Don't sell Lamb anything. He is no good. He will not pay for anything he gets." The petition set out this statement, and alleged that because of it Bass broke off the trade, "greatly to petitioner's worry and mortification," that the words spoken were false and malicious, and that they had injured the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000. There was no allegation as to the character of the plaintiff's business, or that he had any business, office, or occupation.

Compare the analogous principle in the libel case of Reporters' Association v. Sun Printing & Publishing Company (1906), before the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court, 112 App. Div. 246, 98 N. Y. Supp. 294, and the Court of Appeals, 186 N. Y. 437, 79 N. E. 710.

ficient to allege that the plaintiff "has been damaged and injured in her name and fame," which is all that is alleged in that regard in the case before the court. Hartley v. Herring, 8 T. R. 133; Add. Torts, 805; Hill. Torts (2d Ed.) 622; Beach v. Ranney, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 309.

Tested by these considerations, it is clear that the decision of the court below, that the declaration is bad in substance, is correct.

SPEAKE v. HUGHES.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1904] 1 K. B. 138.)

The action was for slander. It was tried before the assessor of the Court of Passage at Liverpool, who nonsuited the plaintiff.

COLLINS, M. R. This is an appeal from a decision of the learned assessor of the Passage Court at Liverpool. The action is brought in respect of spoken words which, in any point of view, cannot, in my opinion, be actionable in the absence of special damage resulting from them. The words alleged to have been spoken were these: "You have a barman in your employ, named Speake, who has removed from his landlord's house, leaving £2 owing for a month's rent, and I cannot get the money from him." The plaintiff alleges that special damage resulted from these words having been spoken by the defendant to a person, who, at the defendant's request, repeated them to the plaintiff's employers, the damage so alleged being that they thereupon dismissed the plaintiff from their service. It is a question of law whether such damage can, in point of law, be reasonably looked upon as a consequence of the words alleged to have been spoken by the defendant. The defendant might, I think, fairly be taken to have contemplated that, as a result of those words, the plaintiff's employers would exercise some pressure upon him to make him pay the rent owing to the defendant; but that, instead of doing that, the plaintiff's employers should, on the words being repeated to them, thereupon proceed to dismiss him, does not appear to me, in point of law, to be a natural consequence of the words spoken, or one which the defendant can reasonably be taken to have contemplated when he spoke them. That being so, I think the chain of causality between the words spoken and the alleged damage breaks down, and there is therefore no special damage upon which the plaintiff can rely in order to establish a cause of action. On these grounds I think the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L. J. I agree. It cannot, I think, be contended that the words alleged to have been spoken in this case can be actionable per se: and the special damage alleged is not such as, in my opinion, can be regarded as a natural consequence of the words spoken. The defendant might reasonably be supposed to have contemplated, when he spoke the words, that the plaintiff's employers would remonstrate with him on the subject, but not that they would dismiss him from their service.[17]

Appeal dismissed.

(c) LIBEL

In spite of the dictum of Fletcher Moulton, L. J., in Jones v. Hulton, [1909] 2 K. B., at page 458, it cannot be admitted that "the action of libel" (or, indeed, any form of defamation except the anomalous statutory scandalum magnatum[18]) "is a very ancient action for a tort at common law." On the contrary, in spite of the fact that there had been three attempts in the year 1493 to bring cases of slander before the Star Chamber (Selden Soc. "Star Chamber," pp. 28–45), it was fully admitted, by the three judges, in an important case which came before the King's Bench at the end of the fifteenth century (Y. B. 12 Hen. VII (1498) Tr. pl. 2, fo. 22a) that slanderous words were then matter for the ecclesiastical courts; though it is clear, from other evidence, that actions for slander had long been familiar in the local courts of the manor and borough.[19] More than a hundred years later, in the Court of Star Chamber, libel, so far as the King's Courts were concerned, was treated as a purely criminal matter; whether it was directed against a private person or against a magistrate.[20] The procedure is in that case said to be (a) indictment at the common law, or (b) bill or confession in the Star Chamber; and the purely criminal character of the offence is emphasized by the statement, made without any qualification, that the truth of the libel and the character of the party libelled, are immaterial. Between 1498 and 1605, however, the action of Case for slanderous words had been adopted by the King's Courts; and there are several reported decisions of the sixteenth century, the first being, apparently, in the year 1536 (Anon., Dyer, 19a), when it was held by the Court of Common Bench, that two plaintiffs who had been called by the defendant "two false knaves and thieves" could not join in one action against him. In the following year, in Russell's Case (1537) Dyer, 26b, the principle that words imputing crime are actionable per se, was clearly adopted by the same Court on a plea of non dammificatus; and thereafter the action of Case for spoken words becomes common in the reports of Dyer, Godbolt and Jenkins, though [17] The reporter's statement of the case and the argument of counsel for the plaintiff are omitted. It is remarked by the reporter that "it does not appear to have been suggested that any evidence could have been called of any special circumstances known to the defendant tending to shew that he contemplated the dismissal of the plaintiff as a probable consequence of the statement made by him. See Odgers on Libel and Slander (3d Ed.) c. 5, § 5, p. 168, and chapter 12, § 6, p. 371." As to this see infra, Part III.

the other sixteenth century reporters apparently ignore it. In the year 1586, we get the interesting decision, that the allegation of malice in a declaration of slander is only formal, and that its omission is not fatal (Mercer's Case, Jenk. 268).

On the other hand, though the introduction of the printing press would seem to have rendered such a remedy essential, the action of Case for libel does not make its way into the books until the seventeenth century, when it begins to be regarded as an alternative of a bill in the Star Chamber (Lake v. Hatton (1618) Hob. 252); and it is then admitted by the reporter that to the action of Case, as distinguished from a bill or indictment, a plea of truth is a good answer. Another difference early taken was that, while communication to a party libelled may be a sufficient publication for a criminal prosecution, it is insufficient for an action of Case. * * *[21]

The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in Defamation was not abolished until 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 41); but as, long before that time (Palmer's and Thorpe's Case (1583) 4 Rep. 20), the King's Courts had adopted the rule of prohibiting suits in the ecclesiastical courts where the plaintiff had a remedy at law, and as the ecclesiastical courts themselves would only entertain suits in respect of words imputing an ecclesiastical offence (Harris v. Butler (1798) 1 Hagg. 463n), the scope of the jurisdiction must have been small. It seems to have been chiefly resorted to in the case of spoken words imputing unchastity, which, until the passing of the Slander of Women Act, 1891, were not actionable per se in the common law courts, and are now so actionable only when spoken of a woman.

It seems, therefore, that, while the common law action of slander may be as old as 1535, the common law action of libel only dates from the commencement of the seventeenth century.

county of Warwick. And now it was moved by Sergeant Burland, in arrest of judgment, that this was not such a libel for which action would lie; that the itch is a distemper to which every family is liable; to have it is no crime, nor does it bring any disgrace upon a man, for it may be innocently caught or taken by infection; the small-pox, or a putrid fever are much worse distempers; the itch is not so detestable or so contagious as either of them, for it is not communicated by the air, but by contact or putting on a glove, or the clothes of one who has the itch, and although it be an infectious distemper, yet it implies no offence in the person having it, and therefore no action will lie for saying or writing that a man has got the itch. It is not like saying or writing that a man has got the leprosy, or is a leper, for which an action upon the case will lie, because a leper shall be removed from the society of men by the writ of de leproso amovendo (1 Roll. Abr. 44; Cro. Jac. 144; Hob. 219), although it be a natural infirmity.

BATHURST, J. I wish this matter was thoroughly gone into, and more solemnly determined; however, I have no doubt at present, but that the writing and publishing anything which renders a man ridiculous is actionable; and whether the itch be occasioned by a man's fault or misfortune, it is a cruel charge, and renders him both ridiculous and miserable, by being kept out of all company: I repeat it, that I wish there was some more solemn determination, that the writing and publishing anything which tends to make a man ridiculous [22]

[22] Compare: Cook v. Ward (1830) 6 Bing. 409, 130 Reprint, 1338: (To entertain a party of friends, P. told as a joke on himself that he had attended a murder trial and been addressed there as the hangman; D. printed the story as a fact in his newspaper.) McBride v. Ellis (1856) 9 Rich. (S. C.) 313: (D. caused the publication in a local newspaper of an obituary notice of P., a lady. "The residence and name were truly given, though the age was greatly exaggerated.") Funston v. Pearson, in the King's Bench Division (London Times, March 12, 1915): (D., the proprietor of certain dental surgeries, advertised them on a theater curtain. The advertisement had these features: On one side of the curtain was the photograph of a lady absolutely without teeth. On the other side was a photograph of the same lady with a full set of teeth. Under the first picture was written "Before," and under the other "After." The photographs were both those of P., an actress, performing in London. Underneath the pictures appeared the following lines:

"Laugh and the world laughs with you,
But not when your teeth are bad,
So hustle and pay us a visit,
And get the laugh that's glad."

In P.'s action for libel, it was submitted, for the defendant, that the matter complained of was not reasonably susceptible of a defamatory meaning. Said Scrutton, J.: "Not to show a young and good-looking person with all her teeth out? I am entirely against you." Verdict for the plaintiff with £30 damages, and judgment thereon.)

But see Cohen v. New York Times Co. (1912) 153 App. Div. 242, 138 N. Y. Supp. 206, 210: ("The question, then, whether this publication [of an obituary notice of the plaintiff] could be a libel per se, involves the inquiry whether it could have injured the reputation of the plaintiff. Here is a bare item of news in a newspaper. The item states that an event has come or infamous ought to be punished; for saying a man has the itch, without more, perhaps an action would not lie without other malevolent circumstances. I am of the same opinion that judgment must be for the plaintiff.

GOULD, J. What my Brother BATHURST has said is very material; there is a distinction between libels and words; a libel is punishable both criminally and by action, when speaking the words would not be punishable in either way; for speaking the words "rogue" and "rascal" of anyone, an action will not lie; but if these words were written and published of any one, I doubt not an action would lie. If one man should say of another that he has the itch, without more, an action would not lie; but if he should write those words of another, and publish them maliciously, as in the present case, I have no doubt at all but the action well lies. What is the reason why saying a man has the leprosy or the plague is actionable? It is because the having of either cuts a man off from society; so the writing and publishing maliciously that a man has the itch and stinks of brimstone, cuts him off from society. I think the publishing anything of a man that renders him ridiculous is a libel and actionable, and in the present case am of opinion for the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff PER TOT. CUR. without granting any rule to shew cause.

THORLEY v. LORD KERRY.

(In the Exchequer Chamber, 1812. 4 Taunt. 354, 13 R. R. 626.)

This was a writ of error brought to reverse a judgment of the King's Bench, in an action on a libel in a letter written by the defendant. The defamation was found in this passage in the letter, which was set out in the declaration:

"I sincerely pity the man (meaning the plaintiff) that can so far forget what is due, not only to himself but to others, who, under the cloak of religious and spiritual reform, hypocritically, and with the grossest impurity, deals out his malice, uncharitableness, and falsehoods."

to pass which is looked for in the history of every man, is regarded as beyond his control, and therefore does not permit the inference that the man has done any act or suffered any act which he could not have done or which he need not have suffered. Prematurity is the sole peculiarity. How can the publication of such an event, merely as a matter of news, hold up the subject to scorn, to hatred, to contempt, or to ridicule, so that his reputation is impaired? Such publication may be unpleasant; it may annoy or irk the subject thereof; it may subject him to joke or to jest or banter from those who knew him or knew of him, even to the extent of affecting his feelings; but this in itself is not enough. Samuels v. Evening Mail Association [1875] 6 Hun, 5; Lombard v. Lennox [1891] 155 Mass. 70, 28 N. E. 1125, 31 Am. St. Rep. 528; Duvivier v. French [1900] 104 Fed. 278, 43 C. C. A. 529. The question is, as we have seen, whether the publication 'tends to lower him in the opinion of men whose standard of opinion the court can properly recognize or to induce them to entertain an ill opinion of him.' Lord Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 18, p. 619." Per Jenks, P. J.)

Upon not guilty pleaded, the writing of the letter by the defendant was proved, and that he delivered it unsealed to a servant to carry, who opened and read it: a verdict was found for the plaintiff with £20 damages, and judgment was passed for the plaintiff without argument in the Court below. The plaintiff in error assigned the general errors.

Barnewall for the plaintiff in error, argued that there were no words in this case, for which, if spoken, the action would be maintainable, and he denied that there was any solid ground, either in authority or principle, for the distinction supposed to have prevailed in some cases, that certain words are actionable when written, which are not actionable when spoken. He contended that all actionable words were reducible to three classes: (1) Where they impute a punishable crime; (2) where they impute an infectious disorder; (3) where they tend to injure a person in his office, trade, or profession, or tend to his disherison, or produce special pecuniary damages. 1 Ro. Ab. Action sur case pur parols, passim; Co. Dig. Action upon the Case for Defamation, passim. And these words do not come within either of those classes. Neither of those books recognize the distinction between written and unwritten slander. All the older cases treat them on the same footing. * * * The reason assigned, that the printing or writing indicated a greater degree of malice than mere speaking, is a bad one; for it is not the object of an action at law to punish moral turpitude, but to compensate a civil injury: the compensation must be proportionate to the measure of the damage sustained; but it cannot be said that the publication of written slander is in all cases attended with a greater damage than spoken slander, for if a defendant speaks words to a hundred persons assembled, he disseminates the slander and increases the damage an hundred fold, as much as if he only wrote it in a letter to one.[23]

MANSFIELD, C. J. * * * The words, if merely spoken would not be of themselves sufficient to support an action. But the question now is, whether an action will lie for these words so written, notwithstanding that such an action would not lie for them if spoken; and I am very sorry it was not discussed in the Court of King's Bench, that we might have had the opinion of all the twelve Judges on the point, whether there be any distinction as to the right of action, between written and parol scandal; for myself, after having heard it extremely well argued, and especially, in this case by Mr. Barnewall, I cannot, upon principle, make any difference between words written and words spoken, as to the right which arises on them of bringing an action.

For the plaintiff in error it has been truly urged, that in the old books and abridgments no distinction is taken between words written and words spoken. But the distinction has been made between written and spoken slander as far back as Charles the Second's time, and the difference has been recognized by the Courts for at least a century back. It does not appear to me that the rights of parties to a good character are insufficiently defended by the criminal remedies which the law gives, and the law gives a very ample field for retribution by action for words spoken in the cases of special damage, of words spoken of a man in his trade or profession, of a man in office, of a magistrate or officer; for all these an action lies. But for mere general abuse spoken, no action lies. In the arguments both of the judges and counsel, in almost all the cases in which the question has been, whether what is contained in writing is the subject of an action or not, it has been considered, whether the words, if spoken, would maintain an action. It is curious that they have also adverted to the question, whether it tends to produce a breach of the peace: but that is wholly irrelevant, and is no ground for recovering damages. So it has been argued that writing shews more deliberate malignity; but the same answer suffices, that the action is not maintainable upon the ground of the malignity, but for the damage sustained. So, it is argued that written scandal is more generally diffused than words spoken, and is therefore actionable, but an assertion made in a public place, as upon the Royal Exchange, concerning a merchant in London, may be much more extensively diffused than a few printed papers dispersed, or a private letter: it is true that a newspaper may be very generally read, but that is all casual.

These are the arguments which prevail on my mind to repudiate the distinction between written and spoken scandal; but that distinction has been established by some of the greatest names known to the law, Lord Hardwicke, Hale, I believe, Holt, C. J., and others. Lord Hardwicke, C. J., especially has laid it down that an action for libel may be brought on words written, when the words, if spoken, would not sustain it. Co. Dig. tit. Libel, referring to the case in Fitzg. 122, 253, says there is a distinction between written and spoken scandal, by his putting it down there as he does, as being the law, without making any query or doubt upon it, we are led to suppose that he was of the same opinion. I do not now recapitulate the cases, but we cannot, in opposition to them, venture to lay down at this day that no action can be maintained for any words written, for which an action could not be maintained if they were spoken: upon these grounds we think the judgment of the Court of King's Bench must be affirmed.

The purpose of this action is to recover a compensation for some damage supposed to be sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the libel. The tendency of the libel to provoke a breach of the peace, or the degree of malignity which actuates the writer, has nothing to do with the question. If the matter were for the first time to be decided at this day, I should have no hesitation in saying, that no action could be maintained for written scandal which could not be maintained for the words if they had been spoken.[24]

Judgment affirmed.

TRIGGS v. SUN PRINTING & PUBLISHING ASS'N.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1904. 179 N. Y. 144, 71 N. E. 739, 66 L. R. A. 612, 103 Am. St. Rep. 841, 1 Ann. Cas. 326.)

Appeal taken in pursuance of leave granted by the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, which certified that a question of law had arisen which, in its opinion, ought to be reviewed by the Court of Appeals. This question was stated as follows: Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?

The complaint, without alleging special damage, set forth three articles which had been published in the defendant's newspaper, alleged that the plaintiff was and for seven years had been engaged in teaching in the Department of English at the University of Chicago, and in writing on subjects connected with English literature, and prayed judgment in damages for a libel.

The character of these articles is indicated in the following extract:

"We cannot boast of having discovered Triggs, for he was born great, discovered himself early, and has a just appreciation of the value of this discovery. But in our humble way we have helped communicate him to the world, assisted in his effusion and diffusion, and beckoned reverent millions to his shrine. We have joyed to see him perform three heroic labors, viz.:

"1. 'Knock out' old Whittier and Longfellow.

"2. 'Do up' the hymn writers.

"3. Name his baby at the end of a year of solemn consultation.

"But these achievements are only the bright beginning of a long course of halcyon and vociferous proceedings. As yet, Prof. Triggs is but in the [24] "It is not easy to perceive why any distinction should be made between written and oral slander, but the case referred to, Thorley v. Lord Kerry, has established it too firmly to be shaken." Best, C. J., in Archbishop of Tuam v. Robeson (1828) 5 Bing. 17, 21, 30 R. R. 530, 533.

"The civil doctrine of libel was first announced by Lord Chief Baron Hale in King v. Lake in the Exchequer, in 1670, Hardres, 470. There are a few earlier cases in which the defamation was in writing, but on no occasion was this regarded as a title to a remedy if the matter written did not come within recognized exceptions. King was a barrister who claimed to have been damnified in his good name and credit and profession by reason of the fact that Sir Edward Lake had written of a petition to Parliament drawn up by King that it was stuffed with illegal assertions, ineptitudes and imperfections, and clogged with gross ignorances, absurdities, and solecisms. Hale held that 'although such general words spoken once without writing or publishing them would not be actionable, yet here, they being writ and published, which contains more malice than if they had been once spoken, they are actionable.' * * * The matter may be said to have been finally determined by the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in the case of Thorley v. Lord Kerry, in 1812, 4 Taunton, 355." Van Vechten Veeder, "History of the Law of Defamation," 3 Col. Law Rev. 569, 3 Legal Essays, 471–473.

bud. He came near blossoming the other day, and the English drama would have blossomed with him. A firm which is to produce 'Romeo and Juliet' offered him $700 a week to be the 'advance agent' of the show and to 'work up enthusiasm by lecturing.' Prof. Triggs was compelled to decline the offer, but the terms of his refusal show that it is not absolute, and that 'some day,' as the melodramas cry, he will illuminate Shakespeare, dramatic literature, and the public mind. * * * If these plays are to be put upon the stage, they must be rewritten: and Prof. Triggs is the destined rewriter, amender, and reviser. The sapless, old-fashioned rhetoric must be cut down. The fresh and natural contemporary tongue, pure Triggsian, must be substituted. For example, who can read with patience these tinsel lines?

"'Madam, an hour before the worshipped sun
'Peered forth the golden window of the east,
'A troubled mind drave me to walk abroad.'

"This must be translated into Triggsian, somewhat like this:

"'Say, lady, an hour before sunup I was feeling wormy, and took a walk around the block.'

"Here is more Shakesperian rubbish:

"'O, she doth teach the torches to burn bright!
'Her beauty hangs upon the cheek of night,
'As a rich jewel in an Ethiop's ear.'

"How much more forcible in clear concise Triggsian:

"'Say, she's a peach! a bird!'

"Hear 'Pop' Capulet drivel:

"'Go to, go to,
'You are a saucy boy.'

"In the Oscar dialect this is this:

"'Come off, kid! You're too fresh.'

"Compare the dropsical hifalutin:

"'Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day,
'Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain's tops.'

—with the time-saving Triggsian version:

"'I hear the milkman.'"

To the complaint the defendant demurred upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The issue of law thus raised was tried at the Special Term, and the court found (1) that the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) that the statements complained of are libelous per se. It thereupon directed an interlocutory judgment overruling the demurrer, with costs, with leave to the defendant to answer within 20 days upon payment of costs, and, in default, that final judgment should be entered. The defendant appealed from such interlocutory judgment to the Appellate Division, where it was reversed, and the demurrer of the defendant sustained, with costs, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint. Thereupon he appealed from the order of the Appellate Division by permission of that court.[25]

MARTIN, J. (after stating the facts). This action was for libel. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. By interposing a demurrer upon that ground, all the facts alleged in the complaint, or which can by reasonable and fair intendment be implied from the allegations thereof, are deemed admitted. Marie v. Garrison, 83 N. Y. 14; Sanders v. Soutter, 126 N. Y. 193, 195, 27 N. E. 263; Ahrens v. Jones, 169 N. Y. 555, 559, 62 N. E. 666, 88 Am. St. Rep. 620. A written or printed statement or article published of or concerning another which is false, and tends to injure his reputation, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, scorn, obloquy, or shame, is libelous per se. Riggs v. Denniston, 3 Johns. Cas. 198, 2 Am. Dec. 145; Steele v. Southwick, 9 Johns. 214; Van Ness v. Hamilton, 19 Johns. 349, 367; Root v. King, 7 Cow. 613; Cooper v. Jones, 94 N. Y. 51, 64; Moore v. Francis, 121 N. Y. 199, 23 N. E. 1127, 8 L. R. A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810; Morey v. Morning Journal Ass'n, 123 N. Y. 207, 25 N. E. 161, 9 L. R. A. 621, 20 Am. St. Rep. 730; Mattice v. Wilcox, 147 N. Y. 624, 42 N. E. 270; Gates v. N. Y. Recorder Co., 155 N. Y. 228, 49 N. E. 769; Morrison v. Smith, 177 N. Y. 366, 69 N. E. 725.[26]

When the articles published by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff are read in the light of the foregoing principles of law, it becomes obvious, we think, that they were libelous per se. It seems impossible for any fair-minded person to read the articles alleged in the complaint without reaching the conclusion that they were not only intended, but necessarily calculated, to injure the plaintiff's reputation, and to expose him to public contempt, ridicule, or shame. * * *[27]

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed, the judgment of the Special Term affirmed, and the question certified answered in the affirmative.

PECK v. TRIBUNE CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit. 1907. 83 C. C. A. 202, 154 Fed. 330. Supreme Court of United States. 1909. 214 U. S. 185, 29 Sup. Ct. 554, 53 L. Ed. 960, 16 Ann. Cas. 1075.)

In Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Northern District of Illinois.

The case in the court below was an action at law by plaintiff in error, a citizen of Iowa, against defendant in error, a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, to recover damages for the printing in its newspaper by defendant in error of the advertisement given on the following page.

[26] See, also, Holm v. Holm (1911) 146 App. Div. 75, 130 N. Y. Supp. 670, and cases in "Libel and Slander," Cent. Dig. §§ 1-9; Dec. Dig. § 16.

[27] For the remainder of the opinion, see infra, under Fair Comment.

The first two counts of the declaration proceeded as for libel, and alleged that the plaintiff was not Mrs. Schuman, was not a nurse, and was a total abstainer from whisky and all spirituous liquors. There was also a count for publishing the plaintiff's likeness without leave. The defendant pleaded not guilty. At the trial, subject to exceptions, the judge excluded the plaintiff's testimony in support of her allegations just stated, and directed a verdict for the defendant.[28]

In the Circuit Court of Appeals.

GROSSCUP, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff in error indisputably has suffered a wrong, the gist of which is that by the publication of her picture in connection with a patent medicine advertisement, people who recognize the portrait will be led to think that she has loaned her face, and perhaps her name, in a way that a self-respecting person would not have consented to. Were the case under review an application for an injunction to restrain future publications, or were it an action at law against the parties consciously responsible for the make-up of the advertisement, a question wholly different from the one presented by this record would be involved.

The first question presented here is, whether the plaintiff in error made out a case of libel in her declaration and proof—the gravamen of the action, as set forth in the declaration, being, that whereas plaintiff in error was not a nurse, and did not either for herself, or as nurse, use Duffy's Malt Whiskey as a tonic, the advertisement was calculated to convey the impression that she was a nurse, and that both for herself, and as nurse, she had used Duffy's Malt Whiskey as a tonic. This being the whole of the libel charged, and there being no averment of special damages, the question is: Is such a publication libelous per se? We think not. It is not, in our opinion, libelous, per se, to say of a person that she is a nurse, or that she has used as a tonic Duffy's Pure Malt Whiskey, or has recommended its use. Nor do we think that these things said of a person, independently of other averments or circumstances, make out a case to go to a jury for determination. Doubtless there are people, by whom the use of whiskey as a tonic is considered wrong; and there may be people among whom to be a nurse, is considered something less desirable than not to be a nurse. But the world has not yet arrived at a concensus of opinion on these matters, that to say these things of a person is, independently of all other considerations, to libel him. * * *[28]

[28] The statement of the case is abridged, and the opinions of Judge Grosscup in the Circuit Court of Appeals and of Mr. Justice Holmes in the Supreme Court are given only so far as they bear upon the one point.

The third count, framed on the theory of a right of privacy, was held defective, there being no showing of substantial damage.

In the Supreme Court of the United States.

On a Writ of Certiorari to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the Court. * * * The question then is whether the publication was a libel. It was held by the Circuit Court of Appeals not to be, or at most to entitle the plaintiff only to nominal damages, no special damage being alleged. It was pointed out that there was no general concensus of opinion that to drink whisky is wrong, or that to be a nurse is discreditable. It might have been added that very possibly giving a certificate and the use of one's portrait in aid of an advertisement would be regarded with irony, or a stronger feeling, only by a few. But it appears to us that such inquiries are beside the point. It may be that the action for libel is of little use, but, while it is maintained, it should be governed by the general principles of tort. If the advertisement obviously would hurt the plaintiff in the estimation of an important and respectable part of the community, liability is not a question of a majority vote.

We know of no decision in which this matter is discussed upon principle. But obviously an unprivileged falsehood need not entail universal hatred to constitute a cause of action. No falsehood is thought about or even known by all the world. No conduct is hated by all. That it will be known by a large number, and will lead an appreciable fraction of that number to regard the plaintiff with contempt, is enough to do her practical harm. Thus, if a doctor were represented as advertising, the fact that it would affect his standing with others of his profession might make the representation actionable, although advertising is not reputed dishonest, and even seems to be regarded by many with pride. See Martin v. The Picayune (Martin v. Nicholson Pub. Co.) 115 La. 979, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 861, 40 So. 376. It seems to us impossible to say that the obvious tendency of what is imputed to the plaintiff by this advertisement is not seriously to hurt her standing with a considerable and respectable class in the community.[29] Therefore it was the plaintiff's right to prove her case and go to the jury, and the defendant would have got all that it could ask if it had been permitted to persuade them, if it could, to take a contrary view. Culmer v. Canby, 41 C. C. A. 302, 101 Fed. 195, 197; Twombly v. Monroe, 136 Mass. 464, 469. See Gates v. New York Recorder Co., 155 N. Y. 228, 49 N. E. 769.

[29] Compare D'Altomonte v. New York Herald Co. (1913) 154 App. Div. 453, 139 N. Y. Supp. 200: (A sensational article, under a half page illustration and the heading, "Stopping a Congo cannibal Feast," was published in the defendant's newspaper. In a subheading it named the plaintiff, a distinguished traveller and writer, as its author, gave a short biographical sketch of him, and represented him as describing himself in the act of rescuing a young and courageous American "just as he was about to be killed and eaten by savages." The article was a fabrication by some person unknown to plaintiff. It was "not avowedly written in jest with a view to amusing the readers of the newspaper," but was apparently written "in a perfectly serious vein.")

It is unnecessary to consider the question whether the publication of the plaintiff's likeness was a tort per se. It is enough for the present case that the law should at least be prompt to recognize the injuries that may arise from an unauthorized use in connection with other facts, even if more subtlety is needed to state the wrong than is needed here. In this instance we feel no doubt.

Judgment reversed.

(B) Elements of the Prima Facie Cause in Defamation

(a) Nature of the Charge.

(aa) Defamatory

KELLY v. PARTINGTON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1833. 5 Barn. & Adol. 645, 110 Reprint. 929.)

The declaration in its second count stated that the defendant, falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff as a shopwoman and servant, these defamatory words: "She (meaning the plaintiff) secreted 1s. 6d. under the till; stating, these are not times to be robbed." The declaration concluded with an allegation of special damage, that one Stenning, by reason of the speaking of the words, refused to take the plaintiff into his service. The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiff.

Sir James Scarlett obtained a rule nisi for arresting the judgment, on the ground that the words in the second count, taken in their grammatical sense, were not disparaging to the plaintiff; and therefore that no special damage could result from them.

The Solicitor-General shewed cause. The words in the second count (as the Court has already decided) are not actionable without special damage. The question is, whether they are actionable even with special damage. (Denman, C. J. It is contended that the words import that the plaintiff secreted her own money from excessive caution.) The words may not be actionable of themselves, but such words, if a jury find them to have been spoken with a malicious intent to injure the plaintiff, as charged in this declaration, are actionable by reason of special damage. Comyns, C. B., in his Digest, tit. Action on the Case for Defamation, D, 30, after having stated, under the previous heads, many instances of words actionable in themselves, says, that an action may be maintained "for any words by which the party has a special damage." Even, therefore, if the words in question, bore the sense ascribed to them, yet being spoken falsely and maliciously with intent to injure, and followed by special damage, they are actionable. And these were in fact not innocent, but disparaging words, or at all events, equivocal; and it was for the jury to find in what sense they were used. The word "secreted" is used in a bad sense, it usually imputes some bad motive. If the words "stating, these are not times to be robbed," apply to the plaintiff, they are ambiguous, they may have been used by her as a pretence for secreting money belonging to another, and that question was for the jury. (LITTLEDALE, J. Suppose a man had a relation of a penurious disposition, and a third person, knowing that it would injure him in the opinion of that relation, tells the latter a generous act which the first has done, by which he induces the relation not to leave him money, would that be actionable?) If the words were spoken falsely with intent to injure, they would be actionable. At all events, if the words were not laudatory but would bear a bad sense, and a jury might find (as they did here) that they were used in that sense, and an injury is stated to have ensued in consequence, they are actionable.[30]

LITTLEDALE, J. I cannot agree that words laudatory of a party's conduct would be the subject of an action if they were followed by special damage. They must be defamatory or injurious in their nature. In Comyn's Dig., tit. Action on the Case for Defamation (D), 30, it is said generally, that any words are actionable by which the party has a special damage, but all the examples given in illustration of that rule are of words defamatory in themselves, but not actionable, because they do not subject the party to a temporal punishment. In all the instances put, the words are injurious to the reputation of the person of whom they are spoken. The words here are extraordinary; if they had stood merely, "She secreted 1s. 6d. under the till," they might perhaps have been actionable,[31] but coupled with the subsequent words, which appear only to import great caution on the part of the plaintiff, I think we cannot say that they impute anything injurious to the plaintiff.[32]

Rule absolute.

[30] The statement of facts has been abridged, and the opinions of Denman, C. J., and Taunton, J., are omitted.

[31] It appears that the words in the second count, "stating these are not times to be robbed," were in fact part of the expressions supposed to have been used by the defendant himself, but had by mistake been inserted in this count as if spoken by the plaintiff.

[32] Whether words which are not defamatory may be actionable as a tort of some other description, see infra, Part III.

On the extension of Slander and Libel to include nondefamatory statements affecting the plaintiff in his business, see infra.

Compare: Knight v. Blackford (1884) 14 D. C. 177, 51 Am. Rep. 772: (D. falsely stated to S. that P., a clerk in the employ of the government, had spoken disrespectfully of his chief, this report came to the knowledge of the latter, and he discharged P.)

Lombard v. Lennox (1891) 155 Mass. 70, 28 N. E. 1125, 31 Am. St. Rep. 528: (P. was in the employ of S., a manufacturer, as an apprentice. D., also

ARNE v. JOHNSON.

(Court of King's Bench, 1712. 10 Mod. 111, 88 Reprint, 651.)

An action was brought for these words spoken of an upholster:

"You are a soldier, I saw you in your red coat doing duty: your word is not to be taken."

The words were ruled to be actionable; because it is known to be a common practice for tradesmen to protect themselves against their creditors by a counterfeit listing; nor can it be worth a tradesman's while for any other purpose, but to defraud his creditors, by subjecting himself to the power of an officer. A soldier has by Act of Parliament, which the Court must take notice of, the privilege of not being held to special bail; and those words, "your word is not to be taken," are plainly an inference from the former.

BOYDELL v. JONES.

(Court of Exchequer, 1838. 4 Mees. & W. 446, 51 R. R. 676.)

Libel. The declaration stated, that whereas the plaintiff, for a long time before and at the time of the committing of the grievances by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned, resided and still does reside in Devonshire Street, Queen Square, London, and had been and was and still is an attorney of the Court of our Lady the Queen before the Queen herself, and had used, exercised and carried on the profession and business of attorney-at-law, with great credit and reputation, and whereas before the time of the committing of the grievances by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned, certain orders had been made by one of the Judges of the said Court of our Lady the Queen before the Queen herself, for setting aside with costs certain proceedings in a certain action then pending in the said last mentioned court, in which action the now defendant was the attorney of the then plaintiff, and the now plaintiff was the attorney of the then defendant; and before the time of the committing of the grievances by the now defendant as hereinafter mentioned, the said costs had been and were ascertained and taxed by one of the Masters of the said Court; and whereas before and at the time of the committing of the grievances by the now defendant as hereinafter mentioned, sharp practice in the profession of an attorney was and is, and was and is considered to be and to import, disreputable practice, and practice discreditable to the attorney a manufacturer, believing P. to be an apprentice of his, so informed S., who thereupon discharged P. In fact, P. had been an apprentice of D., but was not so at the time.)

adopting or pursuing the same; whereof the now defendant then had notice: yet the now defendant, well knowing the premises, but contriving and falsely and maliciously intending to injure the now plaintiff in his good name, fame, and credit, and also in his said profession and business of an attorney-at-law, and to cause it to be suspected and believed that the now plaintiff had been guilty of such sharp practice as aforesaid in the said action, and that he the now plaintiff had been reprimanded by the said Master for such practice as aforesaid in the said action, &c., heretofore, to wit, on &c., wrongfully, maliciously, and injuriously composed and published a certain ironical, false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel of and concerning the now plaintiff, and of and concerning him in the way of and in respect of his said profession and business of attorney-at-law, and of and concerning the said action, and of and concerning the practice of the now plaintiff as such attorney with respect to the aforesaid orders, then wrongfully supposed by the now defendant to be such sharp practice as aforesaid, and of and concerning the said Master, containing therein the ironical, false, &c., matter following, of and concerning the now plaintiff, &c. &c., (that is to say):

"An honest lawyer (thereby meaning the now plaintiff, and intending to represent that he was not an honest lawyer), a person by the name of Charles Boydell (meaning the now plaintiff), an attorney in Devonshire Street, Queen Square, was severely reprimanded by one of the Masters of the Queen's Bench (meaning the aforesaid Master) the other day, for what is called sharp practice in his profession" (meaning and alluding to the now plaintiff's practice with respect to the aforesaid orders in the said action, and that such practice had been and was sharp practice as aforesaid). By means of which, &c.

The questions argued were (inter alia) whether the declaration showed a good cause of action. Upon this question, after hearing argument for the defendant, judgment was given as follows:

PARKE, B. Suppose he had ceased to practice as an attorney—this is not an action for words but for a libel. This is a libel on him as a man. Suppose he had retired from his profession, and taken his name off the roll, to write of him that whilst he was an attorney, he had been guilty of sharp practice, would be a libel upon him. With respect to the other point, I think it was a sufficient prefatory averment, that the libel was ironical. * * *

The rest of the Court concurred.

Judgment for the plaintiff.[33]

DOOLING v. BUDGET PUB. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1887. 144 Mass. 258, 10 N. E. 809, 59 Am. Rep. 83.)

Tort, for an alleged libel, contained in the following words:

"Probably never in the history of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company was a more unsatisfactory dinner served than that of Monday last. One would suppose, from the elaborate bill of fare, that a sumptuous dinner would be furnished by the caterer, Dooling; but instead, a wretched dinner was served, and in such a way that even hungry barbarians might justly object. The cigars were simply vile, and the wines not much better."

At the trial in the Superior Court, before Pitman, J., the publication of the words by the defendant was admitted.

The plaintiff's counsel, in opening the case to the jury, stated that the plaintiff was a caterer in the city of Boston with a very large business, and acted as caterer upon the occasion referred to. Upon the statement of the plaintiff's counsel that he should offer no evidence of special damage, the judge ruled, without reference to any question of privilege that might be involved in the case, that the words set forth were not actionable per se, and that the plaintiff could not maintain his action without proof of special damage; and, the plaintiff's counsel still stating that he should offer no evidence of special damage, directed a verdict for the defendant; and reported the case for the determination of this court.

If the ruling was correct, judgment was to be entered on the verdict; otherwise, the case to stand for a new trial.

C. ALLEN, J. The question is, whether the language used imports any personal reflection upon the plaintiff in the conduct of his business, or whether it is merely in disparagement of the dinner which he provided. Words relating merely to the quality of articles made, produced, furnished, or sold by a person, though false and malicious, are not actionable without special damage. For example, the condemnation of books, paintings, and other works of art, music, architecture, and generally of the product of one's labor, skill, or genius, may be unsparing, but it is not actionable without the averment and proof of special damage, unless it goes further, and attacks the individual. Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 23 Am. Rep. 322; Swan v. Tappan, 5 Cush. 104; Tobias v. Harland, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 537; Western Counties Manure Co. v. Lawes Chemical Manure Co., L. R. 9 Ex. 218; Young v. Macrae, 3 B. & S. 264; Ingram v. Lawson, 6 Bing. N. C. 212. Disparagement of property may involve an imputation on personal character or conduct, and the question may be nice, in a particular case, whether or not the words extend so far as to be libellous, as in Bignell v. Buzzard, 3 H. & N. 217.

The old case of Fen v. Dixe, W. Jones, 444, is much in point. The plaintiff there was a brewer, and the defendant spoke of his beer in terms of disparagement at least as strong as those used by the present defendant in respect of the plaintiff's dinner, wines, and cigars; but the action failed for want of proof of special damage.

In Evans v. Harlow, 5 Q. B. 624, 631, Lord Denman, C. J., said: "A tradesman offering goods for sale exposes himself to observations of this kind; and it is not by averring them to be 'false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory,' that the plaintiff can found a charge of libel upon them."

In the present case there was no libel on the plaintiff, in the way of his business. Though the language used was somewhat strong, it amounts only to a condemnation of the dinner and its accompaniments. No lack of good faith, no violation of agreement, no promise that the dinner should be of a particular quality, no habit of providing dinners which the plaintiff knew to be bad, is charged, nor even an excess of price beyond what the dinner was worth; but the charge was, in effect, simply that the plaintiff, being a caterer, on a single occasion, provided a very poor dinner, vile cigars, and bad wines. Such a charge is not actionable, without proof of special damage.[34]

Judgment on the verdict.

Y.) 422: (P. was the proprietor of a Coney Island saloon. D.'s newspaper published an article which charged that Coney Island saloons were the resort of improper characters.) Victor Safe & Lock Co. v. Deright (1906) 147 Fed. 211, 77 C. C. A. 437, 8 Ann. Cas. 809, and note: (The plaintiff was a corporation engaged in making the "Victor" safe. The defendant, engaged in selling other safes, wrote to a purchaser of a "Victor" safe that "the Victor plate safe is very cheaply constructed and can be easily burglarized; the Victor so-called 'manganese steel safe' is weaker still, and can be opened inside of a vault or any where else in a few moments time.") Dust Sprayer Mfg. Co. v. Western Fruit Grower (1907) 126 Mo. App. 139, 103 S. W. 566: (D. published a letter in a fruit growers' magazine, stating that he had used P.'s remedy for brown rot on peach trees, and had found it disastrous.) Hopkins Chemical Co. v. Read Drug & Chemical Co. (1914) 124 Md. 210, 92 Atl. 478: (D. stated that a certain tooth paste was "nothing else but grit, was very harmful to the gums, and would take the enamel off your teeth." P. was the sole manufacturer of this tooth paste.)

Compare the remark of Cullen, J., in Kennedy v. Press Publishing Co. (1886) 41 Hun (N. Y.) 423: "A libel on a thing may constitute a libel on a person. Thus, to say of a brewer that he adulterates his beer would be a libel upon him in his trade, not because of the allegation that the beer was bad, but because the language would import deceit and malpractice on the part of the brewer. It is, therefore, at times difficult to determine whether the publication attacks the person or merely the thing, and any apparent conflict in the authorities arises out of this difficulty." And see infra.

MERLE v. SOCIOLOGICAL RESEARCH FILM CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, First Department, 1915. 152 N. Y. Supp. 829.)

The action was against the Sociological Research Film Corporation. To the complaint, setting forth two causes of action, the defendant demurred. The facts appear in the opinion of the court below, by Lehman, J., which was as follows:

The plaintiff in his complaint attempts to set forth two causes of action, both based upon the production of a moving picture film or play entitled, "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," in which the producer depicts a factory and building bearing the plaintiff's firm name of August G. Merle & Co. The defendant has demurred to both causes of action. The first cause of action is for libel, and the only allegations which are, in my opinion, possibly material to a personal action for libel as distinguished from an action for libel of the plaintiff's business, are: That the plaintiff does business under the firm name of August G. Merle & Co., has an excellent name and reputation, and that he employs a large number of hands; that the defendants have produced and exhibited a moving picture film or play called "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," wherein they purported to portray the life of those engaged or associated in the said white slave traffic, wherever possible showing the actual places where the traffickers operate; and that in said play they showed the building wherein the plaintiff's business is located, and prominently displayed thereon and as part thereof the plaintiff's name and his business sign, "August G. Merle & Co., Infants' and Children's Headwear," and also showed a factory purporting to be located in said building and to be plaintiff's said establishment and factory as places where the said cadets and traffickers plied their vicious trade and obtained victims from among the girls employed in said building and establishment, and as places used by said cadets and traffickers as rendezvous between them and the unfortunate victims whom they succeeded in obtaining or procuring in said building and factory; "that the defendants thereby falsely, untruthfully, and maliciously charged, and intended to charge, the plaintiff with being in some way identified or connected with or related to the said white slave traffic or system or with said cadets or traffickers, with allowing or permitting the said trafficking in his establishment or in and around the building wherein his place of business was located, either for gain or otherwise, and that in the said building and in the plaintiff's said establishment there was grave and serious danger for the girls and women and for the young men employed therein that they might be approached or enticed or seduced or molested by these cadets or white slave traffickers and induced, corrupted, enticed, or forced into a life of vice, crime, shame, and prostitution, and that in some way the plaintiff had knowledge or notice of this condition of affairs, and that he participated therein, or at least acquiesced in or countenanced the same."

A suit for libel based upon a moving picture production is a somewhat novel proceeding, but there is no doubt that if the production tends to bring a person into disrepute it may give rise to such an action. The serious question in this case is, however, whether the alleged libel is a libel directed against the plaintiff's business or a libel against himself personally, for concededly the complaint does not contain allegations of special damage sufficient to state a cause of action if the libel is directed only against his business. The distinction between the two classes of cases is pointed out in the case of Marlin Fire Ins. Co. v. Shields, 171 N. Y. 384, 390, 64 N. E. 163, 59 L. R. A. 310. The rule seems to be that words spoken or written primarily against a man's business cannot give rise to an action for damages without special damage unless they also directly charge the plaintiff with a personal wrong.

Whether the picture used in this case does charge the plaintiff personally with any wrongdoing must be determined from the description of the picture itself, and, though upon this motion the description of the picture must be taken as true, the reasonable inferences which can be drawn from that picture cannot be extended by innuendo. It seems to me that the only fair inference to be drawn from that picture is that it contains a charge that the plaintiff's place of business is a place where cadets and white slave traffickers ply their vicious trade and obtain victims and is used as a rendezvous between them and their victims, and so far supports at least the innuendo that the plaintiff permits the traffic to proceed upon his premises. It does not, however, charge the plaintiff with actual knowledge of such traffic. The case therefore seems to me to come directly down to the question: Does a charge that a place of business where many girls are employed is used as a place where the white slave trade may be recruited and as a rendezvous for cadets and their victims reasonably imply such moral wrong against the owner of the place of business as would bring him personally into general disrepute?

It seems to me quite clear that, even if we may assume that the owner of the place of business is ignorant of such conditions, yet public opinion would hold him in abhorrence for being so careless of the conditions surrounding the place where his women employés work that evil men can use the place to entice them into vice. Moreover, it would seem that a charge that a business is being carried on in a vicious manner might well reasonably imply that the owner of the business is morally responsible therefor.

The defendant, however, relies upon the case of Kennedy v. Press Publishing Co., 41 Hun, 422, in which it was held that a charge that the plaintiff's saloon was the resort of improper characters, and that the influence of association had there was bad, was held not to be a libel on the plaintiff personally, and on the case of Bosi v. N. Y. Herald Co., 33 Misc. Rep. 622, 68 N. Y. Supp. 898, affirmed on opinion below, 58 App. Div. 619, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1134, where a similar construction was given to an article charging that the plaintiff's restaurant was a resort favored by anarchists. Both these cases seem to rest upon the principle that a restaurant or saloon keeper is not personally responsible for the character of his guests, and that therefore the articles affect the plaintiff only in his business; but, whatever may be the moral responsibility of a saloon or restaurant owner to keep out vicious guests, the measure of responsibility resting upon a factory owner, who has complete control of his premises and can restrict visitors there in any way he sees fit, is obviously governed by different considerations.

It follows that the demurrers to the first cause of action are overruled. * * *[35]

PER CURIAM. Order affirmed, on the opinion of Lehman, J., with leave to defendant to withdraw demurrer and answer on payment of costs.

MOORE v. FRANCIS et al.

(Court of Appeals of New York, 1890. 121 N. Y. 199, 23 N. E. 1127, 8 L. R. A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810.)

The action was for libel. There was a verdict for the defendants, with judgment thereon. From a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, affirming the judgment below, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appealed.

ANDREWS, J. The alleged libelous publication which is the subject of this action was contained in the "Troy Times" of September 15, [35] The second cause of action is omitted. The demurrer to it was sustained.

1882, in an article written on the occasion of rumors of trouble in the financial condition of the Manufacturers' National Bank of Troy, of which the plaintiff was, at the time of the publication, and for eighteen years prior thereto had been, teller. The rumors referred to had caused a "run" upon the bank, and it is claimed by the defendants, and it is the fair conclusion from the evidence, that the primary motive of the article was to allay public excitement on the subject. That part of the publication charged to be libellous is as follows:

"Several weeks ago it was rumored that Amasa Moore, the teller of the bank, had tendered his resignation. Rumors at once began to circulate. A reporter inquired of Cashier Wellington if it was true that the teller had resigned, and received in reply the answer that Mr. Moore was on his vacation. More than this the cashier would not say. A rumor was circulated that Mr. Moore was suffering from overwork, and that his mental condition was not entirely good. Next came reports that Cashier Wellington was financially involved, and that the bank was in trouble. A Times reporter at once sought an interview with President Weed of the bank, and found him and Directors Morrison, Cowee, Bradwell and others in consultation. They said that the bank was entirely sound, with a clear surplus of $100,000: that there had been a little trouble in its affairs occasioned by the mental derangement of Teller Moore, and that the latter's statements, when he was probably not responsible for what he said, had caused some bad rumors."

The complaint is in the usual form, and charges that the publication was false and malicious, made with intent to injure the plaintiff in his good name and credit in his occupation as bank teller, and to cause it to be believed that by reason of mental derangement he had become incompetent to discharge his duties, and had caused injury to the bank, etc.

The court on the trial was requested by the plaintiff's counsel to rule as a question of law that the publication was libellous. The court refused, but submitted the question to the jury. The jury found a verdict for the defendants, and as the verdict may have proceeded upon the finding that the article was not libellous, the question is presented whether it was per se libellous. If it was, the court erred in leaving the question to the jury. It is the settled law of this state that in a civil action for libel, where the publication is admitted and the words are unambiguous and admit of but one sense, the question of libel or no libel is one of law which the court must decide. Snyder v. Andrews, 6 Barb. 43; Matthews v. Beach, 5 Sandf. 256; Hunt v. Bennett, 19 N. Y. 173; Lewis v. Chapman, 16 N. Y. 369; Kingsbury v. Bradstreet Co., 116 N. Y. 211, 22 N. E. 365. Of course an error in submitting the question to the jury would be harmless if their finding that the publication was not libellous was in accordance with its legal character. The import of the article, so far as it bears upon the plaintiff, is plain and unequivocal. The words amount to a distinct affirmation: first, that the plaintiff was teller of the bank; second, that while acting in this capacity he became mentally deranged; third, that the derangement was caused by overwork; fourth, that while teller, and suffering from this mental alienation, he made injurious statements in respect to the bank's affairs, which occasioned it trouble.

The cases of actionable slander were defined by Chief Justice De Grey, in the leading case of Onslow v. Horne, 3 Wilson, 177, and the classification made in that case has been generally followed in England and this country. According to this classification, slanderous words are those which (1) import a charge of some punishable crime; or (2) impute some offensive disease which would tend to deprive a person of society; or (3) which tend to injure a party in his trade, occupation or business; or (4) which have produced some special damage.

Defamatory words, in common parlance, are such as impute some moral delinquency or some disreputable conduct to the person of whom they are spoken. Actions of slander for the most part are founded upon such imputations; but the action lies in some cases where the words impute no criminal offense, where no attack is made upon the moral character, nor any charge of personal dishonor. The first and larger class of actions are those brought for the vindication of reputation, in its strict sense, against damaging and calumnious aspersions. The other class fall, for the most part, at least within the third specification in the opinion of Chief Justice De Grey, of words which tend to injure one in his trade or occupation. The case of words affecting the credit of a trader, such as imputing bankruptcy or insolvency, is an illustration. The action is maintainable in such a case, although no fraud or dishonesty is charged, and although the words were spoken without actual malice. The law allows this form of action, not only to protect a man's character as such, but to protect him in his occupation also against injurious imputations. It recognizes the right of a man to live, and the necessity of labor, and will not permit one to assail by words the pecuniary credit of another except at the peril, in case they are untrue, of answering in damages. The principle is clearly stated by Bayley, J., in Whittaker v. Bradley, 7 D. & R. 649: "Whatever words have a tendency to hurt, or are calculated to prejudice a man who seeks his livelihood by any trade or business, are actionable." When proved to have been spoken in relation thereto, the action is supported, and unless the defendant shows a lawful excuse, the plaintiff is entitled to recover without allegation or proof of special damage, because both the falsity of the words and resulting damage are presumed. 1 Saund. 243, note; 1 Am. Ldg. Cas. 135.

The authorities tend to support the proposition that spoken words imputing insanity are actionable, per se, when spoken of one in his trade or occupation, but not otherwise, without proof of special damage. Morgan v. Lingen, 8 L. T. Rep. 800; Joannes v. Burt, 6 Allen (Mass.) 236, 83 Am. Dec. 625. The imputation of insanity in a written or printed publication is a fortiori libellous where it would constitute slander, if the words were spoken. Written words are libellous in all cases where, if spoken, they would be actionable, but they may be libellous where they would not support an action for oral slander.

There are many definitions of libel. The one by Hamilton, in his argument in People v. Croswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 337, append., viz.: "A censorious or ridiculing writing, picture or sign, made with malicious intent towards government, magistrates or individuals," has been often referred to with approval; but, unless the word censorious is given a much broader signification than strictly belongs to it, the definition would not seem to comprehend all cases of libellous words. The word "libel," as expounded in the cases, is not limited to written or printed words which defame a man, in the ordinary sense, or which impute blame or moral turpitude, or which criticise or censure him. In the case before referred to, words affecting a man injuriously in his trade or occupation, may be libellous, although they convey no imputation upon his character. Words, says Starkie, are libellous if they affect a person in his profession, trade or business, "by imputing to him any kind of fraud, dishonesty, misconduct, incapacity, unfitness or want of any necessary qualification in the exercise thereof." Starkie on Slander, § 188. * * *

The publication now in question is not simply an assertion that the plaintiff is or has been affected with "mental derangement," disconnected with any special circumstances. The assertion was made to account for the trouble to which the bank had been subjected by reason of injurious statements made by the plaintiff while in its employment. Words to be actionable on the ground that they affect a man in his trade or occupation, must, as is said, touch him in such trade or occupation; that is, they must be shown, directly or by inference, to have been spoken of him in relation thereto and to be such as would tend to prejudice him therein. Sanderson v. Caldwell, 45 N. Y. 405, 6 Am. Rep. 105. The publication did, we think, touch the plaintiff in respect to his occupation as bank teller. It imputed mental derangement while engaged in his business as teller, which affected him in the discharge of his duties. The words conveyed no imputation upon the plaintiff's honesty, fidelity or general capacity. They attributed to him a misfortune, brought upon him by an over-zealous application in his employment. While the statement was calculated to excite sympathy, and even respect for the plaintiff, it nevertheless was calculated also to injure him in his character and employment as a teller. On common understanding, mental derangement has usually a much more serious significance than mere physical disease. There can be no doubt that the imputation of insanity against a man employed in a position of trust and confidence such as that of a bank teller, whether the insanity is temporary or not, although accompanied by the explanation that it was induced by overwork, is calculated to injure and prejudice him in that employment, and especially where the statement is added that in consequence of his conduct in that condition the bank had been involved in trouble. The directors of a bank would naturally hesitate to employ a person as teller, whose mind had once given away under stress of similar duties, and run the risk of a recurrence of the malady. The publication was, we think, defamatory in a legal sense, although it imputed no crime and subjected the plaintiff to no disgrace, reproach or obloquy, for the reason that its tendency was to subject the plaintiff to temporal loss and deprive him of those advantages and opportunities, as a member of the community, which are open to those who have both a sound mind and a sound body. The trial judge, therefore, erred in not ruling the question of libel as one of law. The evidence renders it clear that no actual injury to the plaintiff was intended by the defendants, but it is not a legal excuse that defamatory matter was published accidentally or inadvertently, or with good motives and in an honest belief in its truth.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted. All concur.

Judgment reversed.[36]

SHEPHEARD v. WHITAKER.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1875. L. R. 10 C. P. 502.)

The declaration stated that the defendant falsely and maliciously printed and published in a certain newspaper called The Bookseller, the words following, that is to say:

"The Gazette. First meeting under the new Bankruptcy Act. Shepheard, Shepheard, and Yeomans, Garrick Street and Cheapside, under the firm of British and Foreign Stationery Company, stationers, printers, and booksellers, as regards Charles Yeomans," the defendant meaning thereby that the plaintiff's firm had been bankrupt, or had taken proceedings in liquidation or for composition, and that a first meeting of creditors under their bankruptcy or proceedings in liquidation or for composition was about to be held. Plea, not guilty. Issue thereon.

At the trial, it appeared that, through the negligence of persons in the defendant's employ, instead of announcing, in the extracts from the London Gazette inserted in their newspaper called The Bookseller, published on the 1st of January, 1875, that there had been a dissolution of the partnership of their firm, the advertisement announcing it was inserted amongst the first meetings under the Bankruptcy Act. Upon the discovery of the mistake, the defendant, whose publication appeared monthly, printed and circulated amongst the trade 4000 copies of the Bookseller's Circular explaining the blunder, and inserted an ample apology in his next issue, on the 1st of February, and also in the Stationers' Circular of the 5th.

The learned judge left it to the jury to say whether or not the publication was libellous, telling them that at all events it was not a case for serious damages. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, damages £50.

[36] Part of the opinion is omitted.

Weatherfield moved for a new trial on the grounds of misdirection and that the damages were excessive: he also moved to arrest the judgment, on the ground that the declaration disclosed no cause of action. He submitted that the form in which the announcement appeared was such that no person of ordinary intelligence could have been misled by it; that the learned judge ought not to have left the case to the jury; that, if anybody was likely to be affected by the publication, it was Yeomans only; and that, at all events, the damages were unjustifiably large.[37]

BRETT, J. Whether a publication amounts to a libel or not is a question for the jury; and, as it is impossible for us to say that the words could not by possibility amount to a libel, the judgment cannot be arrested. The damages doubtless are somewhat high, seeing that no malice is suggested. But it is not surprising that a jury should give large damages where bankruptcy is imputed to a trader.

Rule refused.[38]

(bb) Of and Concerning the Plaintiff

JOHNSON v. SIR JOHN AYLMER.

(Court of King's Bench, 1605. Cro. Jac. 126, 79 Reprint, 109.)

Action; for that the defendant "hæc falsa et scandalosa verba sequentia dixit et publicavit":

"Mr. Price, you do my Lord Burleigh wrong, that you do not apprehend Jeremy Johnson" (innuendo the plaintiff) "for a felon, and seize his goods: for he" (innuendo the plaintiff) "hath stolen a sheep from Wright, of Rirsby" (innuendo John Wright).

[37] The statement of the case is abridged, and an opinion by Lord Coleridge, C. J., is omitted. It appeared that the third member of the partnership, Yeomans, had brought a similar action, which was settled by a nominal verdict.

[38] "The law has always been very tender of the reputation of tradesmen, and therefore words spoken of them in the way of their trade will bear an action that will not be actionable in the case of another person." Per Curiam in Harman v. Delany (1731) 2 Stra. 898, 93 Reprint, 925.

"A statement is defamatory if it imputes insolvency to a trader; and this is so whether or not the statement includes any suggestion of discreditable conduct or incapacity. It may be doubted, indeed, whether this is strictly logical. It would seem that, apart from any such suggestion, an allegation of insolvency should be classed merely as an injurious falsehood, not as defamation. For insolvency is not a personal quality or defect like insanity, which in itself excites the disrespect or dislike or ridicule of other persons. It is a misfortune which is consistent with a high regard for the character and competence of the insolvent. Nevertheless it is settled law that a charge of insolvency is to be classed as defamatory, and is subject to all the severities of the law of libel, and not to the more lenient rules which govern cases of injurious falsehood. In view of the very serious mischief which an unfounded allegation of insolvency may work, it is well that responsibility for it should be maintained at this high level." Salmond, Law of Torts (2d Ed.) 405.

The defendant pleaded not guilty; and found against him, and damages assessed to £50. After verdict, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that the words are too generally laid to maintain the action; for they are not alledged to be spoken of the plaintiff in the writ or count; but only in reciting the words he saith, "innuendo the plaintiff;" and the innuendo, without expressly alledging the words to be spoken of the plaintiff, will not maintain the action.

And THE COURT was of that opinion, wherefore, it was adjudged for the defendant.

NORTHROP v. TIBBLES.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1914. 131 C. C. A. 407, 215 Fed. 99.)

BAKER, Circuit Judge. To plaintiff in error's declaration for libel a demurrer for want of facts was sustained, plaintiff declined to amend, and judgment for defendant was entered.

Many objections are urged by defendant; but, if the declaration is deficient in any material respect, the judgment must be affirmed.

So we may assume that the letter written and mailed by defendant to a third person contains matter libelous per se (though this is strenuously controverted), that defendant intended to defame plaintiff, and that plaintiff, when she somehow obtained a copy, applied the libel to herself. But the letter does not name plaintiff as the person intended to be libeled; and the declaration fails to charge (either as a conclusion of fact, if such pleading is permissible, or by an exhibition of extraneous facts that have the necessary effect of showing) that the recipient of the letter, or any other third party, understood the libelous matter to refer to plaintiff.

To allege that defendant wrote and published (by mailing) the letter "of and concerning plaintiff" is not enough. As this court said in Duvivier v. French, 104 Fed. 278, 43 C. C. A. 529: "The gravamen of an action for libel is not injury to the plaintiff's feelings, but damage to his reputation in the eyes of others. * * * It is not enough, to constitute libel, that the plaintiff knew that he was the subject of the article, or that the defendants knew of whom they were writing; it must appear upon the face of the declaration that persons other than these must have reasonably understood that the article was written of and concerning the plaintiff, and that the so-called libelous expressions related to him."

See, also, Robinson v. Drummond, 24 Ala. 174; De Witt v. Wright, 57 Cal. 576; Patterson v. Edwards, 7 Ill. (2 Gilman) 720; McLaughlin v. Fisher, 136 Ill. 111, 24 N. E. 60; McCallum v. Lambie, 145 Mass. 234, 13 N. E. 899; Carlson v. Minnesota Tribune Co., 47 Minn. 337, 50 N. W. 229; Miller v. Maxwell, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 9; Sasser

v. Rouse, 35 N. C. 145; Dunlap v. Sundberg, 55 Wash. 609, 104 Pac. 830, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1050.

As plaintiff refused to plead the necessary additional facts, we must believe that (but for the filing of her present declaration) her reputation with the world at large remained as good as if the letter had been written in a code unknown to any one except defendant and herself.

The judgment is affirmed.

WANDT v. HEARST'S CHICAGO AMERICAN.

(Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1906. 129 Wis. 419, 109 N. W. 70, 6 L. R. A. [N. S.] 919, 116 Am. St. Rep. 959, 9 Ann. Cas. 864.)

The action was brought by Rose Wandt against Hearst's Chicago American. There was a judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

WINSLOW, J. This is an action for libel. The complaint charged in effect that the defendant corporation published and circulated in its newspaper, in the city of Milwaukee, the following article with the picture or photograph of the plaintiff immediately under the first headline:

"Suicide Girl Laid to Rest.

"Evelyn Daly, Suicide.

[Photograph]

"Milwaukee, Aug. 17.—Evelyn Daly, daughter of Mrs. E. L. Daly, of East Lake, Mich., and who, under the name of Cecil Davis, of Cadillac, Mich., succeeded in ending her life after twenty-five attempts, was buried here today. Here are some of the attempts she has made within the last three months.

"June 5—Took morphine; went to Emergency Hospital and asked to be pumped out. * * *" [39] —and that the defendant thereby falsely, willfully, and maliciously charged the plaintiff with having committed suicide, and with having many times attempted to commit suicide, to her great damage. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the defendant appeals.

It is elementary that written or printed publications which falsely tend to bring the plaintiff into public disgrace, contempt, or ridicule are libelous. Bradley v. Cramer, 59 Wis. 309, 18 N. W. 268, 48 Am. Rep. 511. It is also elementary that a libel need not be in printed language, but that a caricature, or picture, or effigy, with or without printed language, which is understood to refer to the plaintiff, and which has the tendency to bring disgrace, contempt, or ridicule upon the plaintiff, is libelous. Newell on Slander and Libel (2d Ed.) p. 43, c. 4, § 1. A printed statement to the effect that a person is a suicide fiend, has attempted suicide 25 times, and would usually go to the hospital and ask to be pumped out, certainly has a tendency to bring that person into public contempt and ridicule. Had the article in question given no name, but simply stated that the person whose picture was given had done these things, there would be little doubt in the mind of any one that it would have been libelous, provided the picture was accurate enough to be recognized as the plaintiff's picture. From the allegations of the complaint it must be assumed that the picture was fairly accurate, as it is called a photograph, doubtless meaning a halftone reproduction of a photograph, which can now be made with a considerable degree of accuracy. The insertion of the picture under the headline of the article is, of course, in effect a statement that it is a picture of the person referred to in the article. Hence the article and picture together constitute a libel as matter of law, unless the fact that the article states that the suicide's name was Evelyn Daly can be held to be an antidote to the otherwise libelous effect.

This contention is strongly made by the appellant, and is in fact the only contention worthy of very serious consideration. It seems quite true, as urged by the appellant, that persons who knew the plaintiff well, and knew her residence and family, would probably not be misled, but would at once conclude that the picture was inserted by mistake; but there may well be a considerable number of persons, who only know the plaintiff by sight or have merely a slight acquaintance, who would recognize the picture at once, and would conclude that the article in fact did refer to the plaintiff, concluding (if they knew the plaintiff's name at all) that such name was merely another alias. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff has been greatly damaged by the publication. There is ample room for the inference that she may well have been damaged in the estimation of the classes of people last mentioned. The fact that she may not have been damaged in the estimation of friends who knew her well would only affect the extent of injury and mitigate the damages. A very similar case where a like result was reached will be found in De Sando v. New York Herald Co., 88 App. Div. 492, 85 N. Y. Supp. 111.[40]

Order affirmed.

[40] In Peck v. Tribune Co. (1909) 214 U. S. 185, 29 Sup. Ct. 554, 53 L. Ed. 960, 16 Ann. Cas. 1075, Mr. Justice Holmes, referring to the pictorial advertisement in that case (see ante, p. 591), remarked: "The publication was of and concerning the plaintiff notwithstanding the presence of another fact, the name of the real signer of the certificate, if that was Mrs. Schuman, that was inconsistent when all the facts were known, with the plaintiff's having signed or adopted it. Many might recognize the plaintiff's face without knowing her name, and those who did know it might be led to infer that she had sanctioned the publication under an alias."

On the collateral question, when the defendant has published the plaintiff's picture without his consent, but also without any defamatory matter, see "The Right to Privacy," 4 Harv. Law Rev. 193 (1890), "The Right of Privacy," 2 Columbia Law Rev. 437, and cases under Key-No. "Torts," § 8.

JONES v. E. HULTON & CO.

(Court of Appeal. [1909] 2 K. B. 444.)

E. HULTON & CO. v. JONES.

(House of Lords. [1910] A. C. 20.)

Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action before Channell, J., with a special jury.

The plaintiff, Mr. Thomas Artemus Jones, a barrister practising on the North Wales Circuit, brought the action to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel concerning him contained in an article of the Sunday Chronicle, a newspaper of which the defendants were the printers, proprietors, and publishers. The article, which was written by the Paris correspondent of the paper, purported to describe a motor festival at Dieppe, and the parts complained of ran thus:

"Upon the terrace marches the world, attracted by the motor races—a world immensely pleased with itself, and minded to draw a wealth of inspiration—and, incidentally, of golden cocktails—from any scheme to speed the passing hour. * * * 'Whist! there is Artemus Jones with a woman who is not his wife, who must be, you know—the other thing,' whispers a fair neighbour of mine excitedly into her bosom friend's ear. Really, is it not surprising how certain of our fellow countrymen behave when they come abroad? Who would suppose, by his goings on, that he was a churchwarden at Peckham? No one, indeed, would assume that Jones in the atmosphere of London would take on so austere a job as the duties of a churchwarden. Here, in the atmosphere of Dieppe, on the French side of the Channel, he is the life and soul of a gay little band that haunts the Casino and turns night into day, besides betraying a most unholy delight in the society of female butterflies."

The plaintiff had in fact received the baptismal name of Thomas only, but in his boyhood he had taken, or had been given, the additional name of Artemus, and from that time he had always used, and had been universally known by, the name of Thomas Artemus Jones or Artemus Jones. He had, up to the year of 1901, contributed signed articles to the defendants' newspaper. The plaintiff was not a churchwarden, nor did he reside in Peckham. Upon complaint being made by the plaintiff of the publication of the defamatory statements in the article, the defendants published the following in the next issue of their paper:

"It seems hardly necessary for us to state that the imaginary Mr. Artemus Jones referred to in our article was not Mr. Thomas Artemus Jones, barrister, but, as he has complained to us, we gladly publish this paragraph in order to remove any possible misunderstanding and to satisfy Mr. Thomas Artemus Jones we had no intention whatsoever of referring to him."

The defendants alleged that the name chosen for the purpose of the article was a fictitious one, and having no reference to the plaintiff, and chosen as unlikely to be the name of a real person, and they denied that any officer or member of their staff who wrote or printed or published before publication the words complained of knew the plaintiff or his name or his profession, or his association with the journal or with the defendants, or that there was any existing person bearing the name of or known as Artemus Jones. They admitted publication, but denied that the words were published of or concerning the plaintiff. On the part of the plaintiff the evidence of the writer of the article and of the editor of the paper that they knew nothing of the plaintiff, and that the article was not intended by them to refer to him, was accepted as true. At the trial witnesses were called for the plaintiff, who said that they had read the article and thought it referred to the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff with £1750 damages, and the learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

FARWELL, L. J.[41] The appellants contend that the verdict and judgment in this case cannot stand, because it was proved that neither the writer of the libellous article nor any person in the defendants' employment under whose notice it came before it was published knew or had even heard of the existence of the plaintiff, and that it therefore necessarily follows that the defendants cannot have intended the libellous words to apply to the plaintiff. The question for us is whether this contention is right.

The old declaration in an action for libel still accurately states the issues that have to be proved, namely, that the defendants falsely and maliciously printed and published of the plaintiff in the A. paper (or as the case may be) the words following (setting them out), meaning thereby that the plaintiff, &c., &c. It is hardly necessary to say that actual malice is not necessary: malice in law is sufficient, and that is shewn by the falsity and defamatory nature of the words, as soon as it has been proved that they were written of the plaintiff. But the plaintiff has to prove (1) the publication, and (2) that it is of the plaintiff; and then he has to prove the libellous nature of the words, that is, the innuendo. It is contended that the libel cannot be published of the plaintiff if it be proved that his existence was unknown to the defendant. A plaintiff need not, of course, be named in the libel: it is sufficient if he be sufficiently described, and for this purpose recourse may be had to the innuendo. As Lord Campbell says in Le Fanu v. Malcomson, 1 H. L. C. at pp. 637, 668, "It comes round to the old rule, that you cannot by an innuendo extend the natural meaning of the words which are spoken or written, but by the innuendo you may point out the particular individual to whom these words apply." The first step is to prove that the words published, whether by name, nickname, or description, are such as reasonably to lead persons acquainted with the plaintiff to believe that he is the person to whom the libel refers; the next step is to prove that that is the true intent and meaning of the words used. This is what I understand to be meant by Lord [41] The statement of facts is abridged, and opinions of Lord Alverstone, C. J., and Moulton, L. J., and part of opinion of Farwell, L. J., are omitted.

Cottenham in Le Fanu v. Malcomson, 1 H. L. C., at p. 664: "If a party can publish a libel so framed as to describe individuals, though not naming them, and not specifically describing them by any express form of words, but still so describing them that it is known who they are, as the jurors have found it to be here, and if those who must be acquainted with the circumstances connected with the party described may also come to the same conclusion, and may have no doubt that the writer of the libel intended to mean those individuals, it would be opening a very wide door to defamation, if parties suffering all the inconvenience of being libelled were not permitted to have that protection which the law affords. If they are so described that they are known to all their neighbours as being the parties alluded to; and if they are able to prove to the satisfaction of a jury that the party writing the libel did intend to allude to them, it would be unfortunate to find the law in a state which would prevent the party being protected against such libels." Lord Campbell, 1 H. L. C., at page 668, says: "Whether a man is called by one name or whether he is called by another, or whether he is described by a pretended description of a class to which he is known to belong, if those who look on, know well who is aimed at, the very same injury is inflicted, the very same thing is in fact done, as would be done if his name and Christian name were ten times repeated." It is however, argued that when Lord Cottenham says "the writer of the libel intended to mean these individuals" he is referring to the intention in the writer's mind as distinct from the intention expressed in the words that he has used, as explained by the relevant surrounding circumstances. In my opinion this is not so, and I may remark that it was not the contention of the appellants' counsel in that case; he opened his case by asserting that it was necessary to shew "that the libel on the record should point to the plaintiffs," &c. The rule is well settled that the true intention of the writer of any document, whether it be contract, will, or libel, is that which is apparent from the natural and ordinary interpretation of the written words; and this, when applied to the description of an individual, means the interpretation that would be reasonably put upon those words by persons who knew the plaintiff and the circumstances. * * *

In the present case the jury have found that the libellous article described an actual scene at Dieppe, and that "Artemus Jones" mentioned therein described an actual person and not a mere type. If the defendants had proved in the present case not only that the writer of the article did not know of the plaintiff's existence, but also that there was an Artemus Jones other than the plaintiff, who was present at Dieppe in the company alleged, then the circumstances with reference to which the words "Artemus Jones" were used would shew that the plaintiff was not the person intended; but the writer of the libel has chosen to state as a fact that Artemus Jones was present in order (as he says) to avoid the banality of using A. B. or a blank: he has, therefore, for his own purposes chosen to assert a fact of a person bearing the very unusual name of Artemus Jones, recklessly, and caring not whether there was such a person or not, or what the consequences might be to him.

An action for defamation differs from other actions, such for instance as trespass, in that it is of the essence of defamation that the plaintiff should be aimed at or intended by the defendant. The man who throws a squib into a crowd not intending to hit any one is liable for the consequences of his act, whatever his intentions may have been, because the two necessary constituents of tort, namely, a wrongful act by the defendant and actual damage to the plaintiff, are both present. But it is not enough for a plaintiff in libel to shew that the defendant has made a libellous statement, and that the plaintiff's friends and acquaintances understood it to be written of him: he must also shew that the defendant printed and published it of him; for if the defendant can prove that it was written truly of another person the plaintiff would fail. To this extent I agree with Fletcher Moulton, L. J., but we differ as to the meaning of the word "intended." In my opinion the defendant intended the natural meaning of his own words in describing the plaintiff as much as in the innuendo: the inquiry is not what did the defendant mean in his own breast, but what did the words mean having regard to the relevant surrounding circumstances. For example, fraud is proved in an action of deceit not only when a false representation is made knowingly, but also when it is made recklessly, careless whether it be true or false, and although there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made—Derry v. Peek, 14 App. Cas. 337, at p. 374—and yet the fraudulent intent is of the essence of the action. So the intention to libel the plaintiff may be proved not only when the defendant knows and intends to injure the individuals, but also when he has made a statement concerning a man by a description by which the plaintiff is recognized by his associates, if the description is made recklessly, careless whether it hold up the plaintiff to contempt and ridicule or not. In such a case it is no answer for the defendant to say that he did not intend the plaintiff, because he had never heard of him: he intended to describe some living person: he can suggest no one else; and the plaintiff proves that he is believed by his acquaintances and friends to be the person aimed at, and has suffered damage thereby. The element of intention, which is as essential to an action of defamation as to an action of deceit, can be proved in the same way in both actions. The issue of fact is whether the plaintiff is the person intended by the libeller; but sufficient evidence to prove it may be given, although the defendant had no intention of injuring the plaintiff and had never heard of his existence. The squib thrower is liable for the injury done by his squib to the plaintiff, whether he aimed at or intended to hit him or not: the libeller is not liable to the plaintiff unless it is proved that the libel was aimed at or intended to hit him; the manner of proof being such as I have already stated. If the libel was true of another person and honestly aimed at and intended for him, and not for the plaintiff, the latter has no cause of action, although all his friends and acquaintances may fit the cap on him. If this were not so, no newspaper could ever venture to publish a true statement of A., lest some other person answering the description should suffer thereby.

It is said that this would enable several plaintiffs to bring several and distinct actions in respect of one libel, and I think that this is so; but I am unable to see the objection. If the libel consisted in defamation of a number of individuals described generally, that is to say, "as the owners of some Irish factories," as in Le Fanu v. Malcomson, 1 H. L. C. 637, every member of the class who could satisfy the jury that he was a person aimed at and defamed could recover; and I can see no reason why two or more persons of the name of Artemus Jones who produced evidence from their acquaintances and others in different parts of the kingdom similar to that produced by the plaintiff in this case, the other circumstances being similar, should not recover. It is quite possible that a defendant might know two persons of the same name and might use words equally applicable to both, and describe each so that he appeared to his own circle of friends and acquaintances to be the person attacked, and might really intend to strike at both: it would certainly be somewhat shocking if such a man could successfully defend an action by one Artemus Jones by producing evidence that shewed conclusively that the other was aimed at, and then defeat an action by that other by producing evidence that shewed conclusively that the first was aimed at: the evidence in both cases would be true, and the libeller would escape because he had successfully libelled two persons in one libel. The case would be nearly as bad if the first plaintiff succeeded and the judgment obtained by him was held sufficient to defeat the action of the other person aimed at. If a man chooses to make statements of fact about persons whom he names, as in this case, I see no reason why he should not be liable to every one whom he injures who can convince a jury that he is reasonably intended by the words used.

I am therefore of opinion that the defendant cannot complain of Channell, J.'s, summing up. I do not think that he intended to rule anything more than that the alleged actual, as distinguished from the expressed, intention of the defendant was under the circumstances of this particular case immaterial. I do not understand him to have withdrawn from the jury the question whether the plaintiff was the person of whom the libel was published, which was, in my opinion, a question for them to decide, but to have ruled that the fact that any one of the plaintiff's names was unknown to the writer and to every one in the defendants' office through whose hands the libel passed was not a conclusive defence requiring him to stop the case; and in this he was, in my opinion, right. The ignorance was of course a material fact, both in considering the question of the true intent of the defendants and also in considering the damages, but I think that these were before the jury. It was said that there was some misdirection on the point of negligence, but I do not think that this is so. Negligence is immaterial on the question of libel or no libel, but may be material on the question of damages. The recklessness to which I have referred, founding myself on Derry v. Peek, 14 App. Cas. 337, is quite different from mere negligence.

Then it is said that the amount of damages is excessive. It is no doubt large, but the evidence shews how serious the consequences have been and may yet be to the plaintiff. It is difficult to estimate the consequences of libel in a newspaper: as Best, C. J., says in De Crespigny v. Wellesley (1829) 5 Bing. 392, at p. 402, it may "circulate the calumny through every region of the globe." Those who read it may never read the subsequent explanation or the report of the trial; and some of those who read both may forget the result, and be left with a general recollection that the plaintiff was a man of whom a discreditable story was reported in a paper. Such newspapers as publish libellous statements do so because they find that it pays: many of their readers prefer to read and believe the worst of everybody, and the newspaper proprietors cannot complain if juries remember this in assessing damages. The amount of damage is peculiarly their province, and I see no ground for interference. In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

[The defendants thereupon appealed to the House of Lords.]

Norman Craig, K. C. (Isaacs, K. C., with him), for the appellants. It is a necessary element in a cause of action for libel that the words complained of should have been written "of and concerning" the plaintiff. There must have been intention in the writer to apply the words to the plaintiff, and there can be no such intention when the writer does not know even of the existence of the person who imagines the language to be directed to himself. The principle of innuendo has never been applied where the question is one of identity. No doubt a man must be taken to know the reasonable construction of the words he employs; but he cannot know every combination of names in the directory. This principle has been recognized and enforced for centuries. * * * The question is, who was meant? (LORD LOREBURN, L. C. Is it not rather who was hit?) No. A man cannot be held responsible for remote and improbable results of his actions. * * * The test is not the impression of bystanders or the influence of friends, but whether the defendant used words which were admittedly defamatory "of and concerning" the plaintiff. * * *

LORD LOREBURN, L. C.[42] My Lords, I think this appeal must be dismissed. A question in regard to the law of libel has been raised which does not seem to me to be entitled to the support of your Lordships. Libel is a tortious act. What does the tort consist in? It consists in using language which others knowing the circumstances would reasonably think to be defamatory of the person complaining of and injured by it? A person charged with libel cannot defend himself by shewing that he intended in his own breast not to defame, or that he intended not to defame the plaintiff, if in fact he did both. He has none the less imputed something disgraceful and has none the less injured the plaintiff. A man in good faith may publish a libel believing it to be true, and it may be found by the jury that he acted in good faith believing it to be true, and reasonably believing it to be true, but that in fact the statement was false. Under those circumstances he has no defence to the action, however excellent his intention. If the intention of the writer be immaterial in considering whether the matter written is defamatory, I do not see why it need be relevant in considering whether it is defamatory of the plaintiff. The writing, according to the old form, must be malicious, and it must be of and concerning the plaintiff. Just as the defendant could not excuse himself from malice by proving that he wrote it in the most benevolent spirit, so he cannot shew that the libel was not of and concerning the plaintiff by proving that he had never heard of the plaintiff. His intention in both respects equally is inferred from what he did. His remedy is to abstain from defamatory words.

It is suggested that there was a misdirection by the learned judge in this case. I see none. He lays down in his summing up the law as follows:

"The real point upon which your verdict must turn is, ought or ought not sensible and reasonable people reading this article to think that it was a mere imaginary person such as I have said—Tom Jones, Mr. Pecksniff as a humbug, Mr. Stiggins, or any of that sort of names that one reads of in literature used as types? If you think any reasonable person would think that, it is not actionable at all. If, on the other hand, you do not think that, but think that people would suppose it to mean some real person—those who did not know the plaintiff of course would not know who the real person was, but those who did know of the existence of the plaintiff would think that it was the plaintiff—then the action is maintainable, subject to such damages as you think under all the circumstances are fair and right to give to the plaintiff." [43]

[43] Compare Newton v. Grubbs (1913) 155 Ky. 479, 159 S. W. 994, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 355: (In an action for slander, the appellee, who was defendant below, was a practicing physician. He had related to several persons an experience in his practice with a young woman, "but not only did he never use appellant's name in that connection, but never so far as this record shows did he ever indicate who the young woman was. The evidence wholly fails to show that he ever used appellant's name in telling this experience, or by innuendo or suggestion intimated that she was the person. But it appears that in some unexplained way the appellant's name became associated with this episode, and several of the witnesses say they had heard this, and therefore thought from outside rumors that appellee when he was telling of it referred to appellant, although her name was never used by appellee. Appellee testified that he had such an experience in his practice,

I see no objection in law to that passage. The damages are certainly heavy, but I think your Lordships ought to remember two things. The first is that the jury were entitled to think, in the absence of proof satisfactory to them (and they were the judges of it), that some ingredient of recklessness, or more than recklessness, entered into the writing and the publication of this article, especially as Mr. Jones, the plaintiff, had been employed on this very newspaper, and his name was well known in the paper and also well known in the district in which the paper circulated. In the second place the jury were entitled to say this kind of article is to be condemned. There is no tribunal more fitted to decide in regard to publications, especially publications in the newspaper press, whether they bear a stamp and character which ought to enlist sympathy and to secure protection. If they think that the license is not fairly used and that the tone and style of the libel is reprehensible and ought to be checked, it is for the jury to say so; and for my part, although I think the damages are certainly high, I am not prepared to advise your Lordships to interfere, especially as the Court of Appeal have not thought it right to interfere, with the verdict.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE. * * * My Lords, with regard to this whole matter I should put my propositions in a threefold form, and, as I am not acquainted by training with a system of jurisprudence in which criminal libel has any share, I desire my observations to be confined to the question of civil responsibility.

In the publication of matter of a libellous character, that is matter which would be libellous if applying to an actual person, the responsibility is as follows: In the first place there is responsibility for the words used being taken to signify that which readers would reasonably understand by them; in the second place there is responsibility also for the names used being taken to signify those whom the readers would reasonably understand by those names; and in the third place the same principle is applicable to persons unnamed but sufficiently indicated by designation or description.

My Lords, I demur to the observation so frequently made in the argument that these principles are novel. Sufficient expression is given to the same principles by Abbott, C. J., in Bourke v. Warren, 2 C. & P. 307 (cited in the proceedings), in which that learned judge says: "The question for your consideration is whether you think the libel designates the plaintiff in such a way as to let those who knew him understand that he was the person meant. It is not neces-but that he never told who the young woman was, and that it was not appellant.")

And see Brown v. Journal Newspaper Co. (1915) 219 Mass. 486, 107 N. E. 358: (D.'s newspaper, without naming any one, charged that there was collusion between those who conducted the tax sales in Boston and the "tax title sharks." P. was collector of taxes in Boston, and as such was the only person authorized by law to conduct the tax sales there.)

sary that all the world should understand the libel; it is sufficient if those who know the plaintiff can make out that he is the person meant." I think it is out of the question to suggest that that means "meant in the mind of the writer" or of the publisher; it must mean "meant by the words employed." The late Lord Chief Justice Coleridge dealt similarly with the point in Gibson v. Evans, 23 Q. B. D. 384, at p. 386, when in the course of the argument he remarked: "It does not signify what the writer meant; the question is whether the alleged libel was so published by the defendant that the world would apply it to the plaintiff."

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs.

(b) PUBLICATION

WEIR v. HOSS.

(Supreme Court of Alabama, 1844. 6 Ala. 881.)

The action was for a libel. Upon the trial, under the general issue, the plaintiffs proved the loss of the original libel; and then proved three copies of it; each of which was proved to be a substantial copy of the original libel; and all of which differed from each other in some respects, and offered the said copies in evidence. To the introduction of each of said copies in evidence, the defendant objected. The objections were overruled, and all of said copies read to the jury; and defendant excepted.

The court charged the jury, that if they were satisfied from the proof, that either of the copies of the libel offered in evidence, was substantially a copy of the original libel, and that it was either composed, or published, by defendant, they ought to find for the plaintiffs, to which the defendant excepted.

ORMOND, J. * * * The court charged, that if the defendant either composed or published the libel, the jury must find for the plaintiff. This is a plain error. To constitute either verbal or written slander, there must be a publication—the contents must be made known to some third person or persons. This is not denied by the counsel for the defendant in error, who insisted that the point was not made in the court below, that publication was conceded, as is evident from the fact that there were so many copies of the libel extant. It is, to be sure, very probable that such was the fact; but still it may be that the libel was not intended for publication, and that the copies were taken without the consent of the defendant. There is nothing in the record which conclusively shows that publication was made; and as the charge was clearly erroneous in point of law, and upon a point necessarily involved in the issue, it is impossible that we should say that the defendant was not prejudiced by it. It may have been the point on which the case turned; and for this error, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.[44]

SHEFFILL v. VAN DEUSEN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1859. 13 Gray, 304, 74 Am. Dec. 632.)

Action of tort for slander. Trial in the court of common pleas, before Briggs, J., who signed this bill of exceptions:

"The words claimed to have been slanderous, were spoken, if at all, at the dwelling house of the defendants and at that part called the bakery, where bread and other articles were sold to customers; and were spoken by Mrs. Van Deusen to Mrs. Sheffill.

"The defendants asked the court to instruct the jury that if the words alleged in the plaintiffs' declaration were spoken to Mrs. Sheffill, and no other person but Mrs. Sheffill and Mrs. Van Deusen were present, there was no such publication of the words as would maintain the action.

"The court declined so to instruct, but did instruct the jury that if the words were publicly uttered in the bakery of the defendants, there was a sufficient publication, though the plaintiff has not shewn that any other person was present, at the time they were spoken, but Mrs. Sheffill and Mrs. Van Deusen. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendants except."

BIGELOW, J.[45] Proof of the publication of the defamatory words alleged in the declaration was essential to the maintenance of this action. Slander consists in uttering words to the injury of a person's reputation. No such injury is done when the words are uttered only to the person concerning whom they are spoken, no one else being present or within hearing. It is damage done to character in the opinion of other men, and not in a party's self estimation, which constitutes the material element in an action for verbal slander. Even in a civil action for libel, evidence that the defendant wrote and sent a sealed letter to the plaintiff, containing defamatory matter, was held insufficient proof of publication;[46] although it would be other-Without reading it or allowing any other person to read it, S. delivered the letter to P.) Fonville v. McNease (1838) Dud. (S. C.) 303, 31 Am. Dec. 556: (D. wrote a letter which defamed P., sealed it, addressed it to P., "or Miss Susan Sloan," and threw it sealed into an inclosure, where it was picked up by a stranger and delivered to P., who opened and read it aloud.) It is quite immaterial in the present case that the words were spoken in a public place. The real question for the jury was, were they so spoken as to have been heard by a third person? The defendants were therefore entitled to the instructions for which they asked.

Exceptions sustained.

WENMAN v. ASH.

(Court of Common Pleas, 1853. 13 C. B. 836, 138 Reprint, 1432, 93 R. R. 761.)

This was an action for a libel contained in a letter addressed by the defendant to the wife of the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded Not guilty, and on this issue submitted that there was no proof of a publication. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff, damages 20s., subject to leave reserved for the defendant to enter a verdict for him.

Byles, Serjt., moved accordingly: There was no publication; the sending the letter to the plaintiff's wife, was like sending it to the plaintiff himself; for husband and wife are for all legal purposes one. (MAULE, J. Is a man's character with his wife worth nothing?) It is difficult to see how he could sustain injury from a communication made to her. * * *[48] a letter press copy. The boy made the copy. There was no evidence that he read the letter.)

Compare Kiene v. Ruff (1855) 1 Iowa, 482: (The libelous letter was transcribed by S. and then mailed to P.) And see 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 658–659 (1911); 25 Cyc. 365, 366; Cent. Dig. "Libel and Slander," §§ 106–108; Dec. Dig., Key-No., "Libel and Slander," §§ 23–25.

[47] See Edwards v. Wooton (1602) 12 Co. Rep. 35, a case in the Star Chamber, between Edwards, a physician, plaintiff, and Wooton, a doctor in physic, defendant. The defendant had sent a libel written in a letter sealed and directed to the party libeled. "The doctor thought that this could not be punished in any manner: but it was resolved, that the said infamous letter, which in law is a libel, shall be punished (although it was solely writ to the plaintiff without any other publication) in the Star Chamber, for that it is an offence to the King, and is a great motive to revenge, and tends to the breaking of the peace and great mischief: and for that reason it was necessary, that it should be punished either by indictment, or in the Star Chamber, to prevent such occasions of mischief."

See, also, Yousling v. Dare (1904) 122 Iowa, 539, 98 N. W. 371, 372, where McClain, J., remarks: "The difference between the criminal law and the law of torts in this respect is manifest. The act of publishing a libel may be criminal for the reason that it provokes the person libeled to wrath, and tends to create a breach of the peace. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 591 (4); 2 McClain, Crim. Law, § 1055. But in a civil action it is essential that some damage to the person libeled must appear, either directly or by legal inference, and no such inference can be drawn from the communication of the libelous matter to the very person concerning whom the language was used. Such a distinction is illustrated by the statutory provision as to the publication of libelous matter respecting one who is deceased. Such a publication may constitute a crime (Code, § 5086), but cannot form the basis of an action for civil damages in behalf of any person. Bradt v. New Nonpareil Co. [1899] 108 Iowa, 449, 79 N. W. 122, 45 L. R. A. 681."

[48] The statement of the case is abridged, and parts of opinions of Jervis, C. J., and Maule, J., and opinion of Creswell, J., are omitted.

JERVIS, C. J. I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. It was sufficiently pointed out in the course of the discussion that it must necessarily be injurious to a man to have a communication like that in question addressed to his wife. Notwithstanding the ingenious argument of my Brother Byles, it is enough to say that I think there was a publication, and that of a matter calculated to operate injuriously to the plaintiff, and sufficient to maintain this action. * * *

MAULE, J. I am of the same opinion. In the eye of the law, no doubt, man and wife are for many purposes one: but that is a strong figurative expression, and cannot be so dealt with as that all the consequences must follow which would result from its being literally true. For many purposes, they are essentially distinct and different persons, and, amongst others, for the purpose of having the honour and the feelings of the husband assailed and injured by acts done or communications made to the wife. * * *[49]

Rule discharged.

[49] Accord: Schenck v. Schenck (1843) 20 N. J. Law, 208; Luick v. Driscoll (1895) 13 Ind. App. 279, 41 N. E. 463, 55 Am. St. Rep. 224.

On the question whether a communication to the plaintiff's agent is a publication on which the plaintiff may rely, see Duke of Brunswick v. Harmer (1849) 14 Q. B. 185, 117 Reprint, 75, 80 R. R. 241: (In 1830 a libel of P. was published in D.'s newspaper. In 1847 P. sent S. to the office of this newspaper, to purchase a copy of the paper containing this libel of 17 years before. S. made the purchase of D., and handed the copy to P. It was contended that there was no publication within six years. Said Coleridge, J., delivering the opinion: "It appeared that the publication relied on was a sale of a copy of the newspaper to a person sent by the plaintiff to procure it, who, on receiving it, carried it to the plaintiff. It was said that this was a sale to the plaintiff himself, and, therefore, not a sufficient publication to sustain a civil action for damages. And, in some sense, it is true that it was a sale and delivery to the plaintiff; but we think it was also a publication to the agent. The question arises as on a plea of Not guilty in an ordinary case. The defendant, who, on the application of a stranger, delivers to him the writing which libels a third person, publishes the libellous matter to him, though he may have been sent for the purpose of procuring the work by that third person. So far as in him lies, he lowers the reputation of the principal in the mind of the agent, which, although that of an agent, is as capable of being affected by the assertions as if he were a stranger. The act is complete by the delivery: and its legal character is not altered, either by the plaintiff's procurement or by the subsequent handing over of the writing to him. Of course that this publication was by the procurement of the plaintiff is not material to the question we are now considering." See, also, Massee v. Williams (1913) 207 Fed. 222, 229, 124 C. C. A. 492; Brown v. Elm City Lumber Co. (1914) 167 N. C. 9, 82 S. E. 961.

But see the doctrine of decoy publication as a defense, given infra, "Other Excuses for Defamatory Charges Confessedly Untrue."

Compare: Wennhak v. Morgan (1888), 20 Q. B. D. 635, where Huddleston, B., delivering the opinion remarks: "This is as far as we know the first time it has ever been alleged in cases of this kind that the handing over of a libel by the libeller to his wife is a publication. I think that the question can be decided on the common law principle that husband and wife are one."

Sesler v. Montgomery (1889) 78 Cal. 486, 21 Pac. 185, 3 L. R. A. 653, 12 Am. St. Rep. 76. In this case, McFarland, J., commenting on Schenck v. Schenck (1843) 20 N. J. Law, 208, remarked: "Whether or not that decision was a correct exposition of the law, it is clear, at least, that another principle was involved. As the court say in that case: "Such a communication made

RUMNEY v. WORTHLEY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1904. 186 Mass. 144, 71 N. E. 316, 1 Ann. Cas. 189.)

Tort to recover damages for a libel contained in two letters sent by the defendant to the plaintiff through the mail. The letters were sent to the plaintiff at his residence, and were opened and read aloud by his wife and daughter. The superior court found that there was no publication of the letters, and directed a verdict for the defendant.

KNOWLTON, C. J.[50] * * * The question in this case is whether there was any evidence which would have warranted the jury in finding that the defendant believed, or had good reason to believe, that the letters might be opened and read by the plaintiff's daughter in his absence, and that she was authorized to open her father's letters. The question of difficulty is whether there was evidence that the defendant was aware that she was accustomed or authorized to read such letters addressed to her father. On this point the testimony is very unsatisfactory. She testified that she had known the defendant for five years; that he came to the store a great many times for the purpose of selling goods; that during the year immediately prior to the receipt of these letters he had seen her at least two or three times receive mail addressed to her father and open it in his presence; that she knew this had happened several times, and that she could not state the exact number of times; that he had seen her, after opening the letters, walk with them to her father, and show him the con-directly to the wife is an attempt to poison the fountain of domestic peace, conjugal affection, and filial obligation, at their very sources.' There the exception which was allowed to the general rule was in support of the confidential relation of marriage; while in the case at bar the exception sought to be established would be destructive of that relation. Our conclusion is, that a communication from a husband to a wife, not in the presence of any other person, does not constitute a publication within the meaning of the law of slander. It follows from this conclusion that the judgment in the case at bar was erroneous."

But see Trumbull v. Gibbons (1816) 3 City Hall Recorder (N. Y.) 97, commented on in Wemhak v. Morgan, ante: (D. printed in New York fifty copies of a pamphlet which libeled P. Five copies were sent by D. to his wife in New Jersey; four of them bore the names of acquaintances of his wife, but there were no instructions as to what she should do with them. She delivered two copies in New Jersey to the persons whose names they bore, and handed the rest to P. in New Jersey. Held, that there was a publication by D. in New Jersey.)

[50] Part of the opinion, on the effect of sending a libelous letter through the mail to the person libeled, with no reason to suppose that it will be opened and read by any one else, is omitted. On this point, Knowlton, C. J., referred to Clutterbuck v. Chaffers (1816) 1 Stark. 471; Delacroix v. Thevenot (1817) 2 Stark. 63; Robinson v. Jones (1879) 4 L. R. (Ir.) 391; Fonville v. McNease (1838) Dud. (S. C.) 303, 31 Am. Dec. 556; Fry v. McCord (1895) 95 Tenn. 678, 33 S. W. 568; Sylvis v. Miller (1896) 96 Tenn. 95, 33 S. W. 921; Spaits v. Poundstone (1882) 87 Ind. 522, 44 Am. Rep. 773; McIntosh v. Matherly (1848) 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 119; Warnock v. Mitchell (1890 C. C.) 43 Fed. 428.

tents of them. Without repeating her testimony on this point, which was of considerable length, we are of opinion that the jury fairly might have inferred from it that, as clerk in the store which was owned by her mother and conducted by her father, she was accustomed to open letters addressed to him, at least if they looked like letters pertaining to the business, and that the defendant knew it. Printed on the face of the libelous letters were these words: "In five days return to D. E. Worthley, 27 Canada Street, Lowell, Mass." This was the defendant's business address. We infer that the letters appeared externally like the ordinary business letters of the defendant. We do not attach much importance to the fact that they were addressed to No. 12 Burt street, instead of No. 14 Burt street, for the dwelling house and store were connected. If the case stood upon the testimony in direct examination, we should think the jury well might infer knowledge on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff's daughter was accustomed to open letters which looked like these, and, with considerable hesitation, we are inclined to think that the cross-examination, taken in connection with the direct examination, would warrant the jury in coming to the same conclusion. If he sent the letters, having good reason to believe that they were likely to be opened by an authorized person other than the plaintiff, his sending them by mail was a publication.[51]

Verdict set aside.

[51] Accord: Delacroix v. Thevenot (1817) 2 Stark. 63: (D. wrote, sealed, and mailed to P. a letter which defamed P. The letter was opened in regular course of business by P.'s clerk, the letter not being marked "private." D. knew of the clerk's employment in this way.) Pullman v. Hill & Co. [1891] 1 Q. B. 524: (A letter which libeled the plaintiffs was addressed in the name of the firm of which they were members. The letter was opened by a clerk in the ordinary course of business and was read by two other clerks. If it had been directed to the plaintiffs in their individual capacity, the letter would probably not have been opened by a clerk.) Allen v. Wortham (1890) 89 Ky. 485, 13 S. W. 73, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 697: (D. writes and mails to P. a letter which defames him, but P. is unable to read, and has S. read the letter to him.) And see the remark of Taft, J., in Wilcox v. Moon (1892) 64 Vt. 450, 24 Atl. 244, 15 L. R. A. 760, 33 Am. St. Rep. 936: "Sending [a letter] to a party who cannot read, if this is known to the sender, and the party to whom it is sent from necessity procures another to read it, is likewise evidence of a publication."

Compare: Huth v. Huth (1915), in the Court of Appeal, London Times for March 27, 1915: (In 1898 Miss Edith Greaves was married to Captain Huth. In 1913 Mrs. Huth, because of differences with her husband, left his house and went to live at Torquay. The alleged libel was in a document sent by Mr. Huth, the defendant, to Mrs. Huth by post in an unsealed envelope bearing a ½d. stamp, and addressed "Miss Edith Greaves, care of Mrs. Stark, Torquay." This letter was received at Mrs. Huth's house in Torquay by her butler. Yielding to his curiosity over the unusual address, the butler took the document out of its unsealed envelope and read it. It was contended that there had been a publication by the defendant in two respects: The butler had in fact read the document; the defendant had sent it in the unsealed envelope by the post. In his opinion in the Court of Appeal, the Lord Chief Justice said that he found no evidence of publication to the butler. It could not be contended that it would amount to a publication by the sender if a third person in breach of his duty opened and read a letter when the Action for words. And declares, that the defendant spake these words in Welsh (reciting them particularly), signifying hæc Anglicana verba: "Thou hast murdered thy wife." After verdict, and judgment for the plaintiff, error was brought and assigned in hoc, that it is not averred that the words were spoken in the company of Welshmen, or of such who understood the Welsh tongue; but it is alledged that they were spoken in presentia et auditu quamplurimorum subditorum dominæ reginæ. And the action was brought in the county of Monmouth, which was once parcel of Wales, but was now an English county.

And all the Justices and Barons held that for this cause it was erroneous: for it shall not be intended that any there understood the said tongue, unless it had been shewn; and then it was not any slander, no more than if one spake slanderous words in French or Italian, an action lies not, unless it be averred that some there present understood those languages; as it was held in the case of Johns v. Daux. But because the damages were found to £50 and if the plaintiff should begin de novo he might not have peradventure so great damages, they moved him to accept of £10 and to make an end without further proceedings: and so it was done, and no judgment entered.[52] sender had no reason to expect anything of the kind. As to the suggestion of publication in the post office, the Lord Chief Justice remarked that he would be sorry to lay down anything that would allow libels to be published with greater safety. In the case of a postcard, it was presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that some person, other than the addressee would read it. But the contention that the same presumption would be made in the case of a letter of which the envelope was not fastened down amounted to saying that a document without a cover was the same thing as a document with a cover. In his opinion there was no such presumption. It was true that the post office authorities had a right to examine documents enclosed in envelopes with ½d. stamps, but that in itself was not enough; to show publication it would be necessary to call some one from the post office who had in fact opened the letter.

On the plaintiff's demurrer to a defective plea, it was contended that the declaration was defective, for "it is supposed that the defendant spoke slanderous words in Latin, in præsentia diversorum who understood linguam Romanam, which well may be; for lingua Romana at this day intends the Italian tongue, and not the Latin

SADGROVE v. HOLE.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1901] 2 K. B. 1.)

The defendant, as managing director of a limited company, employed an architect on behalf of the company to prepare plans and drawings relative to a proposed addition to the company's premises. The architect was directed to employ a quantity surveyor to make out a bill of quantities, and he instructed the plaintiff to do this. The bill of quantities was accordingly prepared by the plaintiff, and copies were sent to seven builders whose names had been supplied by the defendant, and to whom invitations to tender for the work had been given. The contents of the bill of quantities came to the knowledge of the defendant, who appears to have thought that the amount of work indicated therein was much in excess of that which the company desired should be done. The defendant thereupon wrote and sent by post to one of the seven builders a post-card which was as follows: "The quantities sent you this morning by architect are entirely wrong. I have plans &c., here, and you can give me prices on these. Yours, &c., S. Hole." The defendant also wrote and sent by post to another of the seven builders a post-card which was as follows: "There are great errors in the quantities posted to you this morning. If you will call here you can see plans and give me price on these. Yours obediently, S. Hole."

The plaintiff brought an action for libel on these two post-cards, alleging that they were defamatory of him in his calling of quantity surveyor. The defence was a denial that the words were published concerning the plaintiff, that they bore the interpretation placed upon them in the statement of claim, and that they amounted to defamatory matter. The defendant also pleaded that the publication to the builders was privileged and made bona fide and without malice. To this the plaintiff replied alleging express malice, and that the contents of the post-cards were necessarily communicated and published to the postmen and clerks through whose hands they respectively passed before reaching the persons to whom they were addressed. No one through whose hands either of the post-cards had passed was called as a witness at the trial.

The learned judge held that the words were capable of a defamatory meaning; that the occasion was not privileged; and he left the case to the jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £5, and judgment was entered for that amount. The defendant appealed.

A. L. SMITH, M. R.[53] * * * The plaintiff to succeed in the action must prove a publication of and concerning him of libellous matter, and if he does not satisfy the onus of proof which is on him in this respect there is no cause of action. It is certainly my opinion that if a man writes a libel on the back of a post-card and then sends it through the post there is evidence of publication, as in the case of a telegram. The cases cited shew that the two stand on the same footing. What, then, did the plaintiff prove? He proved the sending of a post-card; but, on the evidence, it is clear that he did not prove any publication of a libel on him until the post-card got into the hands of the builder, because then for the first time could any knowledge arise as to the person to whom the post-card referred. I quite agree that if the name of the plaintiff had appeared on the post-card there would have been plenty of evidence of publication to persons other than the builder.[54] That, however, was not the case, and the plaintiff did not prove publication to any one before the post-card got into the builder's hands, and as a communication to him it was privileged unless there was evidence of express malice. * * *[55]

I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant.

OWEN v. OGILVIE PUB. CO.

(Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, Second Department, 1898. 32 App. Div. 465, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1033.)

The action was against the publishing company. From a judgment for the plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appealed.

HATCH, J.[56] * * * The libel consisted in the dictation of a letter by the defendant's general manager to a young lady employed by the corporation as a stenographer and typewriter in the private office of the general manager. The letter was written in reference to the business of the corporation, and had relation to a small sum of money [53] Part of the opinion, as well as the concurring opinion of Collins, L. J., are omitted.

[54] That sending a defamatory statement by postal card or by telegram is a publication, see Williamson v. Freer (1874) L. R. 9 C. P. 393; Robinson v. Jones (1879) 4 L. R. Ir. 391; Logan v. Hodges (1907) 146 N. C. 38, 59 S. E. 349, 14 Ann. Cas. 103; 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 661; 25 Cyc. 369.

[55] The Master of the Rolls was, however, of opinion that there was no evidence of express malice: "It is said that the mere writing of a post-card and sending it by mail, instead of sending a closed letter, was evidence of malice, and I agree that if the name of the plaintiff had appeared on the card that would have been so; but in this case there was nothing to connect the libel with the plaintiff, and no evidence of malice."

missing from the cash drawer, and the letter expressed a suspicion that the money had been taken by the plaintiff during her employment by the defendant, on the day before.

The law is elementary that there can be no libel without a publication of the libelous matter. We may assume that this letter was libelous. Was there a publication of it by the corporation, within the meaning of the law? Ordinarily, when a letter is written and delivered to a third person, with the intent and expectation that it shall be read by such person, and it is actually read, the publication is complete. Youmans v. Smith, 153 N. Y. 214, 47 N. E. 265. Has such rule application to the facts of this case? The letter was dictated to the stenographer, and was by her copied out, was signed by the manager, was then inclosed in an envelope, and sent by mail to the address of the plaintiff. It may be that the dictation to the stenographer and her reading of the letter would constitute a publication of the same by the person dictating it, if the relation existing between the manager and the copyist was that of master and servant, and the letter be held not to be privileged. Such, however, was not the relation of these persons. They were both employed by a common master, and were engaged in the performance of duties which their respective employments required. Under such circumstances we do not think that the stenographer is to be regarded as a third person in the sense that either the dictation or the subsequent reading can be regarded as a publication by the corporation. It was a part of the manager's duty to write letters for the corporation, and it was the duty of the stenographer to take such letter in shorthand, copy it out, and read it for the purpose of correction. The manager could not write and publish a libel alone, and we think he could not charge the corporation with the consequences of this act, where the corporation, in the ordinary conduct of its business, required the action of the manager and the stenographer in the usual course of conducting its correspondence. The act of both was joint, for the corporation cannot be said to have completed the act which it required by the single act of the manager, as the act of both servants was necessary to make the thing complete. The writing and the copying were but parts of one act; i. e. the production of the letter. Under such conditions we think the dictation, copying, and mailing are to be treated as only one act of the corporation; and, as the two servants were required to participate in it, there was no publication of the letter, in the sense in which that term is understood, by delivery to and reading by a third person. There was in fact but one act by the corporation, and those engaged in the performance of it are not to be regarded as third parties, but as common servants engaged in the act. We do not deny but that there can be publication of a libel by a corporation by reading the libelous matter to a servant of such corporation, or delivering it to be read. Where the duties devolved upon such servant are distinct and independent of the process by which the libel was produced, he might well stand in the attitude of a third person through whom a libel can be published. But such rule may not be applied where the acts of the servants are so intimately related to each other as is disclosed in the present record, and the production is the joint act of both. As there was no other proof of publication aside from the reading by the stenographer, it is insufficient to uphold a finding that the libel was published.[57] * * *

It follows that the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event. * * * All concur.

[57] In Pullman v. Hill & Co., [1891] 1 Q. B. 524, a defamatory letter was dictated by the defendants' managing director to a short-hand clerk, who transcribed it by a typewriter machine. Lord Esher, M. R., delivering an opinion in the Court of Appeal, reasoned thus: "The first question is whether, assuming the letter to contain defamatory matter, there has been a publication of it. What is the meaning of 'publication'? The making known the defamatory matter after it has been written to some person other than the person of whom it is written. If the statement is sent straight to the person of whom it is written, there is no publication of it: for you cannot publish a libel of a man to himself. If there was no publication, the question whether the occasion was privileged does not arise. If a letter is not communicated to any one but the person to whom it is written, there is no publication of it. And, if the writer of a letter locks it up in his own desk, and a thief comes and breaks open the desk and takes away the letter and makes its contents known, I should say that would not be a publication. If the writer of a letter shews it to his own clerk in order that the clerk may copy it for him, is that a publication of the letter? Certainly it is shewing it to a third person: the writer cannot say to the person to whom the letter is addressed, 'I have shewn it to you and to no one else.' I cannot, therefore, feel any doubt that, if the writer of a letter shews it to any person other than the person to whom it is written, he publishes it. If he wishes not to publish it, he must, so far as he possibly can, keep it to himself, or he must send it himself straight to the person to whom it is written. There was, therefore, in this case a publication to the typewriter."

In accord with Pullman v. Hill & Co. are Gambrill v. Schooley (1901) 93 Md. 48, 48 Atl. 730, 52 L. R. A. 87, 86 Am. St. Rep. 414; Ferdon v. Dickens (1909) 161 Ala. 181, 49 South. 888; Puterbaugh v. Gold Medal Mfg. Co. (1904) 7 Ont. L. Rep. 582, 1 Ann. Cas. 100: (S., the manager of D., a mercantile corporation, having written out the draft of a letter to P., which charged him with theft, handed the draft to a clerk of D., to be copied on a typewriter. The clerk did so, stamped the company's name at the foot of the copy, and brought it to S., who wrote his name beneath that of the company, and gave it back to the clerk, to be closed and mailed to P., which was done.)

In Puterbaugh v. Gold Medal Mfg. Co., ante, the Ontario Court of Appeal, reversing the divisional Court (5 Ont. L. Rep. 680), held that there had been a publication of the libel by the defendant, on the authority of Pullman v. Hill & Co. But on the principle involved, Moss, C. J. O., remarked: "It appears to me that in view of recognized methods of conducting the business affairs of large commercial and manufacturing corporations in this country it would not be unreasonable to hold that where the manager or other officer of such a corporation within the scope of whose duty falls that of dealing with any matter of concern to the business, dictates a letter on a business matter of the corporation to a stenographer in its employ who thereupon transcribes it for signature in the ordinary course, such acts ought not to be treated as publication so as to render the corporation liable to an action for libel for the matter contained in the letter. The stenographer ought not to be regarded as a third person. The communication to him ought to be treated as privileged. There is to my mind much force in the statement of the learned Judge who delivered the judgment of the Court in Owen v. J. S. Ogilvie Pub. Co. [1898] 32 App. Div. 467 [53 N. Y. Supp. 1033]."

In England, the doctrine of Pullman v. Hill & Co. has been materially quali-

VIZETELLY v. MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

(In the Court of Appeal. [1900] 2 Q. B. 170.)

The action was for a libel contained in a book, copies of which had been circulated and sold by the defendants, who were the proprietors of a circulating library with a very extensive business. The defendants in their defence stated that, if they sold or lent the book in question, they did so without negligence, and in the ordinary course of their business as a large circulating library; that they did not know, nor ought they to have known, that it contained the libel complained of; that they did not know and had no ground for supposing that it was likely to contain libellous matter; and that under the circumstances so stated they contended that they did not publish the libel.

The libel complained of was a short passage in a book called "Emin Pasha: His Life and Work," published in October, 1898, by Archibald Constable & Co. The special circumstances in the case brought to the attention of the jury were as follows:

The plaintiff on becoming aware of the libel brought an action for libel against Messrs. Constable & Co., which was settled by their paying £100 damages, apologizing, and undertaking to withdraw the libel from circulation. In the issue of the Publishers' Circular, a recognized medium for trade advertisements of the kind, for November 12, 1898, a notice was inserted to the effect that Messrs. Archibald Constable & Co. requested that all copies of vol. 1 of "The Life and Work of Emin Pasha" might be returned to them immediately, as they wished to cancel a page, and insert another one in its place, and stating that they would of course defray the carriage both ways, if desired. A similar notice was inserted on the same date in the Athenæum newspaper, a well-known medium of communication among literary people. In March, 1899, it came to the plaintiff's knowledge that the defendants were lending copies of the work as originally published to subscribers, and also selling surplus copies of the same, and he thereupon commenced the action against them. It appeared that none of those engaged in the conduct of the defendants' business had seen the before-mentioned notices in the Publishers' Circular and Athenæum, though the defendants took in those papers. Mr. A. O. Mudie, one fied and distinguished in Boxsius v. Goblet Frères, [1894] 1 Q. B. 842, and Edmondson v. Birch & Co., [1907] 1 K. B. 371. In the former case the decision in Pullman v. Hill & Co. is put on the ground that it does not fall within the ordinary business of a merchant to write such defamatory statements, and that, if he does so, it is not reasonably necessary, as he is doing a thing not in the ordinary course of his business, that he should cause the statement to be copied by a clerk in his office. In the Edmondson Case, Fletcher Moulton, C. J., concurring with Collins, M. R., and Cozens-Hardy, L. J., summed up the doctrine thus: "In my opinion the law on the subject, as laid down in the cases, amounts to this: If a business communication is privileged, as being made on a privileged occasion, the privilege covers all incidents of the transmission and treatment of that communication which are in accordance with the reasonable and usual course of business."

of the defendants' two managing directors, who was called as a witness for the defendants, gave evidence to the effect that the defendants did not know when they circulated and sold the book in question that it contained the passage complained of. He stated that the books which they circulated were so numerous that it was impossible in the ordinary course of business to have them all read, and that they were guided in their selection of books by the reputation of the publishers, and the demand for the books. He said in cross-examination that there was no one else in the establishment besides himself and his co-director who exercised any kind of supervision over the books; that they did not keep a reader or anything of that sort; that they had had books on one or two occasions which contained libels; that that would occur from time to time; that they had had no action brought against them for libel before the present action; and that it was cheaper for them to run an occasional risk of an action than to have a reader.

In summing up, Grantham, J., directed the jury to consider whether, having regard to this evidence, the defendants had used due care in the management of their business. The jury found for the plaintiff, damages £100. The defendants applied for a judgment or a new trial.[58]

ROMER, L. J. The law of libel is in some respects a very hard one. In the remarks which I am about to make I propose to deal only with communications which are not privileged. For many years it has been well settled law that a man who publishes a libel is liable to an action, although he is really innocent in the matter, and guilty of no negligence. That rule has been so long established as to be incapable of being altered or modified, and the Courts, in endeavouring to mitigate the hardship resulting from it in many cases, have only been able to do so by holding that, under the circumstances of cases before them, there had been no publication of the libel by the defendant. The result, in my opinion, has been that the decisions on the subject have not been altogether logical or satisfactory on principle. The decisions in some of the earlier cases with which the Courts had to deal are easy to understand. Those were cases in which mere carriers of documents containing libels, who had nothing to do with and were ignorant of the contents of what they carried, have been held not to have published libels.

Then we have the case of Emmens v. Pottle,[59] in which vendors of [58] The statement of the case is abridged. The arguments of counsel and the opinions of A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L. JJ., and part of the opinion of Romer, L. J., are omitted.

[59] 16 Q. B. D. 354 (1885). In this case the statement of defence was in two paragraphs. The first denied that the defendants had published the libel. The second paragraph alleged that the defendants "are newsvendors carrying on a large business at 14 and 15, Royal Exchange, in the city of London, and as such newsvendors, and not otherwise, sold copies of the said periodical called Money in the ordinary course of their said business, and without any knowledge of its contents, which is the alleged publication."

newspapers in the ordinary course of their business sold a newspaper which contained a libel. It was clear that selling a document which contained a libel was prima facie a publication of it, but the Court there held that there was no publication of the libel under the circumstances which appeared from the special findings of the jury, those findings being (1) that the defendants did not know that the newspapers at the time they sold them contained libels on the plaintiff; (2) that it was not by negligence on the defendants' part that they did not know that there was any libel in the newspapers; and (3) that the defendants did not know that the newspaper was of such a character that it was likely to contain libellous matter, nor ought they to have known so. Lord Esher, M. R., in this Court was of opinion that, though the vendors of the newspapers, when they sold them, were prima facie publishers of the libel, yet, when the special findings of the jury were looked at, the result was that there was no publication of the libel by the defendants. Bowen, L. J., put his judgment on the ground that the vendors of the newspapers in that case were really only in the same position as an ordinary carrier of a work containing a libel.[60]

The decision in that case, in my opinion, worked substantial justice; but, speaking for myself, I cannot say that the way in which that result was arrived at appears to me altogether satisfactory; I do not think that the judgments very clearly indicate on what principle Courts ought to act in dealing with similar cases in future. That case was followed by other cases, more or less similar to it, namely, Ridgway v. Smith & Son (1890) 6 Times L. R. 275, Mallon v. W. H. Smith & Son, 9 Times L. R. 621, and Martin v. Trustees of the

In his reply, the plaintiff joined issue on the first paragraph of the defence, and alleged, as to its second paragraph, "that the allegations therein contained are bad in substance and in law, on the ground that, even if the defendants sold copies of the said periodical without any knowledge of their contents and in the ordinary course of their business, as alleged in their defence, still, inasmuch as the defendants sold the said copies as newsvendors for reward in that behalf, the said allegations disclose no answer to the plaintiff's claim."

[60] "A newspaper is not like a fire; a man may carry it about without being bound to suppose that it is likely to do an injury. It seems to me that the defendants are no more liable than any other innocent carrier of an article which he has no reason to suppose likely to be dangerous. But I by no means intend to say that the vendor of a newspaper will not be responsible for a libel contained in it, if he knows, or ought to know, that the paper is one which is likely to contain a libel." Per Bowen, L. J., in Emmens v. Pottle (1885) 16 Q. B. D. 354, 358.

Compare: Arnold v. Ingram (1912) 151 Wis. 438, 138 N. W. 111, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 976: (S., a clergyman, delivered a political sermon, and sent a synopsis of it to a newspaper, which published it. D. in person delivered the manuscript of this synopsis to the publisher of the paper.) Wahlheimer v. Hardenbergh (1914) 160 App. Div. 190, 145 N. Y. Supp. 161: (D. was the general manager of an association of newspapers, organized to furnish news to the papers in the association. As such D. had power to employ reporters to collect and disseminate news. One of his reporters sent out a libelous statement to the newspapers in the association. D. had no actual knowledge of this until nearly two years later.)

British Museum (1894) 10 Times L. R. 338. The result of the cases is I think that, as regards a person who is not the printer or the first or main publisher of a work which contains a libel, but has only taken, what I may call, a subordinate part in disseminating it, in considering whether there has been publication of it by him, the particular circumstances under which he disseminated the work must be considered. If he did it in the ordinary way of his business, the nature of the business and the way in which it was conducted must be looked at; and, if he succeeds in shewing (1) that he was innocent of any knowledge of the libel contained in the work disseminated by him, (2) that there was nothing in the work or the circumstances under which it came to him or was disseminated by him which ought to have led him to suppose that it contained a libel, and (3) that, when the work was disseminated by him, it was not by any negligence on his part that he did not know that it contained the libel, then, although the dissemination of the work by him was prima facie publication of it, he may nevertheless, on proof of the before-mentioned facts, be held not to have published it. But the onus of proving such facts lies on him,[61] and the question of publication or non-publication is in such a case one for the jury.

Applying this view of the law to the present case, it appears to me that the jury, looking at all the circumstances of the case, have in effect found that the defendants published the libel complained of, and therefore the defendants are liable, unless that verdict is disturbed. Looking at the special circumstances of the case which were brought to the attention of the jury, I cannot say that they could not reasonably find as they did. * * *

Application dismissed.

[61] "I agree that the defendants are prima facie liable. They have handed to other people a newspaper in which there is a libel on the plaintiff. I am inclined to think that this called upon the defendants to shew some circumstances which absolve them from liability, not by way of privilege, but facts which shew that they did not publish the libel." Per Lord Esher, M. R., in Emmens v. Pottle (1885) 16 Q. B. D. 354, 357.

"Every sale or delivery of a written or printed copy of a libel is a fresh publication, and every person who sells a written or printed copy of it may be sued therefor, and the onus of proving that he was ignorant of its contents is on the defendant." Per Manning, J., in Staub v. Van Benthuysen (1884) 36 La. Ann. 467, 469. The libel here was a cartoon in a newspaper sold at a news stand "where all the local newspapers and the principal ones from other cities are constantly sold."

(c) "Falsely and Maliciously" [62]

GREENWOOD v. PRICK.

(Court of King's Bench. Cited in Cro. Jac. 91, 79 Reprint, 78.)

Coke cited a case where Parson Prick in a sermon recited a story out of Fox's Martyrology, that one Greenwood, being a perjured person and a great persecutor, had great plagues inflicted upon him, and was killed by the hand of God; whereas in truth he never was so plagued, and was himself present at that sermon; and he thereupon brought his action upon the case, for calling him a perjured person: and the defendant pleaded not guilty. And this matter being disclosed upon the evidence, Wray, Chief Justice, delivered the law to the jury, that it being delivered but as a story, and not with any malice or intention to slander any, he was not guilty of the words maliciously; and so was found not guilty. 14 Hen. 6, pl. 14. 20 Hen. 6, pl. 34. And Popham affirmed it to be good law, when he delivers matter after his occasion as matter of story, and not with any intent to slander any.[63]

[62] The common law declaration in trespass on the case for slander or libel regularly contained this allegation: "Yet the said defendant, well knowing the premises, but greatly envying the happy state and condition of the said plaintiff, and contriving and wickedly and maliciously intending to injure the said plaintiff, * * * then and there falsely and maliciously spoke and published" (or, in libel, "falsely, wickedly and maliciously composed and published) of and concerning the plaintiff." See Whittier's Cases on Common Law Pleading, 127–130; Stephen on Pleading (Williston's Ed.) 44.

The Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 prescribed this form for slander: "That the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff the words following, that is to say;" and this for libel: "That the defendant falsely and maliciously printed and published of the plaintiff in a newspaper called ———, the words following, that is to say." (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, Schedule (B), 32, 33.)

The Commissioners of the New York Code of 1848 recommend the following: "That the defendant on the ———, at ———, published the following libel concerning the plaintiff, viz." (First Report of the Commissioners on Practice and Pleadings, p. 267.)

[63] In Crawford v. Middleton (1678) 1 Lev. 82, 83 Reprint, 308, Twysden "mentioned a case tried before Hobart, which he himself heard; where the plaintiff brought an action against one, for falsely and maliciously saying of him, 'that he heard he was hanged for stealing of an horse;' and on the evidence it appeared that the words were spoken in grief and sorrow for the news; and Hobart caused the plaintiff to be non-suit, for it was not maliciously; which all the Court here agreed to be done according to law."

Compare the query of Lord Denman in Hearne v. Stowell (1840) 12 Ad. & E. 719, 725, where Greenwood v. Prick was cited for the proposition that "malice is the gist of the action" for libel: "Do you pretend that I am justified in illustrating an argument by making a charge against a third party? Is Greenwood v. Prick good law now?" But see Chancellor Walworth's comment on this case in Hastings v. Lusk (1839) 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 410, 415, 34 Am. Dec. 330.

MERCER v. SPARKS.

(Court of King's Bench, 1586. Owen, 51, 74 Reprint, 892.)

Mercer had judgment to recover against Sparks in the Common Pleas, upon an action of the case for words; and Sparks brought a writ of error in the King's Bench, and assigned for error, that the plaintiff did not express in the declaration that the defendant spake the words malitiose, but it was adjudged, that it was no error, because the words themselves were malicious and slanderous, wherefore judgment was affirmed.[64]

[64] "In an indictment a thing must be expressed to be done 'falso et malitiose,' because that is the usual form, but in a declaration these words are not necessary." Anon. (1652) Style, 392.

"As to malice, the plaintiff in practice always alleges in his statement of claim, in actions of libel and slander, that the defendant falsely and maliciously wrote, or spoke, and published of and concerning the plaintiff the words complained of. But it is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege that the defendant did so maliciously. A publication calculated to convey an actionable imputation is prima facie a libel, or a slander. The law implies malice if the words are defamatory and untrue, unless indeed the occasion is privileged, in which case malice in fact must be proved." 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 608 (1911). This practice holds in America, as in England.

"There has been much confusion in the law of defamation concerning malice as an ingredient of the offence. The use of the term may be traced to the ecclesiastical courts. By the canon law a bad intent, called 'malitia,' was essential in 'injuria': and it is likely that its use in the spiritual courts was primarily jurisdictional. These courts punished offences which were sinful because they were sinful, the essential element being 'malitia.' The defamer was punished 'pro salute animæ'; the matter was looked at from a moral, not from a legal point of view, to see if the speaking of the words were sinful. But it was no more true in the thirteenth century than it is now that an imputation upon a man's character was always or necessarily malicious. Such imputations were known, however, as a matter of common experience, to be malicious in most cases. And upon this presumption (though sometimes contrary to fact) the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was based. From being a necessary ground of jurisdiction in the spiritual courts, it came to be considered afterwards, when the civil courts acquired jurisdiction, that malice was the ground of temporal redress, though of course the jurisdiction of the temporal courts was not based upon malice. In other words, the common law adopted the ecclesiastical presumption as the gist of the action. Early cases may be found which proceeded strictly upon this basis. * * * But when the remedy came to be applied to cases in which there was obviously no actual wrongful intent, the courts resorted, as usual, to a fiction to preserve their consistency. They affirmed that malice was in all cases the gist of the action, but to find malice that did not exist they implied it. The whole doctrine of applied malice, in defamation as in other branches of the common law, is pure scholasticism. Malice if it means anything means malevolence or ill will; any other use of the term is fictitious. But the law was stated in this way: Words spoken without ill will may be actionable, but in such cases the law is said to imply malice from the act of speaking or publication. This kind of malice which the law is said to imply is called 'legal malice,' as differing from malevolence, which is called 'malice in fact'; and legal malice is said to consist in speaking defamatory matter without legal excuse, because when words are thus spoken the law implies malice." Van Vechten Veeder, "History and Theory of the Law of Defamation," 4 Columbia Law Review, 32, 35, 36.

"The exposition of the law of defamation was at one time encumbered by a useless legal fiction known as the doctrine of implied malice. It used to be said that malice was an essential element in all actions for libel and slander, whether the occasion was privileged or not; but when there was no privilege, malice was conclusively presumed from the mere fact of publication. The existence of privilege, on the other hand, excluded any such presumption. Absolute privilege excluded it conclusively; but when the privilege was qualified merely, it remained open to the plaintiff to prove as a fact that malice existed. Malice which was thus presumed in law was called implied malice, while that which was proved as a fact in cases of qualified privilege was known as express or actual malice. Implied malice has now been eliminated from the law. It is now recognized that malice is no more an essential element in the wrong of defamation than in that of trespass or conversion." [65] Accord: Taylor v. Hearst (1895) 107 Cal. 262, 40 Pac. 392: (D., the proprietor of a newspaper, had published an article charging fraud by "J. W. Taylor"; the statement was untrue of him, and D. had not intended to name him, but to make the charge against another person, whose name was "J. N. Taylor.")

Upton v. Times-Democrat (1900) 104 La. 141, 28 South. 970: (A dispatch to the defendant's newspaper referred to P. as "a cultured gentleman." Through a mistake in transmission, this became "a colored gentleman." Under a standing rule in D.'s newspaper office, this was changed so as to read "a negro," and so published, in New Orleans.)

Morrison v. Ritchie & Co., [1902] 4 F. 645, 39 S. L. R. 432, 9 S. L. T. 476: (On August 15, 1901, the following appeared among the birth notices in the "Scotsman," published by the defendants: "Morrison: At the Caledonian Hotel, Ullapool, on the 11th inst., the wife of George Morrison, of 33 South Back Conongate, of twin sons. Ross-shire papers please copy." The statement was false, and Mr. and Mrs. Morrison had been married on July 12, 1901. Of these facts, however, the publishers of the Scotsman had no actual knowledge. In an action against them for written slander the following issues were proposed for the pursuers: Whether the pursuers were married as alleged, whether the defenders had published the notice on the date mentioned, and whether the notice was of and concerning the pursuers and "was false and calumnious." These issues were approved by the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), who remarks as follows:

"This is an action of damages against the proprietors of a newspaper on account of defamatory advertisements. There can be no doubt that the pursuers had suffered a very cruel wrong, and would doubtless recover exemplary damages from the mean scoundrel who sent the advertisements, if they could discover him and if he were found to be sane and able to pay them. But their action against the newspaper raises a question of much importance and apparently of some novelty, since no precise or very close precedent has been quoted.

"I do not inquire whether sufficient vigilance was exercised in the 'Scotsman' office before inserting this advertisement. A very slight inquiry would have disclosed the fraud. A telegram to Ullapool would have disclosed it. The instructions were not signed, but bore the name of Mrs. Sutherland, 7 Albert Street, and an examination of the Directory would have disclosed the fact that no such house existed. But these precautions were not taken. I am far from imputing any blame on that account, because I suppose it would be barely possible to make such inquiries about the multitude of such

WILLIAMS v. HICKS PRINTING CO.

The action was against the printing company to recover damages for a libelous publication in the defendant's newspaper. The plaintiff was a lawyer in good standing, and it was claimed that the article in question was willfully and maliciously composed and published with intent to injure him in his good name and fame as a lawyer and to bring him into public contempt and ridicule. The complaint contained allegations to this effect, with other allegations essential to support a recovery, including a copy of the article.

The defendant admitted the publication, but pleaded that it was neither false nor defamatory, and took issue on all allegations of the complaint as to the defendant's conduct being actionable.[66] The cause was submitted to the jury under instructions permitting a verdict for the defendant. After a motion for a new trial had been overruled, judgment for the defendant was rendered on the verdict.

MARSHALL, J. * * * In general, malice is an essential element of libel, but not, necessarily, malice in the sense of actual ill will and intent to injure, constructive malice, so called,—perpetration of the act without lawful excuse,—is sufficient. One need not go further on the subject of malice in proving a charge of libel than to prove the publication, unless the situation is such as to fall within the field of conditional privilege, and then malice in law is circumstantially rebutted and malice in fact, or express malice, as it is otherwise called, is required.

advertisements which reach the 'Scotsman.' But that is a matter which has no bearing on the question under consideration, because this action is not laid on neglect, but simply upon slander, there being no plea about neglect.

"Malice in the ordinary sense, or in any sense which can reasonably be put on the word, is not in the case. It is certain that there has been no malice. There hardly ever is when the action is laid against the proprietors of a newspaper on account of what has appeared in its columns, but the law is that the proprietors of the newspaper represent their correspondent, and are liable for the injurious paragraph as he would have been. I do not think that the law does so strange a thing as to imply malice where it manifestly and certainly does not exist."

On the effect of a retraction or apology, see Turton v. N. Y. Recorder Co. (1894) 144 N. Y. 144, 38 N. E. 1009; Coffman v. Spokane Pub. Co. (1911), 65 Wash. 1, 117 Pac. 596, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 636; De Severinus v. Press Pub. Co. (1911) 147 App. Div. 161, 132 N. Y. Supp. 89: "This [the retraction subsequently published] goes only to show absence of actual malice, but it does not exonerate from the consequences of original recklessness." Per Carr, J. And see 18 Halsbury's Laws of England, 726, 727 (1911); 25 Cyc. 424; Key. No. "Libel and Slander," § 66.

On constitutional questions as to a statute giving effect to a retraction, see Hanson v. Krehbiel (1904) 68 Kan. 670, 75 Pac. 1041, 64 L. R. A. 790, 104 Am. St. Rep. 422, and Osborn v. Leach (1904) 135 N. C. 628, 47 S. E. 811, 66 L. R. A. 648.

[66] The defendant pleaded also in excuse and justification, and in mitigation of damages. Only so much of the case is given as relates to the one point. The result of the appeal was a reversal of the judgment below.

So it is not to be thought that mere good faith, honest belief in the correctness of the publication, or good motives, or accident or inadvertence, is, of itself, a defense, or even sufficient to mitigate as to actual damages, because such faith, belief and motive are not inconsistent with malice in law arising, as a legal result, from the perpetration of the act of publishing an article, the natural tendency of which is to make its victim appear ridiculous or contemptible, or a subject of hatred, or to disgrace him in society or injure him in his business.

If a published article naturally tends, as suggested, the right to recover general damages follows as matter of course, in the absence of truth as a justification or circumstances of legal excuse, this, as indicated, not including mere negligence, accident, good faith, good motives or sense of duty, except as said, in the field of conditional privilege where something more than implied malice is required. General damages, which so follow, may be added to by exemplary damages, upon proof of that actual malice which overcomes the protection of conditional privilege. Thus one cannot efficiently claim immunity from liability for damages inflicted by publishing with express malice a false and defamatory article, by putting up the shield of conditional privilege. Joseph v. Baars, 142 Wis. 390, 125 N. W. 913, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1076; Arnold v. Ingram, 151 Wis. 438, 138 N. W. 111, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 976.

(d) Actual Damage [67]

The practice of awarding damages to the libelled party, in addition to the fine or imprisonment due to the criminal character of the offence, was introduced by the Star Chamber itself;[68] and it would, therefore, have been natural that, on the abolition of the Star Chamber in 1641, the civil action for damages should at once take the place of the older procedure. Nevertheless, though there is a thin stream of reported cases from the Restoration onwards,[69] libel continued for some time to be regarded mainly as a criminal offence punishable on indictment or information; and it may be to this fact that we owe the rule (certainly anomalous in an action of case) that in libel no damage need be proved.

Miles, in Digest Eng. Civ. Law, 502, 503.

HERIOT v. STUART.

(At Nisi Prius, Sittings after Term at Westminster, 1796. 1 Esp. 437.)

The plaintiff was proprietor of a newspaper called the True Briton. The defendant was printer of another paper called The Oracle; and the action was brought for a libel inserted in the latter paper, concerning the former. The libel was in the following terms, in the form of a paragraph in the Oracle:

"Times versus True Briton.

"In a morning paper of yesterday was given the following character of the True Briton: That 'it was the most vulgar, ignorant, and scurrilous journal ever published in Great Britain.' To the above assertion we assent, and to this account we add, that the first proprietors abandoned it, and that it is the lowest now in circulation; and we submit the fact to the consideration of advertisers."

Erskine, for the plaintiff, admitted, that the first words, charging it with scurrility, &c. were not actionable; but that the latter were, inasmuch as they affected the sale, and profits to be made by advertising.

To which LORD KENYON assented.[70]

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND CITIZENS OF MANCHESTER v. WILLIAMS.

(Queen's Bench Division, 1890. [1891] 1 Q. B. 94.)

The statement of claim, by the Municipal Corporation of the City of Manchester, after setting forth a letter by the defendant published in a newspaper further alleged that the defendant meant, and was understood to mean thereby, that bribery and corruption existed in three departments of the Manchester City Council, and that the plaintiffs were either parties thereto or culpably ignorant thereof. It did not, however, contain any averment that the plaintiffs had suffered any special pecuniary damage as the result of such defamatory publication. The defendant raised the objection of law that the words complained of were not capable of being construed into a libel against the plaintiffs, and that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of

Because of a variance, a stat processus was entered by consent.

Compare the remark of Bayley, J., in Whittaker v. Bradley (1826) 7 Dowl. & Ry. 649, 16 E. C. L. 310: "Whatever words have a tendency to hurt, or are calculated to prejudice a man who seeks his livelihood by any trade or business, are actionable."

action, and that a municipal corporation cannot sue in its corporate capacity in respect of the alleged words in the sense complained of.

Blake Odgers, for the plaintiffs. If a corporation can be guilty of malice by its servants so as to render it liable to be sued for a malicious prosecution, it must equally be capable of being guilty of corruption so as to entitle it to sue for an imputation of corruption. Moreover, the libel here complained of contains charges which can only refer to the corporation as a whole. It speaks of "scandalous and abominable expenditure." But the money is voted by the corporate body, and not by the individual members of it.

DAY, J. This is an action brought by a municipal corporation to recover damages for what is alleged to be a libel on the corporation itself, as distinguished from its individual members or officials. The libel complained of consists of a charge of bribery and corruption. The question is whether such an action will lie. I think it will not.

It is altogether unprecedented, and there is no principle on which it could be founded. The limits of a corporation's right of action for libel are those suggested by Pollock, C. B., in the case which has been referred to. A corporation may sue for a libel affecting property, not for one merely affecting personal reputation. The present case falls within the latter class. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendant.

McLOUGHLIN v. AMERICAN CIRCULAR LOOM CO.

(Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, First Circuit, 1903. 60 C. C. A. 87, 125 Fed. 203.)

The action was against the American Circular Loom Company, a corporation, and charged a libel in the publication by the defendant of the following letter from Chelsea, Mass., signed by the defendant, and addressed to the plaintiff, at New Orleans:

"Dear Sir: You are aware that we have sent our Mr. Kirkland to New Orleans to make an original investigation of the controversy between yourself and the Board of Underwriters. Mr. Kirkland has returned and has made to us the report of such investigation. It appears, beyond controversy, that you are using, and have been using, our circular loom conduit, not only under the conditions and in the places where it is permitted by the rules, but also in places and under circumstances where it is prohibited by such rules. We desire to impress upon you the fact that this company submits itself to those underwriters' rules; that such rules have been framed with its consent and acquiescence, and that we cannot, and will not, place ourselves in opposition to the execution of those rules as written.

"Under these circumstances, we think it necessary to advise you that unless you are willing to handle our material in accordance with our wishes, and in accordance with the rules of the Board of Underwriters, our business relations must cease, as we cannot afford to have any person connected with us who puts us in hostility to an organization with which we are in entire sympathy.

"Your immediate answer to this letter is requested, and we expect you in that letter to define your future policy in regard of the subject matter of this communication.

"We deem it proper to notify you that we have sent a copy of this letter to the Board of Underwriters, to the various insurance companies operating in New Orleans, and to such other persons as we have deemed it advisable to communicate with."

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff had become the selling agent for the defendant in New Orleans, for the purpose of introducing and establishing the sale of the defendant's product, viz. circular loom conduits, that the statements in the letter were false, and that copies of the letter were sent to insurance companies and agencies in New Orleans, where plaintiff was in the business of installing electrical plants, and to his competitors. The defendant demurred.*

LOWELL, District Judge. The plaintiff did not contend strenuously that the language complained of was libelous per se, without allegation and proof of special damage. Some distinctions applied in an action for defamation are highly technical, and have been adversely criticised even by judges who applied them. The gravamen of an action for defamation is damage to the reputation of the plaintiff, naturally arising from a false report. See Odgers on Libel and Slander (3d Ed.) 95; Morasse v. Brochu, 151 Mass. 567, 25 N. E. 74, 8 L. R. A. 524, 21 Am. St. Rep. 474. Speaking generally, where the false report and consequent damage to the reputation are shown, an action will lie unless the occasion be privileged. From some sorts of false report the law presumes conclusively that damage has followed, and the plaintiff need neither allege nor prove it. Here the language is styled libelous per se. Logically or not, the conclusive presumption of damage arises from some written words, where it does not arise if the same words are merely spoken. Odgers, 3; Thorley v. Kerry, 4 Taunt. 355. Except where this presumption exists, special damage to the plaintiff's reputation must be alleged and proved to have been the actual and natural result of the language used. In an action of defamation, the distinction between injuria and damnum—injury to the plaintiff's reputation and damage arising from the injury—is particularly hard to draw. Some language is deemed injurious without proof of damage, and damage is conclusively presumed to have followed the injury; other language is deemed injurious to the reputation only where damage has actually resulted.

Probably two diverse theories have tended to govern the action: First, that A. is responsible for defaming B. in the ordinary sense of defamation—language libelous per se; second, that A. is responsible to B. for damage naturally resulting from the lies told by A. about B.—special damage. See Ratcliffe v. Evans, [1892] 2 Q. B. 524. It may be that an action for defamation, strictly speaking, is properly maintainable only under the first theory, while under the second the action should be special on the case. But in this country, at any rate, the two theories have not been differentiated. In a few critical cases they may lead to results quite different, but in general the law is that above stated. An accurate and readily applicable definition of written language, libelous per se, does not exist, and some well-established distinctions may rest on history rather than on logic. Webb's Pollock on Torts, 290. The language here complained of, if spoken, would not support an action without proof of special damage. In the absence of innuendo and further colloquium, we do not deem that this language, though written, is libelous per se. * * *[71]

* The statement of the case is abridged.

(C) Construction and Application[72]

No statement is necessarily and in all circumstances defamatory. There is no charge or imputation, however serious on the face of it, which may not be explained away by evidence that in the special circumstances of the case it was not issued or understood in a defam-

[71] However, in the omitted portion of the opinion the court reached the conclusion that special damage was shown.

Accord: Stannard v. Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine Co. (1912) 118 Md. 151, 84 Atl. 335, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 515, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 709: (D., the Sewing Machine Company, sent a letter to another corporation stating that P., their Baltimore manager, refused to complete the payments for his wife's sewing machine and that "if you do not desire to see one of your managers brought up in a civil suit for goods purchased on the installment plan, we would suggest that you communicate with him to the effect that he take some steps" towards meeting this debt. In his suit for libel P. made no claim of any special damage caused him by the writing and sending of this letter, but insisted that it was actionable per se. Said Stockbridge, J., delivering the opinion: "A generalization from all these cases leads to the conclusion that in order for words not ordinarily actionable in themselves to be libelous per se, because affecting the plaintiff in respect to his business, occupation, or profession, it is necessary that the words have a reference to him in that capacity. Words which impute to persons engaged in business, such as merchants, traders, and others in occupations where credit is essential to the successful prosecution of their occupation, nonpayment of debts, want of credit, or actions which tend to lessen their credit, are libelous per se, unless they are privileged communications. In this case Mr. Stannard was not in business on his own account. He was the local manager for a nonresident corporation. It is not alleged or suggested that he had any occasion for the use of credit, or that his credit had been in any way impaired or affected. The statements in regard to him in no way related to the manner of his performance of his duties as manager of the Holmes Electric Protective Company, or charged him with being unfit for the proper performance of them; nor did he lose his position because of the letter in question, in which case he would have sustained special damage. Under these conditions, and applying the rule of law already stated, the letter cannot be regarded as actionable per se, and the trial court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer. That the letter was actuated by malice is admitted by the demurrer, and apparent from the paper itself, and deserving of the most emphatic reprobation; but that will not justify this court in departing from well-established principles upon so important a subject.")

[72] "It is elementary that alleged defamatory matter comes before the court for construction under the ordinary rules for construing pleadings. Among these is that the pleader is supposed to have stated his case in the manner most favorable to himself. The law will not assume as favorable to a party atory sense. It may be shown to have been made in jest, or by way of irony, or in some metaphorical or secondary innocent sense, and that it was or ought to have been understood in that sense by those to whom it was made. Conversely, no statement is necessarily and in all circumstances innocent. An allegation which on the face of it contains no imputation whatever against the plaintiff may be proved from the circumstances to have contained a latent and secondary defamatory sense.

ROBERTS v. CAMDEN.

(Court of King's Bench, 1807. 9 East, 93, 103 Reprint, 508, 9 R. R. 513.)

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C. J.,[73] delivered judgment: This was a motion in arrest of judgment in an action for words, in which a general verdict was found, with joint damages, upon the whole of the declaration. * * * The first objection turns upon the meaning of the words spoken of the plaintiff by the defendant. The words are these:

"He is under a charge of a prosecution for perjury. Griffith Williams (meaning an attorney of that name) has the Attorney-General's directions (meaning the Attorney-General of the County Palatine of Chester) to prosecute (meaning to prosecute the plaintiff) for perjury."

As it has been settled ever since the case of Underwood v. Parkes, 2 Stra. 1200, that the truth of the words cannot be given in evidence upon not guilty, but must be specially pleaded; the words, not having been so justified, must be assumed to be false: and the words not being accompanied by any qualifying context, nor appearing to be spoken on any warrantable occasion; as in a course of duty, or the like; so as to rebut the malice which is necessarily to be inferred from making a false charge of this kind; provided the charge itself is to be considered as a charge of the crime of perjury; the question amounts simply to this, whether the words amount to such charge; that is, whether they are calculated to convey to the mind of an ordinary hearer an imputation upon the plaintiff of the crime of perjury. The rule which at one time prevailed, that words are to be anything he has not averred. As was said in Holt v. Scolefield, 6 T. R. 691: 'Either the words themselves must be such as can only be understood in a libelous sense, or it must be shown by the introductory allegations that they have that meaning, otherwise they are not actionable. Words, to be actionable, should be unequivocally so.' Harrison v. Stratton, 4 Esp. Cas. 218. This was the rule in regard to pleadings in libel cases in the English Courts (Folkard, Slander & Libel [7th Ed.] p. 235), and it has been affirmed in many American cases." Per Walker, J., in Walsh v. Pulitzer Pub. Co. (1913) 250 Mo. 142, 157 S. W. 326, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 985.

[73] The statement of facts and part of the opinion are omitted.

understood in mitiori sensu,[74] has been long ago superseded; and words are now construed by Courts, as they always ought to have been, in the plain and popular sense in which the rest of the world naturally understand them.[75]

What then is the plain and popular sense of these words; and what is the imputation meant to be conveyed by a person speaking them untruly of another? They must mean, that he was ordered by the Attorney-General to be prosecuted; (and it is immaterial for this purpose, whether the Attorney-General of the County Palatine or of England were meant;) either for a perjury which he had committed; or, which he had not committed; or, which he was supposed only to have committed. In the first sense they are clearly actionable. In the second, they cannot possibly be understood consistently with the context. And if the defendant had used the words in the last sense, the jury might have acquitted him, according to the doctrine in the case of Oldham v. Peake, both in the Court of Common Pleas, 2 Sir W. Blackstone, 962, and in this Court, Cowp. 275; in which case when in the Common Pleas Mr. Justice Gould laid it down, "That what was the defendant's meaning was a fact for the jury to decide upon." And Lord Mansfield afterwards, when that case was brought into this court, by error, said, "if (the words had been) shewn to be innocently spoken, the jury might have found a verdict for the de-

Brough v. Dennyson (1600) Goulds. 143, 75 Reprint, 1053: (The words were "Thou has stolen by the high-way side." It was remarked by Fenner: "When the words may have a good construction you shall never construe them in an evill sense. And it may be intended he stole a stick under a hedge, and these words are not so slanderous, that they are actionable.") Ball v. Bridges (1600) Cro. Eliz. 746, 78 Reprint, 978: (The words were: "He is a maintainer of thieves, and keepeth none but thieves in his house." A judgment for the plaintiff was reversed; for "he doth not say that he knew them to be thieves whom he maintained, and one may have thieves in his house, and maintain them, and not know them to be thieves, and then it is not any offence.") Foster v. Browning (1624) Cro. Jac. 688, 79 Reprint, 596: (The words were: "Thou art as arrant a thief as any is in England." A motion in arrest of judgment was successful because, inter alia, "he doth not aver that there was any thief in England.")

Southold v. Daunston (1633) Cro. Car. 269, 79 Reprint, 834: (The words were "Southold hath been in bed with Dorchester's wife." They were pleaded with special damage, loss of marriage with a certain woman. After verdict for the plaintiff, Bing, Serjt., contended that the words were not actionable; "for it may be that he was in bed with her when he was a child, she being his nurse, or it may be that her husband was in bed betwixt them, and the words shall be taken in mitiori sensu when any construction can be made to help it." After some hesitation judgment was given for the plaintiff, apparently because of the special damage.)

In Baker v. Pierce (1703) 6 Mod. 23, 87 Reprint, 787, Holt, C. J., after describing these cases in slander as "scrambling things that have gone backwards and forwards," remarks that wherever words tended to take away a man's reputation he would encourage actions for them, "because so doing would contribute much to the preservation of the peace."

fendant; but they have put a contrary construction upon the words as laid." And certainly, if the sense of the defendant, in speaking these words, had varied from that ascribed to them by the plaintiff, he might by specially pleading have shewn them not actionable, had he not chosen to have rested his defence merely on the general issue.

It appears therefore that these words must fairly be understood in the first of these three senses; namely, that he was ordered to be prosecuted for a perjury which he had committed; and, so understood, they are unquestionably actionable. These words are not less strong in effect than the words which were held actionable in one of the later cases, that of Carpenter v. Tarrant, Rep. temp. Hardw. 339. viz. "Robert Carpenter was in Winchester gaol, and tried for his life; and would have been hanged had it not been for Leggat, for breaking open the granary of farmer A., and stealing his bacon." And without adverting to the long bead roll of conflicting cases which have been cited on both sides in the course of this argument, it is sufficient to say, that these words, fairly and naturally construed, appear to us to have been meant, and to be calculated, to convey the imputation of perjury actually committed by the person of whom they are spoken; and that, therefore, the rule nisi for arresting the judgment must be discharged.[75]

THOMPSON v. BERNARD.

(At Nisi Prius. 1807. 1 Camp. 48.)

Case for slander. It appeared that the defendant had used the following words, which were laid in the declaration, "Thompson is a damned thief; and so was his father before him; and I can prove it;" but that he added "Thompson received the earnings of the ship, and ought to pay the wages." The witness, to whom these words were addressed, had been master of a ship belonging to a person deceased, who had left the defendant his executor; and at the time was applying to him for payment of his wages.

[75] In Harrison v. Thornborough (1713) 10 Mod. 196, 88 Reprint, 691, it was remarked from the Queen's Bench: "Precedents in actions for words are not of equal authority as in other actions, because norma loquendi is the rule for the interpretation of words: and this rule is different in one age from what it is in another. The words which an hundred years ago did not import a slanderous sense now may: and so vice versa. In this kind of action for words, which are not of very great antiquity, the Courts did at first, as much as they could, discountenance them: and that for a wise reason, because generally brought for contention and vexation: and therefore when the words were capable of two constructions, the Court always took them mitiori sensu. But latterly these actions have been more countenanced: for men's tongues growing more virulent, and irreparable damage arising from words, it has been by experience found, that unless men can get satisfaction by law, they will be apt to take it themselves. The rule therefore that has now prevailed is, that words are to be taken in that sense that is most natural and obvious, and in which those to whom they are spoken will be sure to understand them."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH directed a nonsuit; observing, that the word "thief" was used without any intention in the defendant to impute felony to the plaintiff; which must appear to support the declaration.[76]

HANKINSON v. BILBY.

(Court of Exchequer, 1847. 16 Mees. & W. 442, 73 R. R. 563.)

Case. The declaration stated with proper innuendoes that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff the following defamatory words:

"You are a thief, and a bloody thief. You get your living by it. You have robbed Mr. Lake of £30, and would have robbed him of more, only you were afraid. I did mean what I said; be off, I don't want any bloody thieves here. You know you robbed Mr. Lake of £30."

At the trial, under a plea of Not guilty, before Rolfe, B., it appeared that the words were uttered by the defendant, a toll collector, to the plaintiff, as he passed the turnpike-gate, in the presence of several persons as well as the witness. The nature of the previous conversation between the plaintiff and defendant did not appear. The learned Baron told the jury, that it was immaterial whether the defendant intended to convey a charge of felony against the plaintiff by the words used, the question being, whether the bystanders would understand that charge to be conveyed by them. Verdict for the plaintiff for £5.

Humfrey now moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection: No special damage being laid, it was necessary to show the words to be actionable in themselves. The witness called by the plaintiff to prove the words was purposely selected, he not have heard the previous conversation between the plaintiff and defendant. * * * (PARKE, B. The witness appears to have been well acquainted with the affair to which the words related. If the bystanders were equally cognizant of it, the defendant would have been entitled to a verdict; but here the only question is, whether the private intention of a man who utters injurious words is material, if bystanders may fairly understand them in a sense and manner injurious to the party to whom they relate, e. g. that he was a felon.)

Some doubt being suggested as to the facts proved, the Court conferred with Rolfe, B.; and the next day,

POLLOCK, C. B., said: We find from my Brother Rolfe, that there were several bystanders who not only might but must have heard the expressions which form the subject of this action. That disposes of the case as to the matter of law. Words uttered must be construed in the sense which hearers of common and reasonable understanding would ascribe to them, even though particular individuals better informed on the matter alluded to might form a different judgment on the subject.[77]

Rule refused.

BARHAM v. NETHERSALL.

(Court of King's Bench, 1602. Yel. 22, 80 Reprint, 16.)

The plaintiff declared that the defendant spoke these words:

T. Barham (innuendo the plaintiff) hath burnt my barn (innuendo my barn at such a place full of corn) and that with his own hand; and upon non culp' pleaded, it was found for the plaintiff, and alleg'd in arrest of judgment, that the action did not lie; for these words, the plaintiff hath burnt my barn, are no slander; for such burning of a house is but a trespass, and all one as if he had said, the plaintiff hath cut down my trees, and such like; for to say a man hath committed a trespass is no slander: and then the innuendo (my barn full of corn) will not help the matter; for it is the nature of an innuendo to explain doubtful words, where there is matter sufficient in the declaration to maintain the action. But if the words before the innuendo do not sound in slander, no words produced by the innuendo will make the action maintainable, for it is not the nature of an innuendo to beget an action. And all this was allowed by GAUDY and YELVERTON, Justices (being alone in the King's Bench), and judgment quod nil capiat per billam.

BLOSS v. TOBEY.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1824. 2 Pick. 320.)

This was an action of slander with a declaration in seven counts, for the words stated in the opinion. The cause was tried upon the general issue, with a verdict for the plaintiff for $500 damages. The defendant moved in arrest of judgment.[78]

PARKER, C. J. * * * The first count only charges the defendant with having said that the plaintiff had burnt his own store in Alford. The words are introduced with a colloquium "of and concerning the plaintiff and of and concerning a certain store of the plaintiff's situated in said Alford, before that time, to wit, on the sixth day of December last past, consumed by fire," and alleges that the defendant did speak, utter and publish the following false, scandalous and malicious words of and concerning the plaintiff, viz.:

He (meaning the plaintiff) burnt it (meaning the plaintiff's store in Alford aforesaid) himself (again meaning the plaintiff; and further meaning and insinuating by the several words aforesaid, that the plaintiff had been guilty of the crime of wilfully and maliciously burning his own store in Alford aforesaid).

Now these words are not actionable, unless it is a crime punishable by law for a man to destroy by fire his own property; and we cannot find that, either by the common law, or by any statute of this commonwealth, such an act, unaccompanied by an injury to, or by a design to injure, some other person, is criminal; and although it is alleged by the innuendo, that the defendant meant and intended to charge the plaintiff with having done this act wilfully and maliciously, yet the words do not thereby acquire any force or meaning which they had not in themselves, the office of an innuendo being only to make more plain what is contained in the words themselves as spoken, not to enlarge or extend their meaning or give them a sense which they do not bear when taken by themselves without the aid of an innuendo. The words spoken, as stated in this count, are simply, "He burnt it." These words are innocent in themselves, though they may have a defamatory meaning, if they relate to any subject the burning of which is unlawful. In order to give them that character, that they may be actionable, the plaintiff should have set forth in a colloquium the circumstances which would render such a burning unlawful, or by an averment in the preceding part of his count, without the form of a colloquium, and then should have averred that the words spoken were of and concerning those circumstances.[79] Thus, if goods belonging [79] "Let the slanderer disguise his language, and wrap up his meaning in ambiguous givings out, as he will, it shall not avail him, because courts will understand language, in whatever form it is used, as all mankind understand it. * * * If the words have the slanderous meaning alleged, not by their own intrinsic force, but by reason of the existence of some extraneous fact, the plaintiff must undertake to prove that fact, and the defendant must be at liberty to disprove it. The fact then must be averred in a traversable form, with a proper colloquium, to wit, an averment, that the words in question are spoken of and concerning such usage, or report, or fact, whatever it is, which gives to words, otherwise indifferent, the particular defamatory meaning imputed to them." For the debt which American literature owes to the common law colloquium, see the reference to Bloss v. Tobey, in Bigelow's Life of William Cullen Bryant, American Men of Letters, pp. 37, 38, note 1.

The Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, § 61) provided that in actions of libel and slander, the plaintiff shall be at liberty to aver that the words or matter complained of were used in a defamatory sense, specifying such defamatory sense, without any prefatory averment to show how such words and matter were used in that sense." See also the provision of the New York Code of Procedure of 1848, 141, which has had a large to another person were in the store, or if goods belonging to the plaintiff had been insured, it should have been averred that such was the case, and that the words spoken related to a store with such goods in it. But there is nothing in the count which indicates that any goods were in the store, or that any damage had happened or was designed towards any one but the plaintiff himself; so that the whole accusation against him, as represented in this count, is that he wilfully and maliciously burnt his own store. * * *[80]

(D) Defenses to a Prima Facie Cause in Defamation

(a) JUSTIFICATION: TRUTH OF THE CHARGE

PRESS CO. v. STEWART.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1888. 119 Pa. 584, 14 Atl. 51.)

Action on the case against the Press Company, to recover damages for the publication of an alleged libel in "The Press," a daily paper of Philadelphia. The plaintiff had leased rooms in a business section of Philadelphia and fitted them up as a school for clerks, salesmen, and reporters, and he professed to be a teacher of shorthand. The outside of his rooms had been alluringly placarded with signs. The attention of the city editor of "The Press" being attracted by the peculiarity of the signs, he detailed a reporter to visit the establishment and ascertain its character. He did so, and "The Press," the next day, contained the report of the interview.

following in America: "In an action for libel or slander, it shall not be necessary to state in the complaint, any extrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to the plaintiff, of the defamatory matter out of which the cause of action arose; but it shall be sufficient to state generally that the same was published or spoken concerning the plaintiff, and if such allegation be controverted, the plaintiff shall be bound to establish, on the trial, that it was so published or spoken." On the effect of such enactments, see Grand v. Dreyfus (1898) 122 Cal. 58, 54 Pac. 389.

[80] Accord: Hopkins v. Beedle (1803) 1 Caines (N. Y.) 348, 2 Am. Dec. 191: (The words were "You have sworn a lie;" but there was no colloquium.) Stafford v. Green (1806) 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 505: ("He swore falsely before Squire Andrews," without a colloquium, but with "a mere innuendo, that it was in a certain cause depending before a justice.") Blair v. Sharp (1820) Breese (Ill.) 30. Tebbetts v. Goding (1857) 9 Gray (Mass.) 254.

Compare Niven v. Munn (1816) 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 48, where the statement was thus pleaded: "The defendant, in a certain discourse which he had of and concerning the trial of a certain cause between David Munn and John Wilson, then lately had, before Samuel Barnard, Esq., a justice of the peace, in and for the County of Sullivan; and of and concerning the testimony of the plaintiff, who was sworn as a witness, by the said Samuel Barnard (he being a justice as aforesaid, and having full power and lawful authority to administer an oath), on the trial of the cause, and testified as a witness therein, spoke and published, concerning the plaintiff, these false, scandalous, malicious and defamatory words: 'What he (meaning to plaintiff) has sworn to is a damned lie' (meaning thereby, that the plaintiff had perjured himself on the trial of the said cause)."

It was this report which formed the subject of the alleged libel. The plaintiff claimed that it was a libel because it exposed him to ridicule, and was calculated to injure him in his business as a teacher.

PAXSON, C. J.[81] * * * The defendant filed what was substantially, though not perhaps in strict technical form, a plea of justification. It alleged that the article in the Press was a just and true account of the interview between its reporter and the plaintiff, and asked the court to instruct the jury that "if they believe that the publication complained of is a fair and true account of an interview had between the plaintiff and Mr. Cooke, your verdict must be for the defendant." The court declined to affirm this point, and therein we think the learned judge erred. While the truth would not have been a defence to an indictment, the rule is otherwise in a civil suit for damages.[82] This is horn-book law. For this error at least the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

[81] The statement of the case is abridged, and only so much of the opinion is given as relates to the one point.

[82] On the possible effect of showing the truth of the statement in slander, see the comment of Holt, C. J., in Johnson v. Browning (1703) 6 Mod. 216, when that case was before the King's Bench in 1705: "And he (Holt, C. J.) remembered another very lately, where a fellow brought an action for saying of him 'he was a highway-man'; and it appearing upon evidence that he was so, he was taken in court, committed to Newgate, and convicted and hanged the next sessions: so people ought to advise well before they brought such actions. And Darnell (for the plaintiff) remembered the like fate, which befell a client of his."

It was however at one time received as sound law that "no scandal in writing is any more justifiable in a civil action brought by the party to vindicate the injury done him, than in an indictment or information at the suit of the crown: for though in actions for words, the law, through compassion, admits the truth of the charge to be pleaded as a justification, yet this tenderness of the law is not to be extended to written scandal, in which the author acts with more coolness; and deliberation gives the scandal a more durable stamp, and propagates it wider and farther: whereas in words men often in a heat and passion say things which they are afterwards ashamed of, and though they seem to act with deliberation, yet the scandal sooner dies away, and is forgotten; and therefore from the greater degree of mischief and malice attending the one than the other, though the law allows the party to justify in an action for words, yet it doth not for written scandal; from whence it follows, that the only favour truth affords in such a case is, that it may be shewn in mitigation of damages in an action." Bacon's Abridgment, "Libel," A, 5.

This rested chiefly on the remark ascribed to Lord Hardwicke in The King v. Roberts (1735) Selw. N. P. 986. But Lord Holt in 1707 had already accepted the doctrine that "a man may justify in an action upon the case for words, or for a libel; otherwise in an indictment." Anon. (1706) 11 Mod. 99.

On the reason for the rule, compare 3 Bl. Com. (1765) 125, and Pollock on Torts (7th Ed.) 254.

UNDERWOOD v. PARKS.

(At Middlesex Sittings, 1744. 2 Strange, 1200, 93 Reprint, 1127.)

In an action for words, the defendant pleaded not guilty, and offered to prove the words to be true, in mitigation of damages: which the Chief Justice refused to permit, saying that at a meeting of all the Judges upon a case that arose in the Common Pleas, a large majority of them had determined not to allow it for the future, but that it should be pleaded, whereby the plaintiff might be prepared to defend himself, as well as to prove the speaking of the words. That this was now a general rule amongst them all, which no Judge would think himself at liberty to depart from, and that it extended to all sorts of words, and not barely to such as imported a charge of felony.[83]

CLARK v. BROWN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1875. 116 Mass. 504.)

Tort for slander, for saying of the plaintiff, "he has stolen my iron bar, cart-pin, and ox-yoke." The defendant pleaded that the words were true. On the trial the defendant offered evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had admitted that he took the defendant's iron bar, ox-yoke and cart-pin, but he did not take them to steal them, but to bother or plague the defendant. The jury found for the plaintiff, for $11.75.

DEVENS, J. It is argued for the defendant that, while one may be justly held for slanderous utterances in respect to an innocent person wrongfully defamed, yet that if such a person, by some misconduct of his own, has contributed to produce a belief in the truth of the words thus uttered, he cannot complain of the person expressing it; and that, therefore, if the plaintiff wantonly took the property of the defendant as an idle jest or for the purpose of annoyance, the defendant is not liable for saying that he stole the articles, unless he knew that the plaintiff intended to return them, or only took them thus to annoy him. But in order to justify the defendant in the utterance of words otherwise slanderous, it is necessary that the facts proved by him should be coextensive with the charge; and he cannot protect himself from the consequences of having made it by showing that he believed it to be true, even if such a belief is induced by misconduct or impropriety on the part of the plaintiff, which fell short of that which he had seen fit to impute. Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 Allen, 406, 83 Am.

[83] Accord: Bearsley v. Bridgman (1864) 17 Iowa, 290: (Action for slander, under the Iowa code of civil procedure. The defendant answered by denial only. On the trial the defendant offered to prove the truth of the words alleged to have been spoken. The plaintiff's objection was sustained by the trial court.)
